Precisely at ten o'clock on the morrow I presented myself at Mr. North's door, and was speedily set at work in his very comfortable office. The whole affair was rather peculiar, but I liked it the better for that, and the more eccentric the old lawyer appeared the more I desired to remain with him, though copying deeds was not exciting. He seemed to take a fancy to me, engaged me for a week, kept me busy till Saturday evening, and then astonished me by informing me for what secret service I was next intended.

As the clock struck five Mr. North wiped his pen wheeled about in his chair, and sat waiting till I finished my last page.

"Mr. Clyde, I have a proposition to make," he began, as I looked up. "It will surprise you, but I have no explanation to give, and you can easily refuse. I have not intended keeping you from the first, but desired to test your capabilities before offering you a better situation. A certain person wishes an amanuensis; I think you eminently fitted for the post. You wish independence, agreeable duties and the surroundings of a gentleman. This place will give you all these, for the salary is liberal, the labor light, the society excellent. One condition, however, is annexed to your acceptance. If you will pledge me your word to keep that condition a secret, whether you accept it or not, I will mention it."

"I do, sir."

"For reasons, the justice and importance of which you would acknowledge if I were at liberty to divulge them, I desire a reliable report of what passes in this person's house. I think you are fitted for that post also. A week ago you told me you were ready to do anything for your bread which was not a crime; this is none. Do you accept the place and the condition."

"I am to play the spy, am I, sir?"

"Exactly, to any extent that your interest, ingenuity and courage prompt you. It is necessary that I should have a daily witness of the events that occur in that family for the next month at least, perhaps longer. I know the task I offer you is both a mysterious and somewhat difficult one, but if you will rely upon the word of an old man who has little more to expect of life, I assure you that no wrong is meditated, and that you will never have cause to regret your compliance. Let me add that at the end of your service, be it short or long, you will receive five hundred dollars, and be subjected to no questions, no detention, no danger or suspicion of any kind."

"But, sir, am I to work utterly in the dark?"

"Utterly."

"Am I never to know what mysterious purpose I am forwarding?"

"Never."

"Can I, ought I to pledge myself to such blind obedience?"

"I believe you can and ought; it is for you to decide whether you will."

Not a feature of the old man's face had varied from its usual colorless immobility; his keen eye searched me while he spoke, and when he paused he sat motionless, with no sign of impatience, as I rapidly considered the strange compact offered me. I rebelled a little at the dishonorable part of it, yet I was conscious of a secret interest and delight in the mysterious mission. The place seemed a tempting one, the bribe a fortune, the security reliable, for Mr. North was as much in my power as I in his. As if cognizant of the doubt and desire between which I was wavering, he said, abruptly:

"You are well-born, well-bred, comely, discreet and acute. Too proud to bear poverty, too poor to be over nice. A man exactly fitted to the place, though others may be found as competent, less scrupulous and more eager for both the enterprise and the reward."

"Hardly, sir. I accept."

The only sign of satisfaction which he gave was a closer pressure of the long thin hands loosely folded on his knee.

"Good! now listen, and bear these instructions carefully in mind. This place is ten miles out of the city; here is the address. On Monday evening you will receive a communication. On no account mention my name or ever betray that you have any knowledge of me. Another thing remember, use your Italian as far as the comprehending of it when spoken by others, but deny that you possess that accomplishment if asked."

"Am I sent as if being accepted, sir?"

"Yes, I think so. You have only to say that you saw and have answered an advertisement in last week's Times. Such a one appeared—stay, put it in your letter. Now look at this and give me your attention."

He turned to his table, produced a small locked portfolio and explained its purpose as I stood beside him. Several quires of peculiarly thin smooth paper lay within, a package of envelopes directed in a strange hand to A. C. Clyde, a seal with a knife for its device, and a stick of lion-grey sealing wax completed the contents of the portfolio.

"You will record upon this paper the principal events, impressions or discoveries of each day, beginning with your first interview on Monday. Every Saturday you will send me your weekly report in one of the envelopes directed to the imaginary author of your own. Secure each carefully with this wax and seal, and post them as privately as possible, without attracting attention by too much precaution."

"I shall remember, sir."

"You are to ask no questions, show no especial interest in what passes about you, and on no account betray that you keep this private record. You have wit, courage, great command of countenance, and will soon discover how to use them helps. Let nothing surprise, alarm or baffle you, and keep faith with me unless you desire ruin instead of reward. Now go, and let me hear from you on Saturday."

He rose, offered me a check, the portfolio and his hand. I accepted all three, and with our usual brief but courteous adieux we parted, the old man to brood doubtless over his strange secret, the young one to hope that in the unknown family he should find some solution of this first enigma.

JUNE 1ST.—Having received no directions as to the form into which I am to put my record, I choose the simple one of the diary as the easiest to myself, perhaps the most interesting to the eyes for whom these pages are written.

According to agreement I came hither to-night at nine o'clock, being belated by an accident on the way. A grave, soberly servant ushered me into a charming room, airy, softly-lighted and exquisitely furnished, yet somewhat foreign in the elegant simplicity. It was empty, and wandering about it while waiting, I discovered a lady in an adjoining room. As the second apartment was of my reserve, I began my surveillance by taking a careful survey. Leaning in a deep chair, I only caught the outline of her figure for open by one of the gray doors she wore a large white cashmere, as if an invalid, and forced to guard herself even from the mild night air. Gray hair waved over on either side her pale cheeks, under a delicate lace cap, which fell in a point upon her forehead. A deep green shade concealed her eyes, leaving visible only the contour of a rounded chin and feminine mouth. She was knitting, and I observed that her little hands were covered nearly to the fingers with open-work black silk mits, such as ancient ladies wore. There was something melancholy yet attractive about this figure, so delicate, so womanly, so sadly afflicted, for I felt sure she was blind.

Absorbed in watching her, I was rather startled by a rustling among the shrubs that grew about the open French window behind me, and turned to see a young man entering from the garden. Somewhat embarrassed at being discovered peeping, I hastily inferred that the new-comer was a son of Mr. Bernard Noel, and introduced myself rather awkwardly.

"I came in answer to an advertisement in the Times, sir. I sent my name to Mr. Noel; but it is late; your father, perhaps, is not disengaged?"

What a clear look flashed upon me out of the dark eyes that were scrutinizing my face, and what a singular smile accompanied the words.

"I am Bernard Noel."

I murmured an apology, presented my letter, and while I read it sat examining my future patron, wondering the while that such a lad should need an amanuensis. I say lad, for at the first glance he looked eighteen; a second caused me to suspect that he was some years older. Every inch a gentleman, for high-breeding makes itself manifest at a glance. Of middle height, slender and boyish in figure, yet with no boyish awkwardness to mar the easy grace of his address or attitude. The light shone full upon his face, and in that momentary pause I studied it. Dark curling hair framed a broad, harmoniously rounded forehead; black brows lay straight above those Southern eyes of his, now veiled by sweeping lashes; the nose was spirited and haughty; the mouth grave and strong, perhaps rendered more so by a slight moustache that shaded it. Even his dress interested me, as if I were a woman, though nothing could have been simpler or more becoming. A black velvet paletot, dark trousers, collar turned over a ribbon, an artistically small cravat pin, perfectly shod, and a single ring on a handsome hand that held the letter. An almost instantaneous impression of the possession of the very youth was both older than he looked and wiser than his years. Whether some deep experience had matured him, or the presence of genius then manifested itself, I could not so soon decide, but felt instinctively attracted and interested in the unconscious person whom I had come to meet to watch.

Presently he looked up, saying in a peculiarly clear and penetrating voice:

"This is entirely satisfactory, Mr. Clyde; let me hope that the situation may prove so to yourself for Mr. Lord has engaged you following my own. You are to serve the services of a 'a fine scholar and an accomplished gentleman.'"

He bowed with a gesture that turned the quotation to a compliment, then continued with a gracious gravity that was very charming, from the contrast of youth with the native dignity which set so gracefully upon that boyish master of a household:

"It is too late for the return train; you will remain to-night, and perhaps send for your luggage to-morrow. I am impatient to see my work begun for time presses."

"I am entirely at your service, Mr. Noel."

"Thanks. You will find us a quiet family; we see no society just now, for my cousin is an invalid, and my present occupation a solitude. I hoped to have finished my task myself, but my health will not permit of such close application as it demands, and I shall leave it to you, and take a holiday."

Anxious to discover what my duties were to be, I put the question in the form of a surmise.

"I shall be doubly glad to take it up if, as I infer, it is to be used for the transcribing of some maiden work, perhaps."

A slight flush rose to the young man's cheek, colorless before; his eye fell like a shy girl's, and his head broke into a sudden smile, instantly against his will, for he checked it with a frown, and answered, with a curious blending of pleasure, pride and reserve:

"Yes, it is my maiden work, but as we shall both be heartily tired of the thing before we are done with it, let us drop that subject for the present if you please."

"Sensitive and lofty, like most young authors," thought I, apologizing, in an air of contrition. Setting the topic aside with a little wave of the hand, Mr. Noel said, more cordially:

"Your rooms are in the other wing, and I hope will be agreeable to you. Madame Estavan's health and my own wayward habits prevent much regularity in our daily life, but each must study the rest of us. We breakfast in our own rooms, lunch when we please, and dine at five. You will oblige me by ordering the two first meals as you prefer, and thus bring your appetite and convenience, and by joining us at dinner; for in so small a family ceremony is unnecessary, and social intercourse better for us all."

"What hours do you prefer to have devoted to my duties, sir?" I asked, with a secret dread of the long hours of respectful monosyllable, for my six and twenty years seemed to give me no superiority over this stripling save that of experience, and I felt that I could only study early these summer mornings, finding an hour or two then more profitable than later in the day when sun or storm called me out, and after, with a recess at noon for rest and refreshment. The garden and west wing are sacred to madame, but the rest of the house, and the library for open to you, and the evenings at your disposal, unless you prefer to write. When not otherwise engaged, we are usually in the drawing-room after dinner, if you care to join us."

Another singular expression passed over his face just then, reluctance and regret, audacity and pain, as if some doubt had arisen in it, but it was gone before I could define the predominant emotion, and his countenance was like a cold, pale mask again.

I expressed my satisfaction at these arrangements, and while I spoke he watched me intently, with a look that made me feel that being a most unwanted manifestation, and doubly annoying just then; for, conscious of my secret mission, a sense of guilt haunted me which was anything but tranquillizing, with those searching eyes full upon me. I think the blush did me good service, however, for as if some doubt had been solved in his mind, my present bashfulness seemed to reassure him. He said nothing, but a slight fold in his forehead smoothed itself away, and an expression of overpraised his features so wisely that I made a mental note of the fact, and resolved to support the character of a simple-minded young person, rather than a man of the world, as by so doing I should doubtless secure many opportunities which might otherwise be withheld me.

Here madame called "Bernard!" and he went in to her. Without leaving my seat I saw him kneel over her chair, and caress her face, a cousin, heard her ask several questions in a lowered voice, the answers to which she received with a merry little laugh as fallible as any girl's. Then she rose, saying aloud in a slow, mild voice, with a pleasant accent in it:

"Take me in, cherie, and present monsieur, then ring for Pierre, that we have coffee."

Drawing her arm through hers, Mr. Noel led her to the larger room, established her in an armchair, and presented me, with the anxious look again apparent. Madame was very French, penetrating courteous, and so gracefully helpless that I soon found myself waiting upon her almost as zealously as her cousin, who watched my compassionate attentions with that inscrutable smile of his. The soldierly servant handed coffee, and the slight constraint which unavoidably exists at the beginning of an acquaintance was fast wearing off when an incident occurred which effectually broke up our interview.

I was approaching madame with her ball, which had rolled from her lap, when Mr. Noel, who stood beside her, stooped forward, as if attracted by something that alarmed him; for, dropping his cup, he whispered a single word and threw her shawl across her face. It sounded like "paint" or faint," was probably the latter, for with a slight cry, more expressive of alarm than pain, madame fell into her chair, and the word he carried her away, leaving me transfixed with astonishment.

He was back again directly, looking quite composed, and with the brief explanation that madame was accustomed to such turns, he reassured asked if I would like to retire in order for my luggage, that it might be dispatched early in the morning. Accepting the hint, I bade him good-night, and was soon installed in my own room, a two charming rooms on the ground floor of the west wing, where I now sit, concluding first report.

JUNE 2D.—Breakfasted in my room, and punctually at eight o'clock tapped at the door which Pierre had pointed out the night before as belonging to Mr. Bernard Noel. He bade me enter, and obeying, I found him busied in a deep recess, divided from the room by damask curtains. These being partially drawn back, revealed a window, looking on the garden, a writing-chair and table, a tall cabinet and couch, and a literary store of books, all in the luxurious and refined confusion which a room itself was plainly furnished, quiet, cool and shady, while the same atmosphere of refinement and elegance pervaded it that had impressed me elsewhere, and which seemed rather some peculiar charm of its possessor than the result of taste or time. He was busy in the morning with a chilly courtesy, which would have instantly recalled the relations between us had I been inclined to forget them, and with a dignified writing-table, between all necessary appliances were laid ready, he handed me a pile of MS., saying, as he hail recommended me to myself upon it:

"Many freaks and whims are permitted to young authors, you know, Mr. Clyde. One of mine is to leave my book unfinished till it is ready to be set up in type. I will not impose the first chapters upon you, but you may begin where my patience gave out. Copy a few pages as a sample, I will come and look at them presently."

He returned to his nook, and employed himself so noiselessly that I soon forgot his presence. The manuscript was in a fine essence of a poorly, hand, and culture hardly credible in one so young. The book was no romance, poem, satire or essay, but a most remarkable work upon Italian literature and politics. A strange subject for a boy to choose, and still more marvellous was his treatment of it. I was fairly staggered as I read on at the learning, research and eloquence each fine paragraph displayed. No wonder his cheeks are colorless, his eyes full of fire, his brow both lofty and haughty, when that young brain of his has wrought such sentences. No wonder he is proud, knowing himself endowed with such gifts and the power to use them. This explains the fascination of his presence, the charm of his manner, the indefinable something which attracts me in spite of one's interest, yet restrains one's curiously by an involuntary respect for that attribute which is "divine when young."

I should have gone on reading in a maze of admiration and incredulity, had not the recollection of his request and my duty filled me with utmost activity and diligence. Soon I became absorbed and forgot everything but the smoothly-flowing words, that seemed to glide from my pen as if to music, for the theme was liberty, and the writer was a poet as well as patriot and philosopher. Pausing to take a long breath, I became aware that Mr. Noel was at my elbow. He saw my excited face, my evident desire to break into a rapture. It seemed to touch and please him, for he came nearer, asking, tenderly enough:

"Do you like it?"

"I have no words to express how much. It well that you do not embargo on my tongue, for otherwise I should never be done praising."

His face glowed, his eye shone, and he offered me his hand with that bewitching smile of his.

"I thank you, I shall remember this." Then, as if to check me and himself he examined my copy of the last twenty written MS.

"This is beautifully done. I hardly know my pages when freed from the blots and blemishes given so familiar to me. Do you find it very long some?"

"On the contrary, most delightful yet most tantalizing, for I long to read more, and fear I shall be evening. Mr. Noel, I am utterly amazed that such a book should be produced by so young a man."

"I might say I did not write it, for my father has quenched me his labors, and if these pages possess truth, eloquence or beauty, the praise belongs to him—not me."

Softly, almost solemnly he spoke, without confusion or conceit; pride unmarred by any tinge of vanity he probably never knew, and seemed as if he had entirely forgotten himself in his work, and would accept no commendation but through that. He appeared to fall into a little reverie, and I sat silent, my eyes fixed on the shapely hand resting against the table as he stood. I was not thinking of it, but it amongst him; for, with an almost genius gesture, he flung down the pages he had held, thrust both hands deep into the pockets of his paletot, turned sharply on his heel and went into his alcove. I heard him stirring there for several minutes, as if putting his papers under lock and key, then reappearing, he said gravely:

"You will find lunch in the dining-room whenever you like it. I must take madame for her drive now, we shall meet at dinner."

He went, and soon after I saw a pony carriage roll down the avenue. I wrote till noon, when feeling hungry, I went in search of refreshment, as Mr. Noel had forgotten to mention where the dining room was, and I did not care to ring up a servant. A wide hall ran the whole length of the house, opening upon the garden in the rear. Four doors appeared; the two opposite were open and belonged to the drawing-room; I was about to rap on the threshold of the third, and the fourth evidently led to the dining-room. I chose to ignore that fact and satisfy my curiosity by peeping elsewhere. I might never have so good an opportunity again; the master and mistress were away, no one would suspect a stranger, and if I met the servants ignorance would be a fair excuse. Having assumed the part of spy, I wished to play it well, and being forbidden to question a person, must gain information from inanimate things, if possible. Two cross passages led from the main hall, one to my rooms, the other to the west wing. This, of course, I took, softly opening the first door that appeared; madame's apartment, for the gray silk dress and white shawl lay upon a chair. A rapid survey satisfied me, and I passed to the next; Mr. Noel's, though I should scarcely have guessed it but for the hat and riding-whip on the pistols beside it. Bed, and the gentleman's dressing-case on the toilette. The windows were heavily curtained, the furniture luxurious, and the air of almost feminine elegance pervaded it. Two things struck me; the first was a dainty work-basket in a lounging chair, so near that I could see the exquisitely fine stitching on the wristband that lay in it. Madame was blind, no other woman appeared—who did it? The second was more important. Upon the floor near the door where I stood appeared another half open, showing a flight of thickly carpeted stairs winding upward. A blaze of sunshine streamed down from above, the odor of flowers came to me with a balmy gust, and in the act of stealing forward to see what was there, I was arrested by a soft voice exclaiming in Italian:

"Ah, I am so tired of this; desire some new amusement, or I shall die of weariness!"

"My darling, so am I," replied a deeper voice; "but remembering our reward, I can have patience. Come to me and let us talk of our next letter, it is late to-day."

"No; it makes me sad to think of that unless I must, and Heaven knows I need all the cheerfulness and courage I possess."

"Poor little heart, you do. Sing to me while I work, and so forget imprisonment and trouble."

"That is my only consolation. Shall I am thirsty, I want a draught of wine, and Pierre has forgotten me," murmured the female voice.

"Then you shall be well do that. I am obliged to send him to the St. Michaels, that they might be told of this man's arrival and conduct matters with double discretion," answered the other.

"Poor Pierre! he has to serve us now as butler, gardener, errand-boy and sentinel. His life must be almost as wearisome as mine," sighed the other.

"Now you are growing sorrowful again. Kiss me, Clarita, and let me find a laughter face when I return. I am going for the wine."

There was a rustle, a murmur and a pause, but I heard no more; for gliding like a shadow down the hall, I retired to my own room, and sat down to devour the first viand that came to hand. Here was a discovery! the deeper voice I heard was Mr. Noel's, and the other his cousin's instead. Here was sweet and slow, this youthful and vivacious, plaintive and petulant by turns. Noel's was unfathomable, though at times it betrayed a certain melancholy to an infinite tenderness, a caressing tone that would have soothed and won any woman by its magic. I had a lonely time to myself in my room before he entered, started at seeing me, then laughed and explained.

"Father, I have lived so much alone that I had forgotten the addition to my household for the moment. Let me tell your glass."

I sat opposite to him by when a strain of music floated past the window, and involuntarily I paused to listen.

"Ah! Clara Diva, and exquisitely given."

As I spoke I saw Mr. Noel's hand tighten round the decanter he held, and again that peculiar glance flashed upon me as he said:

"You understand Italian, then?"

"Yes," was on my lips, but the recollection of my promise checked it, and I answered with an accent of regret, "I wish I did."

Mr. Noel raised his glass to his lips, as if to conceal the smile that again parted them, while he doubtlessly thought, "So do not I," but he said aloud:

"You recognised the air rather than the words, I fancy."

"Yes, madame possesses a wonderful voice."

"Madame is an accomplished woman."

With which unsatisfactory reply he strolled to the window, plate in hand, and stood there listening. I ate in silence, but watched him covertly, recalling what I had lately heard, and finding in his appearance further confirmation of the suspicion which had come to me. His eyes had met mine but once; on that occasion I caught a glimpse of the summer heat; his grave mouth was soft and smiling, as if the kiss he asked for still remained upon his lips, and the music of that sweeter language seemed to linger in his voice. He looked a lover, and I felt that he was one, for genius rapidly matures both head and heart, unhampered by restraints of custom, age or race. How elsexplains the presence of the unknown singer, upon whom I had heard him lavish such tender names with more than brotherly affection? I confess the fancy charms me, for my own loveless life has been so bare of romance I am ready to find interest and pleasure in another man's experience, whilethe mystery which surrounds this strange youth and my relations with him make it doubly alluring.

As I rose to return to my work the act seemed to rouse him; approaching the table he carefully selected a cake and fruit, filled a glass with red claret, and arranging them on a silver salver, added a handful of flowers from a vase near by, and carried it away, saying with a half-sad, half-archful look:

"Madame likes me to wait on her, and finds me of delicate attentions as a girl."

Till nearly five I wrote, then dressed for dinner, and when summoned found my host and hostess waiting for me. A well appointed table, a well served meal one occurrence at its close are all that is necessary to record of this episode. Noel sat beside his cousin, waiting on her with a quiet devotion beautiful to see. Pierre hovered about both with a respectfully protective air, which became the most favorable sentiment who seemed to exist between jealously, as if he feared a rival in his young master's confidence. It was a silent meal, for Noel was not loquacious, and madame seemed ill. I did my best, but the role I had taken was not one to allow of much conversation, and long pauses followed short dialogues.

We were just rising when Pierre entered, bringing a basket of toothsome flowers, which he delivered to his master, with the message:

"For madame, with Mrs. St. Michael's compliments."

Madame uttered no thanks, made no gesture of pleasure, but every particle of color faded from her face as she seemed to listen for Noel's answer. He too was paler, and the hand extended for the basket trembled visibly, yet he answered with unwonted animation:

"She is very kind; cousin, I will take them to your room for you. Mr. Clyde, I have an engagement for this evening; but drawing-room, library and lawn are at your service."

"The last shall be first, thank you, and I will enjoy the sunset out of doors."

With that I took myself away; Pierre closed the door behind me, and as I turned into the passage to my rooms I fancied I heard the click of a key turning in the lock. I got my hat, passed out at the open window of my room, and leisurely strolled towards the lawn along the terrace which lay close before the house. My steps were noiseless on the turf, and as I neared the windows of the dining room I snatched a hasty look, which showed me the basket overturned upon the floor, madame with her head at her feet and her face hidden in her hands, Mr. Noel reading a letter aloud, and Pierre listening intently, with a napkin still over his arm.

They did not see me, all being absorbed, and with my curiosity still further piqued, I wended myself with impetuosities as I surveyed the exterior of the house, the occupants of which already inspired me with such interest.

A wandering English gardener is a nest of verdure. A lawn slopes to the road in front, a garden lies behind; a lane runs parallel with the garden-wall on the right, and a grove of pines rises abruptly against the sky upon the left. Curious to locate the room of the unknown, I struck into the lane, scrutinizing the left wing as I walked. To my surprise, no upper windows appeared. An ancient grape vine covered the western wall, trained away from the lower casements, but completely masking the space above and wandering over half the roof. Looking closer, I soon discovered a large aperture in the eaves, half hidden by the vines; the sash evidently lowered from within, and this explains the flood of sunshine and the odorous gust that float down the stairway which I now rang to mount. Having looked till my eyes ached, I roamed away into the fields when the lie between the solitary cedar and the tower.

As I came up the avenue on my return Mr. Noel passed me, driving rapidly; he did not see me, for his hat was pulled down over upon his head, but his mouth looked grim, his whole figure erect and resolute. I watched him out of sight, went in and read for an hour, then to my room to secret diary. It is past midnight now, but Mr. Noel has not yet returned.

JUNE 7TH.—Found the young gentleman in his alcove, and my work laid ready when I went to the study this morning. He looked up and answered my salutation as I entered, then seated himself behind his curtain, and I saw no more of him for an hour. At the end of that time the perfect silence that reigned in the room arrested my attention, and caused me to suspect that he had slipped away through the window. I was just meditating a step when accident supplied me with a genuine excuse. A little gust of air blew in from the garden, rustling the papers on his table; one was wafted beyond the curtain, and almet to my feet. I waited a moment for him to reclaim it, but nothing stirred, and quite sure that he was gone, I examined it. It, evidently covered what is written in Italian it proved to be, and a moment's inspection showed me that it was a part of the work I was copying, though in a different hand bolder hand. Stepping to the recess to restore it, I was startled by discovering Mr. Noel asleep in his chair. His very soul must be locked, though younger than ever in his sleep, and on the page upon his desk lay drops that looked like tears. Seeing that his slumber was deep, I ventured to look well about me. The half-written sheet on which his pen still lay, as it dropped from his drowsy hand, was a translation of the very page I held. Others lay on the table, and in the cabinet which now stood open I spied three piles of MS. A hasty glance showed me the missing chapters copied in his graceful hand, a heap of blurred and hasty translation, and a worn, stained MS. in he same bold writing, the same language as the truant leaf. Farther I dared not look, but crept back to my seat, and fell to wondering why the boy wrote in Italian, and muffered no one to translate it but himself. Were he other than he is I should suspect him of a literary theft or some double dealing with another's work. But Bernard Noel seems incapable of deceit, and his look, his manner when speaking of it assure me that it is rightfully his own, whatever his reasons may be for so laborious a process. My reflections were suddenly interrupted by hearing him rouse, and being his guilt unable to remain unseen, I left him where. He looked half bewildered by sleep, but began to collect the papers, and carefully arranged them in the cabinet, and, stepping out into the garden, where I saw him pacing thoughtfully to and fro for half an hour. That was the last of him for the day. Madame dined alone, as the St. Michaels, as Pierre informed me when five o'clock found me the sole partaker of an excellent dinner. They returned at nine, and the invisible musician has been singing for a hour.

JUNE 8TH.—For four days nothing has occurred worth recording, as I have been almost entirely alone. Mr. Noel handed me over or two each morning, receives my copy at night, and only the necessary directions are asked and given. Madame has not been visible, I am told, yet her cousin looks tranquil, and no nurse or physician has been summoned to my knowledge. Very brief and silent are my meals at dinner, and I do not once have I found the drawing-room occupied of an evening. No one calls, but Mr. Noel drives out often, and evenings of late have been spent at the writing-table, my evenings in my own room or solitary walks about the country. Receiving from one of these last I saw the window under the vines brilliantly lighted, and resolved to satisfy my curiosity the first moonless night. This crisis has arrived, and I will put it to satisfactory, and that out of my own darkness I have given light.

JUNE 7TH.—To-day, being Sunday, I asked Mr. Noel, when I met him at lunch, in which of the three churches, over the hill, I should find his pew.

"In none; I go nowhere just now. My cousin cannot, and I join her in a little service here at home," he said slowly, and without a change of color. I should expect to be included in that domestic service: "My friend, Mrs. St. Michael, will be glad to see you, I am sure, in the drawing-room, I have spoken to her, and she expects you."

I thanked him, went to church, found the pastor dull preache, though apparently an excellent and pious gentleman; his wife a very motherly lady, who received me with courtesy, examined me with interest, and, as we came out together, asked me how I liked her husband's sermon.

"Mr. Noel seems an eccentric but most charming young man, and madame a wonderfully cheerful sufferer," I replied.

"Genius has many privileges, and eccentricity is one, you know," replied the lady, adding, rather guardedly: "Madame has been ill a long time, it seems, and manifold afflictions cannot wholly darken her bright spirit. May I trouble you to give my kind regards to her, and tell Mr. Noel I will see him the morrow?"

At dinner I delivered the messages; Mr. Noel looked graver than before on hearing his, and madame turned gay. I was glad to see her so, and did my best to interest her, observing that her attention often took the word from her lips, and that Pierre's usually expressionless face wore an aspect of uneasiness. In drawing out her handkerchief a letter was dropped at every rosary. No one heard it fall, for it slipped noiselessly into the folds of her dress, and no one saw it but myself. Pierre was busy at the sideboard, and, stooping, I lifted and returned it to her. She received it with the exclamation:

"Oh! How careless I am grown! I thought I put it by after mass."

"Madame is a Catholic, one sees."

The words slipped from me involuntarily, her answer seemed to call for them.

"Oh, yes; in truth I am, and so is——"

A heavy silver fork slanged down into Mr. Noel's plate, and madame started at the clatter, leaving her sentence unfinished.

"Pardon, cousin; if you are forgetful, I am awkward. You were saying that you were a Catholic."

Noel spoke quite naturally, but I suspect madame caught some warning from his tone, for the color returned to her face instantly, and she smiled on me.

"Surely, yes. Whom else could I mean? Not you, my too Protestant and English Bernard."

Poor lady, she revealed the secret of that anxious emphasis upon the words "Protestant" and "English" convinced me that Noel was Catholic, and looking at her this I now should have suspected it. As if anxious to banish it from my mind, he led the way to the drawing-room, and, as madame's spirits rose, I exerted myself bravely to entertain us both. In conversation I found him witty, earnest and frank, but in the midst of an animated discussion he suddenly covered his face himself, and going to the grand piano gave us fragments from the sacred music of the great masters, with an ease and brilliancy that caused me to cease instantly enjoying this treat when, as if doomed to make scenes, madame suddenly gave a loud cry and fainted quite away from her seat.

"He has come! Mon pire! Mon pire!"

For an instant Noel stared aghast, then sprang to her, looking quite wild as she. I followed to the terrace, nd, standing there, heard, through the stillness, the twilight, madame sobbing and her cousin chiding. He spoke Italian, but low and rapid as were his words, I caught them broken ly.

"I cannot trust you—you have no control of face, voice, mind or manner. You have it impossible—he cannot come for weeks yet—I will have no more of this."

"Forgive me. It is the life which destroys my nerves; it is unnatural. I cannot bear it. Let it end for me," sobbed madame.

"It shall," almost sternly answered he. "Rest content, I will ask no more of you; it is selfish, unwise. I can bear and do alone; you have suffered enough."

"It is not that; it is the suspense, the deceit, the danger that dismays me. I can sat no parley. Send me away for a little; you will be freer, happier, safer, without me, as you know."

"I shall, and so will you. To-morrow St. Michael will return, and a few weeks will end all. Now compose yourself, go to your room, and leave me to explain your flight to Clyde."

I slipped round to the hall door and met him there with, I flatter myself, well-acted concern. Madame passed me with a murmured:

"Monsieur, I implore your pardon, it haunts me; forgive the malady of a broken heart."

Noel gave her into the charge of a STATE, elderly woman, whom I now saw for the first time, and who came hurrying up with Pierre. As she departed the old servant hastily explained that it was only her old peeped and startled madame.

"Then madame is not wholly blind?" I asked, quickly, for there he paused and looked confused. "I beg your pardon, I——"

"It is only a partial loss. You may go, Pierre, you are forgiven. But let us have no more of this sort of nonsense."

The old man gladly withdrew and his master added, as I bade him good-night:

"If you will excuse me, I shall take her to town to-morrow. We have friends there, and her state demands better care than I can give her. We shall leave early, and prepare matters for you, as I shall not return till late."

A long sigh of relief broke from him as he turned away, and I went to my room with a half-fear and belief that madame is not only a little mad, but some refugee whom he is befriending, and who, in her grandeur, has chosen to lead a life of concealment under the same roof with some fair, frail lover of this fascinating boy.

GEN. BANKS AND STAFF.

WITH the present interest attending the movements of Gen. Banks, our readers will view with pleasure the group of the General and his staff, from a striking photograph, recently taken in New Orleans. Of Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks, the General commanding the department of the Gulf little need be said. He holds the steadily rose to be his own efforts to the highest rank in Congress, who, as an officer, possesses the many high qualities and deserved success, is too well known to need a sketch here.

Brig.-Gen. Charles F. Stone, his Chief of Staff, is an old army officer, a native of Massachusetts, who graduated from West Point in 1845, served in the Mexican war, and was brevetted Lieutenant in the 1st regular service Colonel of the 14th infantry, and till recently was Brigadier-General, having been appointed in 1861. He subsequently recently mustered out.

He commanded at Ball's bluff, and was then confined in Fort Lafayette for many weary months, to be at last discharged, untried, unheard and unconvicted.

Brig.-Gen. A. S. Lee, the Chief of Cavalry, led the charge at the Sabine Pass fight.

Brig.-Gen. Richard Arnold, Banks's Chief of Artillery, was a cadet in 1846, and in 1850 entered the artillery service, becoming Lieutenant in the 1st artillery, and became a First Lieutenant in 1854. He was brevetted Major for artillery, his commission dating from May 14, 1861

Lieut.-Col. William Stretch Abert, a son of Col. J. J. Abert, is also on the staff of Gen. Banks in the artillery, June 18, 1835, and First Lieutenant March, 1838. He left the army May, 1861. he was made Captain in the 6th cavalry, and holds the position of Inspector-General, with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel.

Col. E. G. Beckwith, the Chief Commissary, was a cadet in 1838, and in 1842 entered the 2d artillery; in 1850 he rose to the rank of First Lieutenant, and became Captain in 1855. He has held the rank of Chief Commissary since 1861.

Col. Clark was appointed an additional Aide-de-Camp, with the rank of Colonel, Nov. 18, 1861.

Major Guido Norman Lieber, a son we believe of the well-known author, was born in South Carolina. but was appointed from New York in May, 1861, as Assistant Adjutant-General.

Major Richard H. Alexander, the Medical Director, and assistant surgeon, whose name appears among the rank and file.

Col. James Wilson is a gentleman of fine education, who previous to the war edited a pa er at Chicago, and in 1860 and 1861 has published a volume containing biographical sketches of the Illinois officers.

Major Peter Hagner, Major Von Sherman, A. D. C.; Lieut. Charles A. Burgess, A. A. G.; Lieut. Robert Targett, A. D. C.; Col. S. B. Holabird, Chief Quartermaster; Lieut.-Col. Thomas Swords, Deputy Quartermaster; Chief Signal Officer; Lieut.-Col. George W. Stipp, Medical Inspector; Capt. Charles L. Bulkley, Chief of Military Telegraph.

The accompanying engraving represents the staff of Gen. Banks on the field, Col. Wilson and Col. Clark being specially mentioned.

PLYMOUTH, NORTH CAROLINA.

IT is not an attractive subject, but we give our readers a view of Plymouth, N. C., made by an artist who was a prisoner of more than a year at that place, which has now been, in a manner so disgraceful to our arms, wrested from us.

Plymouth, which lies miles south of Roanoke river, and is connected with Albemarle sound by a small mill stream, is a town of 1,500 inhabitants, the population of about 1,000, and was rapidly increasing in trade.

The Loss of the Southfield.

Nothing can be more disheartening than the disasters at Plymouth. The Navy Department had long been aware that the rebels were building a formidable ram on the Roanoke. When at last Plymouth was occupied by an immense force on land and the ram was found to be descending the river, the Sassacus, an old iron-clad boat, was sent to meet her. A rebel land battery, by sinking her, sacked her from being run down by the ram Albemarle. The Albemarle, down stealthily under the shadow of the bank and ran into the Southfield, Lieut. Island ferryboat, sinking it in ten minutes after her formidable saw-rated prow crushed through its sides.

The Miami, Capt. Flusser, lay alongside, and the commander, who had been actively shelling the rebel ashore, sighted and fired a gun at the Albemarle, but it rebounded in fragments from the sloping side. killing Flusser himself.

Capt Bunker is a loss to the service, for he was an active, energetic officer, and had performed with unusually means to do all that he could in the emergency. It was his intention to connect two boats firmly together, by means of chains and spars, and sink the connection by exploding a torpedo under the aiming to strike her between both vessels and force her against the bank. At the same time the torpedo was to be so arranged as to cast it into her smoke stack, and thus to destroy communication by control, the arrangements were not executed. After his fall several other gallant officer were killed at the ram, but all failed to pierce her well armored sides.

BRIG.-GEN. T. E. RANSOM.

GEN. RANSOM, recently wounded in the battles in the Red river country, was born at Norwich, VT., Nov. 29, 1834, being a son of the gallant Col. T. S. Ransom, who fell at Chapultepec. The deceased, and who had, in his military school, trained many to military duties.

After completing his education, young Ransom removed to Peru, Ill., in 1851, and began life as an engineer, but shortly became an engineer in a real estate. When the war broke out he raised a company in La Salle county, where he resided, and on its incorporation into the 11th Illinois was elected Major. The regiment during its three months' service was stationed near Cairo, and was then mustered out. When it was reorganized for three years Ransom was made Lieutenant-Colonel, and as the Colonel, the late Gen. W. H. L. Wallace, was generally acting as Brigadier, Ransom commanded the regiment during most of it. On the 23d of August he defeated a rebel force under Gen. Marmaduke, at Fayetteville, Ark., and received a severe wound in the shoulder. At Fort Donelson he was in the thickest of the action and was specially mentioned. His services had prostrated him, and for a long time he could accompany his men only in imagination, but he would not leave them.

He was made Brigadier, and at Pittsburg Landing was again in command, and though wounded in the head on the first day, would not retire, and for his gallantry received the highest commendation. He was made Chief of Staff to General Hurlbut on his appointment as Brigadier-General, and he was raised to the rank of Major-General. He was also Chief of Gen. McClernand and Inspector-General of the Army of the Tennessee, and Gen. McClernand's staff of the District of Cairo.

In the seizure of Vicksburg he commanded a brigade and led it at Champion's hill and the other preliminary battles, and in the attack made on the rebel works, 19 May, 1863. After the surrender he was sent to Natchez, in July he was called to head up the operations of the rebel army.

He has since been engaged in the Red river expedition, and, as we have seen, has for the fourth time received a wound on the field, having been shot down by a Minie ball in the knee while directing the fire of the Chicago battery, on the second day's fight.

COL. JOSEPH J. MORRISON, 16TH NEW YORK ARTILLERY.

COL. MORRISON, now at the head of a fine artillery regiment, for which he recruited so successfully as to command double the number of men, he is a native of New York city, born about 1832. On the breaking out of the rebellion he was at the head of the company of the National Guard. Removing to St. Louis, he offered his services in military organization, and raised a militia company. When the President, in May, 1861, called for troops he was elected Captain of company in St. Louis, but seeing little chance of service there he resigned, and went to New York and was chosen Captain of Co. A, 9th New York State Militia, and served with Sherman through the Virginia campaign. After this he returned to New York and organized a Zouave battalion, with which he participated the 36 New York artillery, and fought under Gen. Burnside in the campaign through the North Carolina campaigns, distinguishing himself at Kinston, Whitehall and Goldsboro. At the latter place his battery was charged upon by three South Carolina regiments, which he repulsed with a loss of over 700 men. His regiment was next sent to South Carolina, to reinforce Gen. Foster, and while there Col. Morrison was selected to return to New York and raise a new artillery regiment. He accordingly returned to New York in the 16th, and is now in command of it at Gouverneur Hospital. The 16th is not yet full, but the full complement is to be reduced to 1,100, the rest being assigned to other regiments.

THE SPELLING OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

VARIOUS attempts have been made from time to time to reform the horribly confused orthography of our language to make it conform to sound. Ormin, author of a metrical paraphrase of the New Testament, written in 1215, was the earliest writer for outstripped the former in his work De recta et emendata linguæ Anglicæ Scriptione, published at Basle, in 1568. In 1850 was published the "Alveary, or Quadruple Dictionary," of John Bare, which contained every valuable conversions upon the imp rfections of our alphabet, &c.; in that year Alexander Ellis published his Glossic (since which would have all more sleepe with him quettie a shilla, and a mannie, and a boie, and a dogge than his iddiscave copie), will sale I am too curious about the matter to be satisfied with such a reform. Such so fruities and trifling a matter; other come that Alexander Ellis would bring in such a state of writing h e filled their bares and baggee with old shoone and hatte, if he had any. But it is impossible to accord it, and but follie to go about to make any bobbie.

Besides all other attempts at change sink into insignificance before the scheme of Isaac Pitman by James Spearson. Of him De Quincey says: "The worthy Pinkerton proposed a revolution which would have left us nothing to spell." He proposed the letter "a" as a plural termination in place of "s," the "ment" for "ments," "papers" for "papers;" the accented "e" for "ed" in all substantives; the "f" for "ph" in all adjectives.

WHEN we hear a novice playing the organ, we think the instrument has one stop too few.

AT LAST.

BY ADA TROOMAN.

So I smile proudly, do I? Well, what then?
Sweet cause I have for smiling, since my crown—
My rightful crown of love—the flower of men
Has place upon my brow—waving shaken down.

From that bright tree which ever bloomed so fair
(But not for me); content I stood aside,
Nor thought of hate, that other brows should wear
Its starry blooms that crowned them wife or bride.

For what was I that he should strive to win
And wear me on his breast? A wayside weed—
No more; but still a weed unsullied by sin
Of any worldly taint or soiled deed.

Perhaps that won him; no, it cannot be,
Nor good nor worth had I; I cannot tell,
I only know he bent and said to me
Those precious words my heart knows now so well.

Am I not right to smile, the happy queen
Of one true heart? the dear and chosen one
Of him I love! What marvel if my mien
Is proud? my woman's life is just begun.

The Gulf Between Them.

By Mrs. Ann S. Stephens.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE day was passing—that long, terrible day in which the moments seemed to lengthen themselves into years, filled with every one the gloom about the old house deepened and pressed more heavily down.

Gravely Mellen was in his library still; it had been a busy day with him; it appeared as if every creature within reach who could invent a plea of business had chosen that time to trouble him.

He was alone at last, and it was well; he was literally incapable of enduring any farther self-restraint.

He rang the bell and gave strict orders to Dolph:

"Let no one else in to-day; I have letters to write; I will not see another human being."

Dolph bowed himself out, and took his way to the lower regions, to communicate to Cleo and Victoria the commands his master had given. Those three servants kept themselves aloof from the few others employed for tasks which they considered too menial for the dignity of their position, and these gaping youths and girls were strictly forbidden to enter the apartment in which Cleo had installed herself.

They were perfectly well aware, those three subtle emissaries, that something was wrong in the house; servants always do know when anything out of the common routine happens, and no pretence can blind their watchful eyes.

"Master says he won't see nobody more," observed Dolph, as he entered the room where Cleo was rolling out her pie-crust, and Victoria busily occupied in watching her.

"I wonder what's come over 'em all," said Vic. "Dar's missus a walkin' up an' down like a crazy woman—"

"An' she didn't eat no breakfast," interrupted Dolph, "an' she never touched a thing yesterday."

"An' Miss Elsie a-rushed out on de sofa, lookin' as if she'd cried her pretty eyes out," went on Victoria. "Says she's got a headache—go 'long; tell dat to nobody else! It's my 'pinion der's more heartache under dem kinks dan anything else."

"Dat's jis' what I tink," assented 'Dolph.

Cleo laid down her attack at the pastry board, gave a sniff of doubtful meaning to attract their attention, tossed her head till her frizzed locks shook as if in a high wind, brought her rollingpin down on the board with great energy, and remained silent for the express purpose of being questioned.

"What does yer tink 'bout it, Miss Clorinda?" asked 'Dolph. "Yer sentiments is allers so conspicuous dat I be glad to have der 'lumination on dis pint."

Vic looked a little spiteful at hearing such eloquence wasted on Clo, but she was so anxious for anybody's opinion that for once she forgot to quarrel.

"I tinks what I tink," said Clo, with another toss of her head and an extra flourish of the rollingpin.

"Oh!" said 'Dolph, quite discomfited.

"Jis' so," said Clorinda.

"Any passon could have guessed dat or," put in Victoria, in an irritated way; "yer needn't make such a consequence ob it' saying dat."

"I shall make a mysteriousness or shall luff it alone, jis' as I tink best," retorted Clo, "so yer needn't get needfully wid my dumpin,' Miss Vic, 'cause yer'll git yer fingers burnt if yer does."

"I don't want to meddle nor nothin' dat reerns to you, Clo," said Vic, looking at the prospect of a quarrel, since there was nothing to be gained by amicable words. "But I colored tings is generally too high seasoned for my taste."

"Jis' give me any of yer sarse," said Clo, "and I'll mark yer face smash wid dis ere dough, now I tells yer!"

"Don't lay a finger on me, 'cause I won't stand it," shrieked Vic; "I'se a cross old catamount, dat's what she mutters."

"Go 'long 'bout yer business," shouted Clo, shaking her rollingpin in a threatening rage, "Dis ere's de housekeeper's room, an' yer hain't no business here."

"Much business as you, I guess; yer ain't housekeeper as I knows on; yer only potwasher anyhow."

"Missus telled me to use dis room for makin' pies and cakes in till she got smoder housekeeper, an' I'se gwine ter."

"I don't keer if she did, dat don't make yer housekeeper nor more'n stolen feathers makes a jackdaw an eagle."

"Now, ladies, ladies!" pleaded 'Dolph, fearful of the extent to which the tem pest might reach if not checked in time. "Don't let us conduct ourselse dese little seasons of union by savageousness; don't, I beg."

"Den let dat old catamount leave me alone," sniffed Vic.

"Lor' bless dat gal to keep a civil tongue in her yaller head if yer want peace an' composion," said Clo.

"Dat ar's religion wid a vengeance," cried Vic; "a callin' names is pretty piety, ain't it! I jis' see what Elder Brown says to dat ar de bery next time I sees him."

"Oh, yes!" said Clo, contemptuously; "yer allers git all a 'casion to gabble to a man. How's a passon gwine to hab religion when dey's persecuted by sich a born devil; wure's dem in de scripture as war dun into de swine."

"Laws!" said Vic, with a vicious sneer, "was yer roun' wid dat drove 'bout dat time."

"I'll drove yer," cried Clo; "I'll fix yer."

But 'Dolph interposed again, and luckily Clo's nostri s detected the odor of burning piecrust, and she rushed into the kitchen to see if the girl had allowed any injury to burn.

'Dolph took that opportunity to soothe the angry Victoria, and succeeded so well that by the time Clorinda returned she looked quite amiable, only there was a broad wet spot on her cheek, and a corresponding crumple in her curls, which might have excited Clorinda's suspicions had she observed it.

Now, Miss Clorinda," said 'Dolph, when she had removed her thoughts of sharing Sally for her carelessness about the pies, and was once more tranquilly occupied with her work; "now, Miss Clorinda, jis' gimme yer 'pinion 'bout de 'fairs ob dis dwellin' which we has all noticed is more mysterioser dan is pleasant."

"I don't know what you've been snapped up like a beetle by a Shanghai rooster," said Clo; "shan't do it, no how."

"Dat's spoked at Victoria, and that artful maiden condescended to attempt to mollify her for a little.

"Now don't be cross, Clo," said she, "it's bad enough to hab conflictions above stairs widout us quarrin'."

"Dem's my sentiments," cried 'Dolph, "and I knows I'se Miss Clorinda's friend—she coincidates, if yer'll excuse the leetle bit o' dictionary."

Victoria made a grimace behind Clo's back, but said, gratifyingly:

"I se gwine to give yer dat ar blue handkercher Miss Elsie gur me, Clo," she said, "so now let's make up and be comfable."

"That handkerchief was something Clo had coveted for a long time, and the gift quite restored her good-humor.

"But's as it orter be," said 'Dolph. "Peace and harmony once more prewails, and we's here like—like—de Happy Family at Barnum's Museum," he added, finding a comparison at length, and quite unconscious of its singular appropriateness.

"I'se gwine to mend dis tablecloth," said Vic, "and I'll send to fo—or when I go upstairs I'll git yer the hankercher, Clo."

"Oh! laws," said Clo, "I'se wantin yerself—don't be a 'pendin' on nobody else."

"I'd rather yer had it," observed Vic, "she's allers becoming to yer, ain't it, Mr. 'Dolph?"

She made another effort to propitiate Clorinda by having sent Dolph into fits, but he restrained his merriment, and answered with the gravity of a judge:

Miss Clorindy overcomes whatever she puts on, but since yer wishes my honest 'pinion, I must say I tink blue's about de proper touch for it."

The peace quite restored to delight, but she worked away resolutely, only saying:

"Victy, dar's a leetle cranberry tart I jis' tuk out o' de oven's on de kitchen table—I 'spect we might as well eat it, 'cause 'taint big enough to go on de table."

"Dat's jis' it," cried 'Dolph; "to save de fair is my priv'lege."

He darted into the kitchen, bore off the tart from before Sally's envious eyes, and cleared the dish of what else he could not be regaled even with a scent of the delicacy.

"I'se jis' done now," said Clo, "so I'll rest a leetle and see how dinner. I'll jis' taste de tart to see if it's good—it kinder eases my mind like."

"In course it does," said 'Dolph, and he cut the tart into three pieces, having an idea that the last slice would revert to him in the end.

They ate the pie and talked amicably over it, which is the best possible way to take extra pieces by earnestly pressing it on his companions, who in turn insisted upon his eating it himself.

"Mebby Sally'd like a taste," he said, virtuously.

"Sally, 'deed!" cried Clo. "It's nuff fur her tor see such tings widout eatin' 'em—a lazy, good-for-nuffin' creetur."

"Den ter 'blige yer I'll dispose of it," said 'Dolph, and he did so in just three mouthfuls.

"Now what does yer mean?" cried 'Dolph.

Clo nodded her head up and down several times with great gravity and precision.

"Yes, missus," she repeated, with the firmness of a person who meant what she said, and was fully prepared to defend her opinion.

"What's come over her?" asked Vic.

"Dat's jis' it," returned Clo; "now you've hit it preact—yer might talk a week, Victy, and not cum into de pint agin."

Victoria looked at 'Dolph, and he looked at her, but, however convincing her words might have seemed to Clorinda, there was nothing to throw any light upon their minds.

"Yer's revealin' wid yer usual knowledge," said 'Dolph, softly, "but can't yer sperficate a leetle more clear."

"Me 'Dolph," said Clorinda, rolling up her eyes till only the whites were visible, "when I lives in a house de secrets ob dat house is locked in my bussome—"

"But to feller domestics," put in artful 'Dolph.

"Jis' 'mong us," said Vic.

"I know, I feels dat, and so I speak," replied Clo. "All I tink 'bout it is dat my Miss Mellen is a favorite ugr mine, 'cause she isn't—but she's my mistress. Her ways isn't my ways, dat's all I says, and I hain't reconcurred to bein' brung up so sharp roun' de corners as is her way to do."

"Tain't ter be 'spected," said 'Dolph.

"Mebby 'tis and mebby 'tain't," returned Clorinda; "I only says I sin't recustomed to it, dat's all."

"But what do yer tinks happened to her to put 'em all in sich a to-do?" questioned Victoria.

"I sin't prepared to say exactsly," replied Clo, "but I tink she's got a cross-eyes wid master and dat lubly angel, Miss Elsie. Dat's a syrup fur yer! She nebber gubs a passon orders widout even lookin' at 'em—she's too high and mighty dat ar ground sin't good 'nuff for her to walk on! Not but what missus is mighty fine woman—she steps out like a queen, and I'll yer when she's dressed dat she sin't many kin hold a candle ter her, and as fur takin' de shine off, wal, I'd jis' like to see anybody do it."

"It's all true," said 'Dolph, "as true as preachin'!"

"Mr. 'Dolph," said Clo, gravely, "don't take dem seriousnesses so lightsome on your lips."

"I won't," said 'Dolph, humbly, "I begs to 'pologize for makin' free 'bout de world a gemman 'quires some parts of speech as seems keerless, but dey don't come from de heart."

"I'se glad dat's," observed Clorinda, "bery glad, Mr. 'Dolph."

"But what do you think missus has done?" demanded Victoria.

Such a straightforward question was rather a puzzler to Clorinda, so she said with a stately air:

"More 'n I knows; 'tain't answer even to my most intemanicies—don't press it, Victy."

Victoria's big eyes began to roll wildly in their sockets; she was determined to find that Clo had for some time seen that things were going wrong, when the fact had escaped her own observation, and, for the first time in the course of their acquaintance, she felt a sort of respect for her usual foe but temporary ally.

"Does yer think dey's quarrling?" she asked.

"Wal, I hain't heern dat exactsly," said Clo, sententiously, "I allers takes it for granted there's a storm brewin'."

Vic grew more puzzled than ever, and 'Dolph was act much better off, though he tried to appear full to the brim with wisdom and sagacity.

"Yer knows the sagacity missus lost her bracelet, Mr. 'Dolph?" asked Clo.

"I does bery well indeed."

"When missus 'peared herself to shoot out at me as if I'd been a sarpint," cried Clo, viciously. "Wal, if ever I see thunder I seed it in marster's face and eyes dat minit."

Oh!" exclaimed Victoria, bundling up her work, "if you and Mr. 'Dolph has got secrets to talk over, I'll leave you to 'em."

"Who's a destryin' the harmony now?" shouted Clo. It's real sinful, Victory, to give way to temper, I tells yer."

"Oh, dat's all fine 'nuff! But I don't wish to stand in nobody's way. I'd better take my work upstairs."

"Sit still, set still, Miss Victory," urged 'Dolph. "Der's no secret. We shall have de uttermost pleasure in listenin' in making you 'quainted wid de pint in question."

Clorinda did not look altogether pleased at his eagerness to explain; she rather liked Victoria to suppose there was a secret between 'Dolph and herself; it screened like paying off old scores, and though in a friendly mood, Clorinda was a woman still.

"Splain or not, jis' as yer please," said Vic, tossing her head, viciously, "it's quite 'material to me."

But 'Dolph gave a voluble account of what his master and mistress had said and done the night the bracelet was lost, and commented the conversation beautifully, calling on Clorinda to set him right if he erred, and the points where Clo most loudly expressed her approval as being the exact words spoken were the places where 'Dolph embroidered most highly.

"Why, dar goes marster now," exclaimed Victoria, suddenly. "He's gwine out to walk."

They all rushed to the window to look, as if there had been something wonderful in the sight, and just then Sally rushed in with a cry:

"The soup's bilin' over, Clo; come—quick!"

The séance broke up in disorder, and Clo was soon engaged in pulling Sally's wool, too common an occurrence to create any surprise in the house.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE confinement of the house became so irksome to Grantley Mellen that he could support it no longer. He could not have talked even to Elsie just then, so he put on his hat and hurried out into the grounds.

Upon one point his mind was fully made up. The clue to the mystery appeared to be in his hands; he would follow it out to the end now—he would know the worst. He had strength enough left to bear another great trouble. He felt that if this woman had wrenched him he could sweep her out of his life, even as he had done that false one in year's gone by.

That thought drove him nearly mad, it recalled the recollection of that writing. Should it prove the same! If this man had again thrust himself into his life to blacken it with his treachery and his hate! Terrible words first, half uttered on Mellen's lips, his face was fairly convulsed with passion, a loathing and a hatred which this time only blood could wipe out.

Below the house the lawn and gardens led away into a grove, and towards its gloom Mellen mechanically directed his steps under the cold, gray sky. A chill wind was blowing up from the water, but he did not observe it; in the fever which consumed him the air seemed absolutely stifling, and he hurried on, increasing its excess by his rapid movements.

He was in the grove, rushing wildly on and down, with no settled purpose in view, striving only to escape those maddening thoughts which clung to him still.

The wind was shaking the few remaining leaves from the trees and blowing them about in rustling dreariness, the frosts had already touched the grass and ferns, and though the place on a bright day would still have been lovely, it looked bare and melancholy enough under that frowning sky.

"It is like my life," muttered Mellen, looking gloomily; "like my life, with an added blackness coming up beyond."

Then his mood changed; again that fierce passion swept over his face, leaving it dangerous and terrible.

"If that woman has deceived me," he cried aloud, "this time I will have no mercy! She shall taste her degradation to the very dregs; there is no depth of shame through which I will not drag her, though I ruin my own name in doing it! But it can't be! It can't be! It were death to believe it! Oh, Elizabeth, Elizabeth!"

Every tender feeling of his nature went out in that last agonizing cry. For the first time he realized all that his heart had been to him, how completely she had united herself with his life, and what a terrible blank it would become if he were forced to tear her from his heart.

He tried to check those black thoughts, to invent excuses; he was almost inclined to rush into the house, beg for her truth and promise pardon in advance. Then he called himself a weak fool for the idea, as if any excuse were possible.

"More lies, more lies! It was a test. "I will wait—I have the clue—it will all be made clear soon."

He clenched his hands with a groan that was half anguish, half rage, and hurried more swiftly on.

He came out upon a little eminence, from whence he could look down on the paths leading towards the house, though the dwelling itself was hidden by the thick growth of trees.

He saw some object creeping through the bushes, moving carefully, as if to elude the possibility of observation. He was always keen-sighted, and now but just then the thoughts in his mind made his vision still quicker and more clear.

He looked again—it was a man, running very fast and crouching among the bushes at each sound.

Without pausing for an instant's reflection he darted down the hill—as he approached the figure it disappeared. On into the thicket Mellen rushed —grasped the intruder in a strong arm that there was no shaking off, and dragged him into the light.

"Rascal!" he cried, "what are you doing here? Answer me, or I'll shake you to pieces!"

The man struggled violently, but Mellen was like a giant in his passion, and swung him to and fro as if he had been a child.

"Let me alone!" cried the man. "I ain't a doing no harm!"

"What you prowling about my house for, then? Do you know that I am master here? I shall take you indoors, and keep you till I can send for a constable. Take care—no resistance, or I'll brain you on the spot."

I wasn't prowling round," pleaded the man, gasping for breath in Mellen's strong grasp; "I thought these woods was public property."

"Then you shall be taught. But it's a lie! You had some errand here—speak out, or by the Lord I'll kill you!"

"Don't—don't! You're choking me!" groaned the wretch.

"Then speak! What are you doing here—who do you want to see?"

"Just let go, and I'll tell you," pleaded his prisoner. "I can't speak while you're throttling me."

Mellen loosened his grasp on the man's throat, but still held him fast. His hold had been a fearful one—the man was actually breathless—Mellen had almost strangled him in his fierceness.

"Will you speak now?" he demanded, with a terrible menace in his voice.

The man tried to breathe more freely; but, though shaking with fear, he answered sullenly:

"I hain't got nothin' to tell; I was going to the village and took a short cut through here."

Mellen caught him again by the throat.

"Tell me another lie," he hissed, "and I'll choke the breath out of your body."

The man could both see and feel that he was in horrible earnest; he might easily have opposed himself to the power of an insane man—and for the moment Mellen was little better.

"Let me go, I say—let me go!" cried the man, struggling more vigorously; but Mellen only clung to him more tightly, and down upon the ground they fell in that struggle.

Mellen had his knee on the fellow's breast and called out:

"Now, will you speak?"

"Yes, failured the man, as well as he was able. "Just let me up—I'll tell you."

Mellen rose, and pulled him violently on his feet; as he did so he perceived a note lying on the ground which had fallen from the man's pocket during their struggle. He loosed his hold of the fellow, and stooped for the letter; the man took advantage of his freedom, darted away like an arrow, and was out of sight before Mellen could recover himself.

"No matter," he muttered, "he'll think twice before he comes again—I have the letter."

The envelope bore no address—it was sealed, but he tore it open without a moment's hesitation. Even as he unfolded the sheet his hand faltered—in the very height of his rage he could not think of the woe its contents might bring to his heart without a sharp pang.

He opened the epistle and glanced at the writing—it was the same peculiar hand he had seen at the pawnbroker's.

"It is his," he exclaimed. "Oh, this time I shall have revenge."

He read the letter—read it slowly through, though every word seemed to burn and sear his very eyeballs—standing there motionless, unable, at first, to take in the full extent of his crushing anguish.

These were the contents of the letter:

"I expected you to-day—you were wrong not to come. I know it is difficult for you to elude the vigilance of your Cerberus, but this matter will admit of no delay. I have information that the stocks are disposed of—look sharp that the broker is not playing a double game.

"The letters are ready—bring the money, and I pass out of your life for ever—since you will have it so. Let it rest there. If I am hated by those I love, be it so; hate does not kill, and love cannot be expected to last for ever, with men or women. I must have the money. I can submit to no further delay. If I do not hear from you to-morrow I shall come to the house in the night—so be prepared."

There was no signature—it needed none. Mellen knew only too well who the writer was, knew it as thoroughly as he did the name of the woman for whom it was intended.

For a full half hour Grantley Mellen was a madman; it was a mercy that, during his paroxysm, he did not rush into the house and murder the woman who had so wronged him. The fever and the insanity passed at length; he lay upon the ground, staring up at the cold sky, the letter still clutched in one hand, the other dug deeply into the earth, in a wild conflict of passion that shook him to the soul. He raised himself and looked about; it seemed as if he had been suffering in a mad dream—he glanced down at the letter—that brought conviction back.

He sat there for a long time revolving vague plans in his mind, and deciding upon the course he would pursue.

"Meet craft with craft," he muttered; "so I will."

He read the letter again.

"If he does not hear from her he will come to-morrow night—he will get no message—let him come!"

There was a horrible emphasis in his voice which none could have mistaken. He rose from the ground, arranged his dress, and walked towards the house.

"Not a sign, not a word which can betray," he said aloud. "I will meet her with a duplicity equal to her own—wait—a little longer—only a little longer."

He walked towards the house, and again Victoria called out to her companions:

"Here comes marster as fast as fast can be."

But Clorinda's thoughts were now centred upon her dinner, and she had no time even for gossip.

"Get away from dat window and go 'bout yer work," cried the dark spinster, austerely; "what hev yer got to do wid de marster's outgoin's or incomin's? Beat dese eggs into a foam rite off, for I'se in a hurry. Mr. 'Dolph puts one back so."

Victoria cast one more glance through the window, for the wild agony on her master's face rather alarmed her. But Clorinda called out in a voice so shrill that it was not to be disregarded, and she was constrained to undertake the task assigned her without more delay.

THE OPERA IN 1680.—An idea of the splendor of ancient operas may be conceived from the mise en scène of "Berenice," first brought out on the stage at Padua in 1680. It had three choruses. The first consisted of 100 girls, the second of 100 soldiers, the third of 100 knights on horseback. In the triumphal cortége were 40 huntsmen with horns, 60 trumpeters on foot, six tambours, together with 24 other musicians, a great number of flagbearers, pages, huntsmen, grooms, etc.; two lions with Turkish and two elephants with Moorish grooms. Berenice's triumphal car was drawn by six white horses; six other carriages, for generals, were drawn by four horses each; six others, for the booty and the prisoners by twelve. The transformation scenes represented a forest, in which were being hunted boars, deer and bears; an endless plain, with triumphal arches; Berenice's rooms; the royal dining-saloon; a picture gallery; and the royal stables, with 100 living horses. Towards the end a great golden globe appeared from the sky, which opened of itself, and threw out eight other blue globes, upon which sat Virtue, Generosity, Fortitude, Heroic Love, Victory, Courage, Honor, and Immortality, floating in mid-air, and singing a chorus!

CURRANTS.—Dried currants of commerce, as they are miscalled, are in reality a grape, and free from stones or pits; they come from the Isthmus of Corinth and several places in the Indian Archipelago. A small Spanish currant is sometimes sold in their stead. It is the island of Zante which furnishes the largest amount of these currants, and their cultivation is materially lessening, as the jealousy of the Ottomans does not allow large vessels to enter the Gulf for their purchase. These currants grow on vines like grapes, the leaves are somewhat the same figure and the grapes similar; they are gathered in August and dried on the ground; when kegged they are trodden down closely with the feet. Zante island produces enough to load five or six large vessels; Cephalonia, three or four; and other islands, one.

WE have heard much of the power of a woman's eye, but the eyelids are still more powerful; they can wink down a reputation.

THE OLD BEGGAR.

BY ERNEST TREVOR.

I.

THERE was an old and crippled man
  Who sat a begging, where
It was my wont each morn to pass
  In weather foul or fair.
He seemed so steeped in woe and want,
  I thought, as I passed by,
That it would be a happy thing
  For such a man to die!
For in the scorching sun or rain,
  When wintry blasts are keen,
In scanty garb and tattered boots
  This wretched man was seen.
So that whene'er I passed the spot
  And saw this beggar nigh,
I inly said, "A happy thing
  For such a man to die!"

II.

It was upon the Sabbath morn
  When church bells cheerly ring,
To summon all, both old and young,
  To praise our Heavenly King,
That as with contrite steps and sad
  To prayer I slowly trod,
This poor old man was also bent
  Churchward to praise his God.
But what a change! his face was bright
  And he was cleaner dressed;
His step had thankful life in it—
  His spirit seemed at rest.
And 'twas my chance that morn to sit
  Near to him in the aisle;
And now and then I saw his face,
  And caught his kindling smile.
His voice was full of thankfulness,
  Praise came with every breath,
And in his look I saw the hope
  That triumphs over death.
And thus rebuked, with wiser thought
  I said, half audibly,
"Great Father! what a happy thing
  For such a man to die!"

The Fate of Duke Alberto.

SOME two centuries ago there lived in Milan, in Italy, a certain Duke Alberto. His palace was in the city, almost within the shadow of the far-famed cathedral, while his enormous possessions covered leagues of land in every direction. In person he was remarkably handsome, a giant in strength; in mind he was cunning, shrewd, sufficiently well educated for his social position; in morals he was unscrupulous, wicked and revengeful. He had immured his wife in one of his country castles, in order to have her out of the way of his daring and licentious pleasures. In fact, it was rumored throughout the city that he had murdered her; but, owing to his wealth and power, the authorities never instituted an investigation. His days and nights were passed in revelling with lewd women and parasite courtiers. His amours seemed to be the turning point of his existence, the whole end and aim of his ambition.

Such, in brief, was the character of the duke. With his tenants he was careless and liberal, caring but little about the amount of his income, provided it was sufficient to enable him to support and gratify his three great passions of wine, women and play. His principal associate and companion was one Guido Tomaselli, a libertine and spendthrift of the first water. Whenever the duke proposed an adventure, Tomaselli was ever ready to assist and co-operate with him. If a lady was to be abducted, a nunnery broken into, or a castle sacked, he was ever willing to obey the behests of his master. In age he was about fifty years, while the duke scarcely numbered thirty. He was wealthy and powerful, and was even more dreaded than Alberto. The gray hairs that plentifully sprinkled his hair and beard brought with them no wisdom—his long experience brought with it no discretion. Perhaps it was to his fatal influence that the duke ascended the ladder of crime and wickedness. He had been married, but his wife had long been dead, and from the moment of her death he abandoned himself to the world, the flesh and the devil.

Such are the two principal personages with whom we have to deal in the following narrative. A more charming pair of Don Juans cannot be found in all history.

Returning home late one night they had to pass the cathedral. It was lighted, and from its vast depths poured forth the musical volumes of a requiem mass.

"By my soul, Guido," said the duke, "this is strange! What noble lord or lady has departed this life and now invokes the aid of the church in behalf of the repose of his or her soul? Corpo di bacco! Let us enter. We may, perchance, light upon some fair vestal offering up her vows for the defunct, and in such case the hour and circumstances are propitious for another journey to my walled chateau at Aventino."

The pliant Tomaselli assented, and they entered the cathedral. The church was draped in black, the priests were livid beneath the yellow light of the sacred candles, and the organ filled every aisle and nave with its melodious notes. High up near the altar was a splendid catafalque, richly draped with heavy black. A few mourners knelt beside it, while here and there throughout the vast building, and dimly visible in the semi-darkness, were a few of the devout and faithful. The duke and Guido, awestruck at the scene, pressed forward towards the altar, when the former, in a whisper, inquired of a verger in attendance as to the name of the deceased in whose behalf these solemn rites were administered. In a ghostly voice, and with a pallid face and demoniac expression, he was answered:

"'Tis for the soul of the wicked Duke Alberto, of Milan."

With an expression of horror the duke gazed upon the catafalque, and there, reposing upon it, with all the gilded trappings of princely rank, he beheld himself. With a cry of dismay he sank senseless upon the pavement. Guido raised him and guided him to the outer air—both conscious-stricken at the terrible ceremonial in which they had been participants. When they regained their senses they found themselves seated upon the stone steps of the entrance, and the gray dawn beginning to develope itself in the far East.

Both agreed in the same story, although the cathedral was closed, its lights had fled, and its organ was silent. How and when the spectral procession had passed out without their notice seemed past their comprehension. Moodily and gloomily they entered the ducal palace.

Alberto looked narrowly at his companion, who was dejected and stupified.

"Wine, my dear fellow, will dispel these illusions of the brain," exclaimed he, as he filled a pair of goblets to the brim with the ruddy liquor. They quaffed and quaffed until the morning sun entered the apartment with its golden effulgence. "And now to bed for a few hours, and to-night, my good guide, with your assistance, I shall clasp in these arms the beautiful Donna Isabella, the fairest and loveliest flower in all Italy. She will return from vespers shortly after dark, and generally unattended. You shall disguise yourself as a coachman, and drive me to the corner opposite the great square, around which she must necessarily pass in order to reach her residence."

Guido Tomaselli shuddered.

"Don't say that you decline to participate in the enterprise," said the duke. "It is full of love and danger, two condiments that give a spice to every adventure of the heart. Besides, remember that I acted as your coachman in your last little affair, besides acting as your second in your duel with the lady's brother."

"It is true, Alberto," said Guido, "but would to God these adventures as you call them were abandoned. My nerves have not yet recovered from that horrible dream of last night. However, more wine and then let us to bed."

Darkness was just beginning to cover the city with its sable pall on that quiet, holy Sabbath evening when a carriage hastily emerged from the ducal palace, and took the direction indicated by Alberto. Scarcely half an hour had elapsed when a female figure dressed in black was seen slowly wending her way from the cathedral. The duke stepped quickly upon the pavement, seized her as she passed, and the horses bounded on a full gallop in the direction of Aventino. The Donna Isabella was a captive, and Tomaselli was the coachman.

As soon as Guido reached the castle with the duke and lady, he immediately returned to the city, delivered the carriage to an attendant in waiting, and forthwith proceeded in the direction of the residence of his only daughter, Lucia, a young and lovely girl of scarcely seventeen summers. The existence of this child he had always kept a profound secret for two reasons. One was that he feared the duke and his rapacious desires, and the other was his sense of duty in preserving her from the contamination of the outer world, among whose wicked ones he modestly acknowledged himself chief. In her society he passed many pure and happy hours, gazing with parental pride upon the golden innocence that Providence had entrusted to his keeping.

Bold and bad as this man was, he nevertheless had a corner in his heart unspotted by crime, but that corner was alone reserved for his child. All others he grasped in his net as the fowler does his prey. As he passed beneath the shadow of the great cathedral, he fancied he heard again the solemn notes of its mighty organ pealing forth a requiem mass. This time he seemed to see his own corpse lying in state upon a costly bier. Shuddering at the figures that his imagination had conjured up, he entered the dwelling of his daughter.

But no lithesome step was heard coming to meet him, no merry voice uttering a silvery welcome as of yore. A dread misgiving overcame him, and he sank upon the pavement at the base of the stairs leading to his child's apartments. Again did the organ waft its spectral music across the square. Phantoms, livid and deathly, jeeringly pointed their skeleton fingers and glared from their cavernous eyes at the wretch as he lay prostrate. They thundered in his ears:

"Thou art the man! Await thy doom, for vengeance is sure, saith the Lord."

In this condition he was found by one of his daughter's servants, who gave the alarm and procured the necessary assistance to remove him to his couch. Bewildered and crazed, he groaned in spirit, and it was some time before he could be made to understand that Lucia had not returned from vespers, and that already her attendants had scoured the city, in different directions, hoping to obtain some clue to her whereabouts, but all had returned without success.

"It is no use," he exclaimed, "I know where she is, and miserable man that I am, I am her destroyer."

In his then condition he was obliged to keep his bed for the following day, for his mind was in a state of frenzy, bordering on absolute madness. Towards evening he recovered himself somewhat and ordered a coach and horses to bear him to the castle of Aventino. We will now return to the duke and the poor girl whom he had abducted and imprisoned.

He had long watched her, knowing only that her name was said to be Isabella, hoping for some favorable opportunity of seizing her and bearing her to his fastness in the mountains, where he could defy an army in case of siege or assault. Nor did he dream for a moment that she was the daughter of his friend Guido. Had he known that fact it might have stayed his impious hand, but as it was the deed was done. After thrusting her into his carriage, he threatened her with instant death if she cried out or made the least resistance. Overcome by fright and terror she fainted away, and it was in this state of insensibility that she at length reached Alberto's castle. When she recovered she found herself in a gorgeous apartment, with a young and handsome cavalier gazing at her with looks of passion and admiration.

"O God!" she exclaimed, "where am I? Noble sir, release me, and heaven will smile upon you. I ask this boon on bended knees."

"Heaven, it appears, has smiled upon me this very night, fair lady," said the duke, "in vouchsafing to my tender care and custody so young and beautiful a flower as yourself. Believe me that I love—aye, have longed loved you—and that I shall devote the balance of my life in endeavoring to make you happy."

Her great grief at length gave way to a flood of tears, when Alberto perceiving her condition left her, promising to return as soon as time had assuaged her sorrow. She found herself in a man's apartment. From the window she could perceive that the castle was situated upon the top of a lofty mountain, and only accessible by a bridle pathway. The winds swept through the dark forest with a melancholy sound, bearing to her ears the presaging notes of death—for to die she was determined, rather than be dishonored by a villain. She examined the room and found in one of the closets attached thereto a stiletto. This she concealed in her bosom, with a feeling of security such as the fierce pride of an Italian nature only can bestow. Late in the afternoon Alberto again made her a visit, but finding her obstinate, he again left, promising to see her on the following morning. He trusted that time and patience would work a change in her obduracy.

She had now had ample time for reflection as to the best mode of escape. The bolts and bars she could not overcome, and she was ignorant of the intricacies of the castle. Still she did not despair. Hope at length pointed out a gleam of light. If she could disguise herself in one of the duke's costumes—of which there were many in the room—she might pass the sentries after nightfall without notice. Once having reached the bridlepath she would be safe. About sunset she hastened to complete her preparations. It was about this hour that an attendant opened the door to bring her an evening repast, and she determined to sacrifice his life if necessary with her dagger, in order to secure her escape. At length steps were heard approaching, the door opened and the attendant entered. She had previously lowered the heavy damask curtains by the windows, so that a quiet gloom or semi-darkness pervaded the apartment.

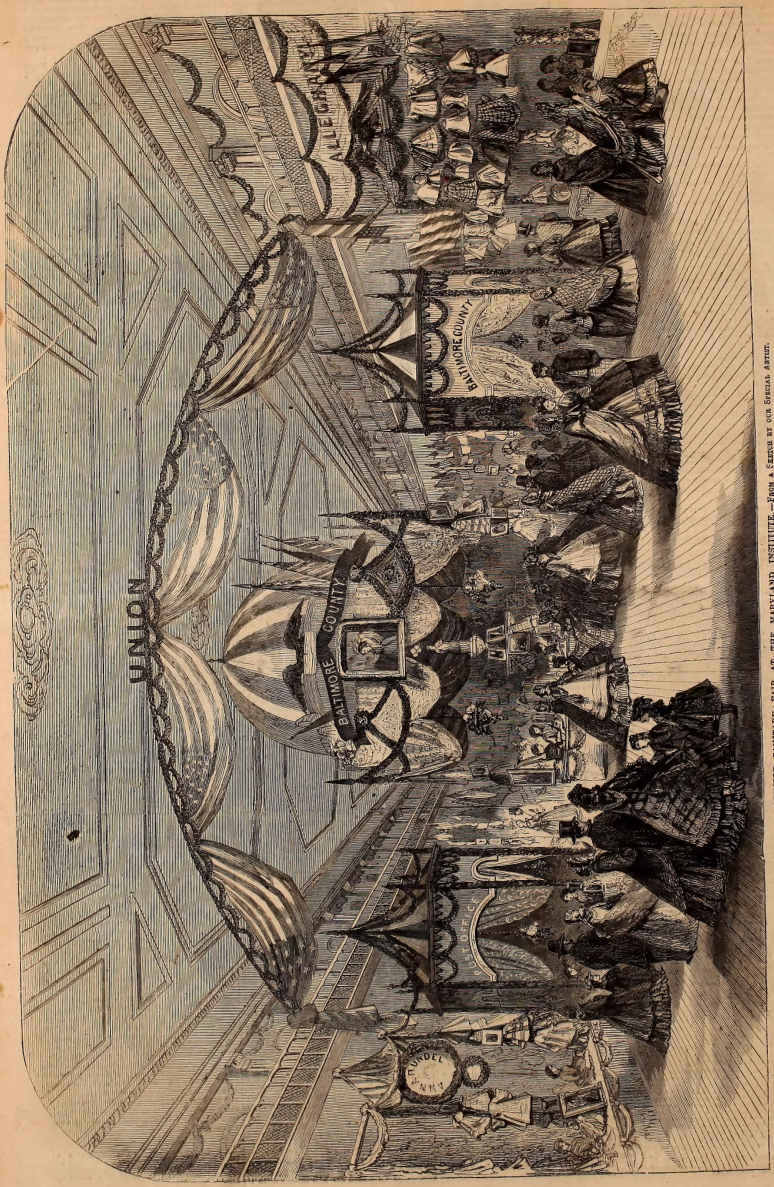
"My lord duke," said the servant, "I did not expect to see you here. I have brought the evening meal for the lady, according to your instructions."

"'Tis well," said the mock duke. "She is now reposing and must not be disturbed. Remain here until I return."

Saying which Lucy boldly gained the hall. Proceeding through various gloomy corridors, she at length reached one of the ramparts, where she paused a moment to survey the ground. The portcullis was lowered, and several persons attached to the duke were seen passing to and fro. Night was rapidly setting in, and now was the moment or never to carry her plans into execution. She reached the bridge without interruption, and in passing it she hummed a lively air from one of the operas in fashion at that day. And now she is on the bridlepath, and in half an hour more she will be in safety. She had nearly reached the bottom of the hill, when a tall, armed figure sprang out of the bushes and plunged his dagger to her heart. She fell and died without a groan.

"Thus perish," said the figure, "thou wretch and miscreant. Little didst thou know that it was Guido's child thou didst abduct."

Saying this he pulled the body into the forest and proceeded on his way to the castle to enforce, if need be, a return of his daughter.

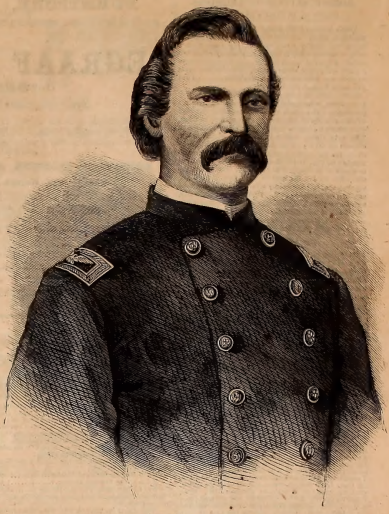


As he was well known to all of the duke's retainers, he was gladly welcomed by them. To avert suspicion, he carefully asked where Alberto was? Some said he had not long before descended the mountain, while another averred that he had just passed him in the grand hall leading to his apartment. Guido knew well the direction to take, but first stepped upon the ramparts to cool his fevered brow. At this instant, to his great horror and astonishment, he perceived the duke advancing towards him.

"Ha! Guido, my pretty bird has flown; and that, too, within an hour," said he. "Just think of it; the jade donned one of my costumes and passed my guards without detection. But I will have her yet, for I have out parties to scour the mountain."

"Scoundrel! She is my daughter, and I am, unwittingly, her murderer!" exclaimed Guido. "The issue is now between you and me, and one or both must fall."

So saying he made a furious onslaught upon the duke, who, perceiving that he had to deal with a madman, began to call for assistance, at the same time defending himself with his sword. As this rencontre took place at a remote part of the castle, his cries were not heard. At length Guido closed with him and pressed him to the edge of the parapet, which overhung a depth of nearly five hundred feet. The bottom and sides of this abyss were jagged rocks, on which no one could fall and live. And now the death-struggle waxes furious. The parapet is reached; Guido, with the strength of a giant, presses Alberto over. 'Tis done! With a dull, heavy sound both are plunged into the awful darkness.



AN Irishman describes metaphysics as follows: "Two men are talking together, and one of them is trying to explain something he don't know anything about, and the other can't understand him."

THE SANITARY FAIR AT BALTIMORE.

THE great success of the Sanitary Fairs in New ... and Brooklyn is stimulating other cities to renewed ... rtions. We give in the issue of this week a sketch of the Fair at the Maryland Institute, Baltimore, made on the spot by one of our Special Artists. It was inaugurated on the 18th of April by President Lincoln, who went thither, accompanied by Speaker Colfax and Senator Wilson. The contribution of all kinds are very fine and attractive; and such is the change of feeling in Baltimore that the Fair cannot fail to command great success. As the Sanitary Commission extends its favors to all the suffering of either army, no consideration of politics should keep any one of charitable feelings away. In connection with this we give a view from Patterson's park on Loudenschlager's hill, which will be readily recognised and admired by those who visit the City of Monuments to attend the great Sanitary Fair.

RECENT BATTLES IN LOUISIANA.

Battle of Wilson's Plantation.

Gen. Banks took camp at Natchitoches on the 6th of April. On the following morning at daybreak the cavalry again started, and came upon a body of mounted rebels before they had marched two miles. Fighting began at once, and the enemy were rapidly driven before our troops. This running style of fight was kept up for 14 miles until they had got two miles beyond Pleasant Hill.

Here a force of 2,500 rebel cavalry, commanded by Gen. Green, were found strongly posted on Wilson's plantation. The rebels were deployed along the edge of a dense strip of woods, with an open field in front, over which we had to charge in order to reach them. The only Union soldiers that had advanced far enough to take part in the fight, which was inevitable, was the cavalry brigade of Lee's corps, commanded by Col. Harai Robinson. As he had either to attack or be attacked, he decided to take the initiative, and he led his men in with such a dash and vigor that at last the enemy was completely whipped and driven from the field. This engagement lasted two hours and a half, and our losses amount to about 40 killed and wounded, the enemy's being at least as many. Col. Robinson pursued the retreating rebels as far as Bayou du Paul.

Battle of Mansfield.

On Friday a portion of Gen. Banks's forces was attacked by a superior force of the enemy, four miles from the town of Mansfield. Gen. Lee, with 5,000 cavalry, was cautiously advancing, when the rebels suddenly assailed his front in strong force, after considerable sharp skirmishing was indulged in. Finding the enemy were pressing him heavily, Gen. Lee sent for a brigade of infantry to reinforce him. A brigade of infantry of the best war material—tried veterans from the 13th army corps—were at once sent forward. The rebels fought vigorously and with desperation for several hours, driving back our troops with great loss, flanking both wings of our army, until a retreat was inevitable, if the enemy continued assaulting our right and front.

Our artillery, consisting of Nims's celebrated Massachusetts battery, six guns, Rawles's 5th Regular battery, 1st Indiana, and Chicago Mercantile Battery, together with two mountain howitzers, barked loud, long and furiously against the invading hosts; but notwithstanding the vast numbers of these savage messengers of death which mowed down the rebel lines, the enemy continued to advance boldly, evincing a desperate determination to conquer or perish in the attempt. After the enemy had inflicted a most terrible blow upon the gallant little band who nobly opposed their fearful progress, a retreat was ordered. The retreating force finding the road blocked up by trains got into confusion. A panic ensued, without a precedent since Bull run. The enemy pushed on in pursuit, capturing 18 guns, all Gen. Lee's wagon train, and driving the panic stricken mass for 10 miles to Pleasant Hill. Here Franklin opened his line-of-battle, and allowed them to pass. The 13th and 19th army corps then repulsed the enemy. Gen. Ransom reports the loss at 1,475 killed, wounded and missing.

The guns were not lost, however, without heavy cost to the enemy. The charges of grape swept them down fearfully, and amongst them the rebel Gen. Mouton fell, pierced by four balls.

Battle of Pleasant Hill.

On Saturday morning all Gen. Banks's forces were at Pleasant hill, and the rebels came on, cavalry in front.

The battlefield of Pleasant hill is a large open field, which had once been cultivated, but is now overgrown with weeds and bushes. The slightly elevated centre of the field, from which the name Pleasant hill is taken, is nothing more than a long mound, hardly worthy the name of hill. A semicircular belt of timber runs around the field on the Shreveport side. Gen. Emory formed his line of battle on the side facing these woods, Gen. McMillan's brigade being posted on the right, Gen. Dwight's on the centre, and Col. Benedict's on the left. Taylor's battery, L, 1st regulars, had four guns in rear of the left wing, on the left of the Shreveport road, and two on the road in rear of Gen. Dwight's line. Hibberd's Vermont battery was on the right.

In the rear of Emory were Gen. Smith's tried troops, formed in two lines of battle, 50 yards apart. The 13th corps was in reserve in the rear, under Gen. Cameron, Gen. Ransom having been wounded the day before. Gen. Smith was Commander-in-Chief of the two lines back of the crest, while Gen. Mower was the immediate commander of the men. The commander of the right brigade in Gen. Smith's first line was Col. Lynch; the left brigade was Col. Shaw's. The second line also consisted of two brigades. Crawford's 3d Indiana battery was posted on the right of the 89th Indiana infantry, and the 9th Indiana battery on the right of the line of battle. The Missouri Iron Sun battery, and others whose names and numbers we could not ascertain, were also in this section of the battle.

The skirmishing was kept up with considerable vigor until about five o'clock in the afternoon, when the rebels had completed their arrangements for the attack. At about this hour Gen. Emory's skirmish line was driven in on the right by the rebels, who appeared in large force, coming through the timber above mentioned. They soon reached the open ground and moved on to the attack in three lines of battle. Our batteries and infantry opened with terrible effect, doing great slaughter with grape and canister, while the enemy's artillery, being in the woods and in bad position, did scarcely any damage.

Col. Benedict's brigade on the left was first engaged, soon followed by Dwight's and McMillan's. The fighting was terrific; old soldiers say it never was surpassed for desperation. Notwithstanding the terrible havoc in their ranks, the enemy pressed fiercely on, slowly pushing the men of the 19th corps back up the hill, but not breaking their line of battle. A sudden and bold dash of the rebels on the right gave them possession of Taylor's battery, and forced our line still further back.

Now came the grand coup de main. The 19th, on arriving at the top of the hill, suddenly filed off over the hill, and passed through the lines of Gen. Smith. We must here mention that the rebels were now in but two lines of battle, the first having been almost annihilated by Gen. Emory, what remained being forced back into the second line. But these two lines came on exultant and sure of victory.

The first passed over the knoll, and all heedless of the long line of cannons and crouching forms of as brave men as ever trod mother earth, pressed on. The second line appeared on the crest, and the death signal was sounded. Words cannot describe the awful effect of this discharge; 7,000 rifles and several batteries of artillery, each gun loaded to the muzzle with grape and canister, were fired simultaneously, and the whole centre of the rebel line was crushed down as a field of ripe wheat through which a tornado had passed. It is estimated that 1,000 men were hurried into eternity or frightfully mangled by this one discharge.

No time was given them to recover their good order, but Gen. Smith ordered a charge, and his men dashed rapidly forward, the boys of the 19th joining in. The rebels fought boldly and desperately back to the timber, on reaching which a large portion broke and fled, fully 2,000 throwing aside their arms. In this charge Taylor's battery was retaken, as were also two of the guns of Nims's battery, the Parrott gun taken from us at Carrion Crow last fall, and one or two others belonging to the rebels, one of which was considerably shattered, besides 700 prisoners. A pursuit and desultory fight was kept up for three miles, when our men returned to the field of battle.

AMERICAN CARD COMPANY'S

NEW UNION PLAYING CARDS.

National Emblems.

Ace of Eagles.

The suits are Eagles, Shields, Stars and Flags. Colonel in place of King; Goddess of Liberty for Queen; Major for Jack.

The Union Playing Cards are the first and only genuine American Cards ever produced, and as they are entered according to Act of Congress, they can be manufactured only by the American Card Company.

These Cards are rapidly taking the place of Cards bearing Foreign emblems. The demand for them is unprecedented in the Card Trade, and they will soon become the Leading Card in the American market.

In playing with these Cards, they are to be called by the names the emblems represent, and as the emblems are as familiar as household words everywhere among the people of the American Republic, they can be used as readily the first occasion as Cards bearing Foreign emblems.

The Union Cards are the most pleasing and attractive Card ever made. They are produced in the highest style of the art, and each pack is put up in an elegant Card Case, suitable to keep them in when not in use, and then in handsome dozen boxes for the trade.

Two Sample Packs, in Card Cases, sent, postpaid, on receipt of $1. Address

Who Makes the Best

ARTIFICIAL LEGS?

The following correspondence will explain itself:

Cincinnati, March 6, 1864.

E. Guenther Jr., Esq., Peru, La Salle Co., Ill.

Dear Sir—I am in want of an artificial leg, but do not know what kind to get, and have decided to write to several parties wearing different legs, and get their advice, as I have not the means to experiment myself. Learning that you have worn a "Corrugated Metallic Leg" since last August, I take the liberty of asking for your opinion of its merits, and also for your experience with other kinds. Although an entire stranger, yet I feel that you will be willing to oblige a fellow sufferer,

James E. Painter.

Reply:

Peru, La Salle Co., April 11, 1864.

Mr. Painter, Cincinnati, O.

Dear Sir—Yours of March 16th, just received, and contents noted. You say you want my opinion on the corrugated brass leg. In reply, would say:

1st. That if you get such a leg as J. W. Weston, 491 Broadway, New York, sent me, you will get a good, substantial leg.

2d. As you ask my opinion in a candid way, I will answer you candidly. If you get a leg made out of wood, you may be fitted for say at least a year; in that time your stump will get thinner a good deal, and you will have to pad the socket (the place where the stump goes in). In my experience with wooden legs, I have found this to be a great inconvenience. In the next place, the joints in a wooden leg are not made strong enough, for this reason: every time you step upon an uneven surface, it naturally sprains the ankle-joint, which, after a week or so, becomes loose, and is easily broken. In the metallic leg, this is done away with altogether, by a stout rubber that acts like a joint and every time you step upon an uneven surface, yields like your natural foot. You will see that the metallic leg is altogether superior to a wooden one, and costs only one-half what a wooden one costs. Another reason is, that the mechanism in the metallic leg is very simple, where in a wooden leg it is so complicated that if anything gives out you will have to send it (the wooden one) back to the manufacturer's, and they will charge you a good round sum for the fixing of it. You will hardly believe it when I tell you, that when, after six months' wearing of my wooden limb, the hinges broke at the ankle, and I sent it up to the manufactory to get new hinges, they charged me $15 a piece or $30 for two hinges. I, for one, advise you to get a metallic leg for cheapness, lightness and durability.

If you should want any more information in regard to this subject, write me, and I will answer right away. Hoping you may be suited at less than it cost me, for I have paid out over $500 for limbs,

I remain yours,

E. Guenther, Jr.

Advantages the Metallic Leg has over all others:

1st. A fit guaranteed in all cases, as it is self-adjusting.

2d. No need of coming to New York to be fitted, thereby saving time and expense.

3d. Being made of metal, with a rubber ankle, it does not get out of order.

4th. It makes no noise, is lighter, cheaper, and more durable than any wooden leg can be. Sent by express to any part of the country.

Offer.

I have such implicit confidence in my Improved Metallic Leg, that I will give any one the privilege of returning it if they are not satisfied, after six months trial; and I will refund the money, less $25. Price from $75 to $100.

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS

A BROKEN DOWN SYSTEM.—There is a disease to which the doctors give many names but which few of them understand. It is simply weakness—breaking down of the vital forces. Whatever its causes (and they are innumerable), its symptoms are in the main the same. Among the most prominent are extreme lassitude, loss of appetite, loss of flesh and great mental depression. Indigestion and a stomach foul or slim frequently accompanies or is the distressing state of body and of mind. The common remark is that the person in such a condition is, that they are consumptive. Now, what these unfortunates really want is vigor—vital energy, and as certainly as dawn succeeds darkness they can recuperate their powers and regain perfect health by resorting to HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS. In no case does the Invigorating Tonic is required in such cases as that the evening dame of an oppy lamp requires to be revived with a new supply of oil. Feeble dy pare and innocuous, certainly nothing but the most genial vegetable extracts, and combining the three great powers of a stomachic, an alterative and a tonic, HOSTETTER'S BITTERS are available to all constitutions, and are applicable to the diseases and disabilities of the female sex as to those of man.
Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

Gray's Patent Molded Collars

Have now been before the public for nearly a year. They are universally pronounced the neatest and best fitting collars extant.
The button-hole prevents a perfect curve, free from the angles noticed in all other collars.
The curved seams so puckery on the inside of the turn-down collar—they are AS SMOOTH INSIDE AS OUTSIDE—and therefore perfectly free and easy to the neck.
The Gentle collar has a smooth and evenly finished edge on BOTH SIDES.
These Collars are not simply flat pieces of paper cut in the form of a collar, but are MOLDED AND SHAPED TO FIT THE NECK.
They are made in "Novelty" (or turn-down style), in every half size from 12 to 17 inches, and 12 "Eureka" (or Gentle), from 13 to 17 inches and packed in neat solid boxes of one dozen each, containing 100 each; also in smaller ones of 10 each—the latter a very convenient size for Travelers, Army and Navy Officers.
Every GRAY COLLAR is stamped
"Gray's Patent Molded Collar."
Sold by all dealers in Men's Furnishing Goods. The Trade supplied by GOLDEN BITTERS!

We risk nothing when we term them a valuable preparation, for they are one of the few articles of the present day with which we can do so, and be honest and able to satisfy any person or persons who will call on us that the celebrated "GOLDEN BITTERS" are a genuine bona fide Agglenic article. It is on behalf of the proprietors that the virtues of the article be tested before condemning. A decision of their merits by any one who has tried them, is worth a million of purchased bogus testimonials.

For Creating a Healthy Appetite

they are invaluable, and are unequalled as a tonic. They are mild in their action, and operate by giving vigor and strength to the system, and the change they produce is the solids, but through the medium of the living principle.

They are Purely Vegetable, being composed of Gentian Root, Calamus, Sassafras and many other medicinal herbs of the Vegetable world, all preserved in Jamaica Rum.

As a Beverage,

they are the most wholesome, invigorating and palatable stimulant ever offered to the public. FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 451—VOL. XVIII.] NEW YORK, MAY 21, 1864. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

The War—The Beginning of the End.

THE results which have attended the opening of the grand campaign in Virginia indicate that our anticipations of last week are in rapid course of fulfilment. East and West, in Virginia and in Georgia, the armies and the combinations of Gen. Grant are moving with irresistible force upon the last remaining armies and strongholds of the rebellion.

The defeat of Lee and the capture of Richmond, or the overthrow of Joe Johnson and the capture of Atlanta, will be fatal to Jeff Davis and his Confederacy. In striking at Richmond we strike at the head of the rebellion, and in striking into Atlanta we reach the heart of it. The moral effect of the loss of Richmond among the armies and the people of the rebellious States must inevitably, we think, precipitate the final demoralization of their Confederate Utopia and bring it to a speedy dissolution. Their inflated financial bubble collapses at once, and with the military barriers of the James river broken down, the whole intervening country to Georgia is laid open to our victorious army of the Potomac. There will be no place of refuge for Davis and his Cabinet and Congress, where they can feel secure to the end of the summer, and no protecting line of defences which cannot easily be turned. In a word, ejected from Richmond and Virginia, Davis, his governmental establishment, his armies and his exhausted people, are all thrown into confusion and are all adrift. Thus the overthrow of Lee's army and the fall of Richmond will, even though Gen. Sherman were standing still meantime, be speedily fatal to the rebel cause.

On the other hand, if Gen. Grant's armies in Virginia were to do nothing more than to hold at bay the rebel forces enclosed within his converging lines, while Gen. Sherman's columns in the West are moving upon Atlanta, the rebel capital itself, and the States of Virginia and North Carolina, would in a very short time become untenable to the enemy, in being cut off from his supplies of subsistence, which are now mainly furnished from the last year's Indian corn crops of Georgia and Alabama and from the cattle of Florida. What possible contingency, then, can prevent the general dissolution of the so-called Southern Confederacy, when the Union armies, moving upon both Richmond and Atlanta, are too powerful to be sucessfully resisted or evaded?

We are writing in advance of any reported positive Union victory in Virginia, beyond the occupation of last week's battlefield of the Wilderness and the capture of Petersburg. We accept these great initial advantages, however, as clearly determining the final issue of the campaign. We believe that Lee has so far exhausted his strength in his desperate efforts to break the lines of Gen. Meade, that his only alternative is a hasty retreat to Richmond; and that should he reach the city without further interruption, his next step must be to abandon it, in order to recover his vital communications with the South. The campaign above and below Richmond opens auspiciously; all the advantages of the situation are with us, while the disadvantages entailed upon the enemy by three years of exhausted war are tenfold greater than in any previous campaign. The same contrast will apply with equal force to the campaign in Georgia. Richmond and Atlanta will surely be gained, and with the dispersion of the rebel armies defending these two vital points, the war will be substantially at an end. We believe that the dying struggles of the rebellion cannot be protracted beyond the month of July, and we are not without the hope that they will cease, or be reduced to a petty and short-lived guerilla warfare, before the close of this brightly opening month of May.

NOTICE.

THE Office of this Paper is removed to No. 537 Pearl Street, a few doors from Broadway.

To Correspondents.

Stories of a high character, poems, and sketches for comic illustration are needed. They will be read promptly, and returned if not accepted. Care should be taken to write legibly, and give the address especially with all distinctness.

Our New Type.

WE need scarcely call the attention of our readers to our new and trim dress. The paper this week is printed entirely from new type, and cannot fail to please by its general beauty and interest, independent of its surpassing pictorial illustrations.

It is but another proof that the proprietor will spare no expense to retain the position which his Illustrated Paper has so long and justly held.

Frank Leslie's Artists in the War.

THE Executive Committee of the New York Historical Society, in a recent Report, employ expressions which are, so far as FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER and "History of the War" are concerned, grossly unjust. "It is true," say the gentlemen of the Historical Society, "that the illustrated newspapers are full of sketches purporting to be pictures of important scenes, but the testimony of parties engaged about that those representations, when they are not based upon photographs, are not always reliable."

Whatever poverty or want of enterprise may have induced other papers to do, FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER has always had its numerous Artists in the field. A selection of 200 of these sketches, made often amid the rattling shot and shell of the battlefield, were sent to the recent Sanitary Fair, and if the New York Historical Society failed to secure them it committed an oversight. Private collectors readily purchased them, happy to be able to add to their albums such relics of the war. These sketches were made by Artists well known in the army, and though not sent to us or contributed by us to the Fair as finished works of art, are often of great merit even in this point of view. Their accuracy has been spontaneously attested by Generals in the highest command, as our readers are aware. Nor have our Artists performed their duties and won this approval without risk. Those who fought at Ravenna Island recollect the Artist sketching in the forefront of the battle; the soldiers who fought at Chicamauga and Chattanooga remember the Artist who, with a party, was captured, and escaped by sending their captors down the rocky heights; the papers of a week back tell how another, at Pleasant hill, lost all his sketches of the line of march and incidents of campaign.

The sketches contributed to the Fair are but a few amid a host. If the Executive Committee of the Historical Society did not know more upon this, to all, we shall be happy to show the reminder to them, to convince them of their injustice to us at least. We may also bring to their notice "Frank Leslie's History of the War," every sketch of which was not only real but accurate and well studied, and this Report closes with a blank form of bequest, but it inserts the word dollars. We shall bear it in mind, however, and if other counsels do not prevail, or some more delightful Historical Scene tempt us, make use of the clause one of these days and bequeath some of our remaining sketches to the venerable Society.

But be that as it may, and laying all joking aside, we assure our readers that our past career has been as honorable to ourselves as to the Artist. Other great army movements are at hand, and we have not been idle. Our Artists are with every important army; and not a movement of consequence in this, we trust, decisive campaign of the war shall take place without our receiving from our corps of Artists full, accurate and vigorous sketches, which, we shall, as far as our limits allow, present to our readers, engraved in the best style, with only difficulty will be to make the best selection; the sketches will be too numerous and valuable to give us even a moment's hesitation.

In the campaign of 1864, as in those of the three preceding years, FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER will occupy the position of the pictorial, graphic illustrations of the war, from the valley of Virginia, from the Peninsula, from Tennessee, from Charleston, from North Carolina, the Mississippi, Louisiana or Texas.

Summary of the Week.

VIRGINIA.

THE fourth annual advance of the Army of the Potomac has been made. Three days has it recoiled in disaster from the rebel army; three times have the hopes of the country been blasted.

The grand Army of the Potomac crossed the Rapidan on Wednesday, May 4th. The 2d corps moved on Tuesday to the Mills, opposite Ely's ford. On Wednesday morning, at 4 o'clock, the cavalry crossed and drove the Rebel pickets from opposite heights, meeting with no opposition. A position was gained, and the corps moved on at 7 o'clock, taking the road to Chancellorsville, at which place Gen. Hancock would establish his headquarters.

On the 5th and 6th corps crossed at Germania ford in the course of the day, taking the road to the Wilderness.

On Wednesday night Gen. Warren's headquarters were at the Wilderness. Gen. Sedgwick's at Germania ford.

On Thursday morning the rebels pressed our pickets, and appeared to be in strong force on our right. The 5th New York cavalry, skirmishing on the Orange Court House road, near Parthall's tavern, were driven in with a severe loss, leaving many wounded on the field. Gen. Griffin's division was marched down to the Wilderness tavern, 11 o'clock to feel the enemy's position, and were met by the rebel Gen. A. P. Hill, supported by Gen. Ewell.

A severe action took place, in which we captured about 300 prisoners, though it is reported that we lost two guns. Meantime, Gen. Meade ordered his corps to the right to connect with Warren, and had hardly got into position, his left resting on or near Chancellorsville, when a severe fight with Longstreet with his full corps, and a part of Ewell's.

Gen. Hancock, with the assistance of Getty's division of the 6th corps, held his position under musketed fire of two-and-a-half-hours duration, when his command suffered severely, inflicting much injury upon the rebels.

Other developments showed Lee to have his whole force in our front.

It not being the purpose of Gen. Meade to advance upon the enemy, he ordered the line of battle to be held till morning.

The position of our troops on Thursday night was parallel with and a little in advance of the road from Germania ford to Parker's store, their left flanks resting on those points, and general headquarters at the Wilderness.

Friday morning afternoon the advance of the 9th corps crossed Germania ford, taking position on our right flank.

Gen. Burnside drove the rebels through Thoroughfare gap, and came up in Meade's rear by forced marches from Warrenton Junction.

On Friday morning the battle opened with our line nearly parallel to the road between Germania ford and Chancellorsville. The battle continued all day, with but little advantage gained. The enemy failed in every attempt to break our ranks, and at night were driven behind their lines of intrenchments. Our loss during the two days engagements are estimated at not less than 6,000 killed and wounded, and may probably reach 8,000. The wounded were sent to the rear as promptly as possible, and dispatched to Rappahannock station. The enemy's loss was heavy. Saturday was spent in morning, and at noon were reported in full retreat, with our army pursuing. We have lost General Hays, of Louisiana; General A. J. Webb, of New York, and General Wadsworth, killed; General Hancock, Getty, Gregg, Owens, Bartlett and Carroll, wounded.

Contemporaneous with the advance of the Army of the Potomac the operations began on the Peninsula. Gen. Butler ran up to West Point and White House, and by landing troops and commencing operations drew the rebels to that point, merely to re-embark, steam back and up James river. Here the troops under Gen. Smith and Gen. Gilmore landed at City Point, and destroyed the southside railroad between Petersburg and Richmond.

A sharp battle came off here, in which the rebels lost Generals Jones and Jenkins killed, and General Pickett wounded.

The rebels succeeded, however, in blowing up by a torpedo the gunboat Commodore Jones near Turkey Bend.

On the 5th instant the 1st and 2d regiments of colored cavalry, under Col. West, made a dash across the Chickahominy river, and two companies dismounted and charged into the camp of the 46th Va. cavalry, killing 30 men and capturing 36 prisoners. The troops were immediately mustered by our troops, who pursued the rebels to within ten miles of Richmond.

WEST VIRGINIA.

A party of 70 mounted men, under McNeil, made a raid on the Grand Ohio railroad at Piedmont, 28 miles west of Charlestown, and captured three trains, doing great damage.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Little Washington, being no longer deemed tenable after the loss of Plymouth, was evacuated by our troops and set on fire by some of the evacuators. The loss, which is very severe, falls on the Union inhabitants, who can of course expect no sympathy or even mercy from the rebels.

General Palmer has succeeded General Peck in this State.

The rebel General Hoke has been made a Major-General, and Gen. Beauregard is preparing to attack Newberne.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Gen. Gillmore has been relieved of the command of the Department of the South, and succeeded by Brigadier-General John P. Hatch. The latter is relieved in Florida by Brigadier-General Wm. Birney of the colored troops. In the northern district General Schimmelpfenning succeeds General Terry. The disastrous system of change is consequently in full force.

GEORGIA.

General Sherman is pressing closer upon Dalton, and Tunnel Hill is already in the hands of Thomas. There are reports that Johnston has evacuated Dalton.

KENTUCKY.

Brigadier-General Prince has succeeded General Brayman in command of the district of Ohio.

The rebels again threaten Paducah, and the unfortunate inhabitants are chiefly encamped beyond the river.

MISSISSIPPI.

The gunboat Petrel was attacked by Wirt Adams's cavalry on April 23d, two miles above Yazoo city. Adams had about 200 men and two pieces of artillery. He sent a ball through the boiler after a brisk fight, and many of her brave crew were killed. The rest escaped, either by jumping into the hands of the enemy, who hung Col. Wooster, the commander of one of the negro regiments.

LOUISIANA.

General Banks had fallen back to Alexandria, after having a sharp engagement with the enemy at the crossing of Cane river.

Admiral Porter got all his gunboats down except the Eastport, which he endeavored to save by towing off after she was fishing. He got a line over her up. Two transports were also destroyed, to prevent their capture by the rebels. In all, 13 gunboats and transports are stated, were blown up, to prevent them from falling into the hands of the enemy. Gen. Kirby Smith, in his official report of the affair, claims to have sunk or taken from Gen. Banks 4,000 prisoners, 2,000 wounded, 8,000 stand of arms, 3,000 and odd mules, 250 wagons, 900 barrels of flour and 35 pieces of cannon.

ARKANSAS.

A skirmish took place recently between our cavalry and Marmaduke's and Dorvall's lines. The enemy were routed and a number of prisoners taken.

It is reported from Memphis that Gen. Steele's army has returned to Little Rock. He was followed by Price's army and continually harassed. At Sabine Cross Roads rebels were turned upon and repulsed after a severe battle, in which the loss was about equal on both sides.

NAVAL.

The Kearsage is still off the port of Ostend, having been run ashore by a pilot.

A blockade-runner, the schooner Indio, from Nassau, loaded with rosin, oil and cigars, and bound for Wilmington, was captured by the gunboat Vicksburg on the 30th April.

A crown widow lady living in Lake county, Ill., has a well, and for the last seventeen years, was lately enlisted in Farnsworth's new cavalry regiment. The lady says the first gush of grief was over, she concluded herself that in one branch of a soldier's duty her son was proficient, and would not leave home again, and that was, "he could swear like a trooper."

He who goes through a land and scatters blows, roses may be sure, will meet and by their withered petals that strew the ground; but he who goes through it and scatters pure-seed, a hundred years after leaves behind him a land full of fragrance and beauty for his remembrance and as a heritage for his daughters and sons.

THE celebrated David Crockett, on visiting a menagerie, was comparing the countenance of a monkey to that of one of his fellow-members of Congress. Turning, he saw the gentleman had overheard his remarks; so, to make matters pleasant, he said, "I do not know which to apologise to, you or the monkey."

CONGRESS.

IN the Senate, on the 2d May, after multifarious business, the joint resolution of the House, appropriating $35,000,000 for the payment of the 100 days' volunteers, recently called for by the Western Governors, was agreed to by 22 to 13.

In the House, the resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to the amount of debts incurred by the several States to aid in suppressing the rebellion, and declaring that such indebtedness should be assumed by the National Government, was referred to the Military Committee. A resolution offered in December last by Mr. Harding, of Kentucky, declaring that, whenever any rebellious State shall be subdued by the combined efforts of the National forces, such State will be restored to all its original rights under the Constitution of the United States and its own constitution, including the right to regulate its domestic institutions, was taken up, discussed and laid on the table by 81 yeas to 56 nays. The Secretary of the Navy was called on, by resolution, for information relative to the building by the rebels in North Carolina of the ironclad ram Albemarle, and as to why it was not prevented. A Message from the President, giving the information called for relative to the assignment of Mr. Frank Blair, jun., to the command of the 17th Army Corps, was received, and referred to the Committee on Elections.

In the Senate, on the 3d, the proceedings were of little public interest.

In the House, a bill was introduced to increase the pay of officers of the Army and Navy, and of the Revenue, under the head "Military." The Senate's amendments to the Navy Appropriation bill were referred to the Ways and Means Committee. Those appropriating $1,500,000 for the completion of the Capitol dome, $4,000,000 for the purchase and repair of vessels for Western rivers, and $10,000 for the purchase and repair of such vessels for blockading purposes were concurred in. The Senate amendment striking out the clause appropriation for the purchase of land adjoining the Charlestown Navy Yard was also concurred in. So was the proposition to remove the Naval Academy from Annapolis to Newport, Maryland. The House then concurred in the Senate's amendment providing that the money appropriated for the Naval Academy shall be applied to the support of the Academy at Newport, and the bill was passed in strict conformity with the Senate amendments. It will now go to the House on the bill providing for the establishment of republican governments in the rebel States was considered, and continued till the adjournment.

In the Senate, on the 4th, the resolutions of Mr. Sherman came up as the special order, when a quorum of the Senate (consists of the majority of the Senators duly elected) being present, a roll-call was taken. Fourteen only appointed and qualified, vote for one person, he is President; that the election of President devolves upon the House of Representatives; and the votes of a majority of the States entitled to vote to be cast for one person, he is the President. Adopted, 28 to 11.

In the House, the consideration of the bill guaranteeing a republican government to rebellious States was resumed, and after some discussion, the bill was passed—Yeas, 73; nays, 59. The bill provides for the appointment of Provisional Governors, and as soon as the military resistance shall be suppressed that measures for the restoration of the State shall be taken by a Convention of a State Constitution. Certain classes of persons who voluntarily took up arms or held office under the Confederate usurpation are excluded from voting or being elected as delegates. The conditions on which each States shall be admitted include a provision that involuntary servitude shall be prohibited and forever forgiven guaranteed, and that no debts created under the rebellion will be acknowledged or paid by the country or paid by the newly created States. After some partisan debate, the House adjourned.

In the Senate, on the 9th, the Committee reported a bill to amend the National Bank Act. Among other things, the 1st of August next all baggage, and effects of passengers, and all other articles coming into the United States from any foreign country shall be inspected, and if any dutiable articles shall be found, the value thereof or other envelope shall be confiscated. The same provision shall apply to cargo or vessel, and also provides they may be released by the Secretary of the Navy upon payment of fine. The House bill establishing a line of mail steamers between the United States and Brazil was discussed. Several amendments of the Senate Committee on Post Offices adopted, and the subject was passed over. The Senate amendment to the Committee ed to investigate the facts regarding the horrible murder of Captain Fry by the rebels at Fort Pillow was presented, and 25,000 copies ordered to be printed. The Senate National Bank Act was then taken up. Mr. Sherman offered an amendment to the amendment of the House Committee on Ways and Commerce, New York city. It allows the Comptroller to close the affairs of the bank if at any time the capital shall be less than $1,000,000, with a surplus of 20 per cent. This was agreed to. Mr. Sumner moved a substitute for the Finance Committee's amendment. It provides that every association shall pay to the United States a duty of one per cent upon its circulation, one-half of one per cent on the deposits, and one-half of one per cent on its capital stock above the amount invested in United States bonds, and one half per cent annually. After some debate, without coming to a vote on the proposition, the Senate adjourned.

In the Senate, on the 6th, after some routine business, Mr. Sumner's proposition to amend the Bank Act so as to prohibit National Bank institutions be subjected to national taxation exclusively, was agreed to by 24 to 18. An amendment was also adopted that every association may charge the rate of interest where the bank is located, and not that where the bank is organized. The Bank Act is no more, except that where by the laws of any State a discrimination is made in favor of issue organized under State laws, the tax on the circulation is allowed to the same extent as is imposed in any such States under this Act. Another amendment limits the issue of the banks to New York, Philadelphia and Boston. The Senate amendment to increase the number of one per cent., was also adopted. Other amendments were offered, but without decision on them the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the session was mainly devoted to the consideration of the Senate amendments to various acts. The Committee on Elections reported two resolutions, which in view of the proposition to make Mr. Blair, of Mo., a Major-General, were laid on the table. Mr. Knox, the contestant, is entitled to the seat as the Representative of the First Congressional District of Missouri. The resolution declaring Mr. Blair not entitled to the seat. Mr. Loan, the sitting member, nor Mr. Bruce, the contestant, is entitled to a seat as the Representative of the Seventh Congressional District of Missouri, was called up, and led to an interesting discussion on the subject of military interference in elections. A report from Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, who had been paroled, and a few copies of the report on the Fort Pillow massacre was agreed to. The House then adjourned till Monday.

FOREIGN NEWS.

GARIBALDI left London on April 23d, for the purpose of receiving purchases of arms which was to embark for Caprera on April 26th. On April 21st he was entertained by 200 members of the Reform Club. On April 22d he breakfasted with a party of American citizens at the residence of the United States Consul, and in emphatic terms expressed his regard for the United States, and his readiness to offer his services to President Lincoln against the Slave Power. Much disinclination continued to be expressed at his sudden departure, and political motives were generally imputed to Garibaldi's advisers. In the House of Commons Mr. Gladstone had admitted that he had advised the

TOWN GOSSIP.

Broadway.

PARIS in France, and Napoleon, and Broadway in New York, and New York in the United States, say we. On this great thoroughfare can be seen, at certain hours of the day, representatives of all the world. Upon its pave more the most beautiful women, and the most distingue men, than upon any one boulevard that make the eyes of Parisians water with delight. Travelled men have pronounced Broadway the most liberal street in the world, and we doubt not with justice. All principal promenades in principal cities of this country are more or less in imitation of this one, and the humblest denizen of the fields and forests of our land, even though a thousand unhappinesses may be heard of its fame, can not visit it as a child would upon some marvellous fairy tale, having all the reality of truth.

With this in view, as it seems strange that our citizens and corporate authorities do not properly realize the value of the great street, and try to preserve and beautify it. In any city of Europe this would be a national care, in this it is left to chance, and to private carelessness. In proportion to its amount of travel, Broadway has less care and more obstructions than any street of the town. Business is allowed to encroachlessly obstruct its pavements, and fancy policemen, of the Broadway squad, stand blindly by, while a lagger, mad or not, is driving protruding from a box that has occupied perhaps 10 square feet of the sidewalk for half a day, before a gay cloth cloak, or commits some other damage that cannot be repaired, to say nothing of the discomfort it occasions.

We have seen a burst of ashes emptied in the Corporation cart at the fashionable promenade hour, covering the dust with dust, and doing more damage to clothes than would pay for the horse and cart, to say nothing of the Celtic driver, and no interference from the gaudily-clad law. We have seen an ancient Teuton, with hook and bag, allowed to scratch unmolested in the street until he had covered every passer-by with the filth; and a man with a dirty or dangerous burden turn off the whole line of the pedestrians. Fear of coming in contact with him, without even a word of remonstrance from the agents and Broadway squadron, seems to become a only thought of saving his immaculate self and handing some particularly good-looking female across the street.

When will we have something approaching to system in the care of our streets, or when will our people think it may be worth their while to copy after the European cities, which have studied the matter longer than we have?

Dirty Officers.

While upon the subject of Broadway, it occurs to how much the police and all others are disgraced by the presence of men wearing the uniform of the United States, and supposed to be officers in the service, who do not know enough to keep themselves clean. We have seen men who unblushingly wear their shoulder-straps, and the number of their regiment displayed upon their epaulet, who are guilty of mud and water anywhere within the memory of the oldest inhabitant, to the disgrace of a cheap suit of linen, but being an excusable matter when a soldier is not expected to appear in shirt. We can be in the office and be dirty and careless in his person; one of the first things he is called upon to teach the recruit is how to command being cleanliness, without which they cannot become healthy or soldierly soldiers.

Philanthropic Advertisements.

If there is anything the world has cause to congratulate itself on it is the universal philanthropy that crops out everywhere, especially through the columns of the daily press. Widows and trusting countrymen must be delighted when they read of the many good young men who are about to vacate matrimony for a hold for years, and bestow them on any moral and honest youth who will permit the sum of one dollar, merely to pay for the advertising—which dollar will be considered payment if the situation is not contracted to Mr. Jeremiah Dribbler, box 10, Herald office. Others have a wealthy relative, yielding $30,000 per annum, to which they will admit, as partner, "a young man of moral character from the country preferred," leaving the sum of $100 to deposit as security. Then there are ventures, worth millions, which only require for the ridiculously small amount of a hundred or less. They are willing to give to anybody who will, while again others will import for nothing or secure for the trifling consideration of 25 cents, a postage stamp, directed to J. G., New York Post Office.

Who would look for anything when it can be had through the medium of an advertisement?

The Situation of the Week.

The positive sensation of the week, in the show way, has been the Davenport Brothers, at Cooper Institute. Everybody is raving over the immense lectures-nightly with excited audiences, and we will venture to say that nothing has ever been performed publicly in New York within recollection has excited more curiosity, and vaunted more than their "manifestations." A description of an evening's performance can only be a repetition of the last.

On the stage, fronting the audience, is a large, black cabinet box, having all the appearance of an ordinary domestic wardrobe. The agent has previously addressed the audience, calling their attention to the front, and to the reason no crosses two feet from electricity being used, glass handles or any other part of the building, and entirely disconnected with the performance. He also requests a committee appointed from the audience to watch and report on what transpires in and about the box.

"Any one you please, ladies and gentlemen, will be acceptable to us."

The name of G. W. B. Tompkins is proposed by somebody, and received with shouts of disapprobation. Tompkins is voted out. Next came the name of George Francis Train, which was damned with faint praise, and left. T. was prevented from locking into the mysterious box.

Then the name of Mr. Fred Hudson, of the Herald, was proposed, and the house voted Mr. Hudson is unanimously, but Mr. H. silently and respectfully declined, quietly looking on it as an unpaid service. Then the name of Mr. Fred Hudson, of the Herald, was proposed, and the house voted Mr. Hudson is unanimously, but Mr. H. silently and respectfully declined, quietly looking on it as an unpaid service. Ment. The name next proposed was that of Mr. C. W. Fenno, an old and well-known actor, who, being voted in, took his place on the stage. Then came the name of the Count Zanone, who was also accepted by the audience, and stepping blithely on the stage, embraced Mr. Fenno, an embrace he explained to the audience by saying that Mr. Fenno had been his schoolmate in Boston, some thirty years before.

These gentlemen having examined the box carefully, pronounced it perfect, shut and locked it, climbing to its top and looking beneath it, pronounced to the audience that everything was all right, and then purported to have simple bed-cords.

Then came the two Davenports, pale, quiet-looking, slender young men about 25, and, without a word to the audience, entered the box. Cords were put into the hands of committee-men, and the brothers passed round in the box, fast to the seats, which were immovable, and with all the will and intelligence the committee were capable of making. Into this box were then put a violin, bundle of ropes, tambourine, and the doors turned down and the door closed. Instantly on its closing, there was a loud noise, as the bells and several violent knocks were heard, the instruments began to play, and a hand appeared at the little wicket of which the doors are thrown open, and a full glare of light let on, showing the Davenports to be still tightly tied as before. The door is closed again, and again the noises, plus the trumpet and bell, and violently ejected through a hole about 12 inches square in the front of the box, and a hand and arm is seen waving out of the same place. The door is again thrown open, and, as before, the brothers are found tightly bound, unable to move hand or foot. The doors are again closed, and in five minutes thrown open and the brothers step out unbound.

The more they tied up the box, the cords are thrown in, and in half the time it took them to be tied by Mr. Fox, they are untied. The knots are tied and sealed securely bound, with the ends of the cords entirely out of reach of the hands. Also, the committee-men locate singly into the box, the music and knocking is heard, together with the noises, while the occupant comes forth to report that he feels human hands over his body and face, and, before the occupant can get out of the box, and finally settle upon his lap, where they are tied hand-and-foot, and securely sealed, the knots of the tying are sealed, the door is closed and locked, and the key given to the hands of the agent. At a aperture, the knocks come with violence, the trumpet is put through the hole, and the brothers found by the Davenports sat bound and sealed as before. The performance is closed by a full exposure of the door, and in a few minutes they come forth free.

About Simmons.

Which reminds us of Simmons, the man who so advertised was Simmons, who with prodigious puffs and flaming advertisements, was about to astonish the world on Monday, Mr. Simmons is excessively demonstrative, and says so, we presume, in his advertisements. He has an eccentricity for which we cannot account, have described, but which is very amusing, and from the previous and thereby shut off our inquiring mind.

The Theatres.

The week has been singularly devoid of event among the professionals. There has been absolutely nothing new produced, so we have nothing to say. At the Winter Garden, has been crumming the house with Hamlet, Richelieu, Othello, Lear, Macbeth, Shylock, &c., with English comedy and a sprinkling of "Rosalie" and Shakespeare, Booth's Theatre has been quietly passing through an eruption of benefits, not overwhelming, but which has kept the house from the intolerable business. And Barnum, finishing up "Cado's Grave" with the last Saturday night, brings out a startling, strange, singular, spectacular spectacle, called "Belphegor, or the Mountain Bride," which, by the way, who created considerable sensation at the Academy a few years ago, in Paris.

On the east side, the town is having just one more turn, which is very interesting, as it is Signor Antonio Mazoppa in the person of Miss Kate Vance, a nice-looking, well-formed little woman, who does up the broad steed business with reckless prodigality of limb, and that the Bowery boys in search of a new sensation will hand to tell when the run of the fiery, untamed steed will end.

A NEW LUNATIC ASYLUM.

SHALL we call the salesroom of Messrs. Bangs, Merwin & Co., a New London asylum, or a lunatic asylum, or a museum of Americana? It is a marvel, or has been this week.

Commencing on Monday, and for years an old gentleman of the name of John Allan, a thorough Scot, a collector of the rare, curious and valuable, has been selling the accumulings, fond of illustrated books and of illustrating books. He lived simply, and by the frugality of his habits, and that half New York know nothing about, reliqet Vanderbilt, reached a very advanced age, and died a few days since, having nearly seen a century.

The old gentleman was a man who sold this week, and never in the annals of American bookselling was there anything to equal it. Fifty thousand catalogues were brought; the competition seemed to have no limit, and amounted to $6793; which was the price of Knickerbocker's New York, which Mr. Allan had purchased for a folio, and which he sold to Mr. Bangs for with 275, the other with over 100 engravings, the one brought the astonishing sum of $1,300, the other the more moderate price of $400.

Secretary of the Treasury.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The following circular relative to the late law increasing the duties has been addressed to all collecting officers:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 6, 1864.

In view of the numerous questions which have arisen on the recent enactment increasing the duties on imports and internal revenue, the following instructions are published for the government of collecting officers.

The joint resolution of April 29, extending the time for the payment of certain duties, and the act of March 31, 1864, both of which are incorporated in the act of June 30, 1864, are hereby repealed, and the duties imposed by the act of June 30, 1864, are to be collected on and after the 20th April, and that, consequently, all goods, wares and merchandise which shall arrive at that or any following day are liable to pay the additional duties imposed by said act. Collectors and all persons charged with the collection of Customs will be governed accordingly.

S. P. CHASE.

Secretary of the Treasury.

—Counterfeiters of postage currency and treasury notes have just been caught in Indianapolis, and their work stopped.

—The Supreme Court of Illinois has decided that a married woman can sue alone to recover her separate property.

—A Court-Martial has been ordered to try the publishers and correspondents of the Washington Chronicle for being guilty of promulgating news contraband of war.

—Gen. Rosecrans has caused considerable excitement in St. Louis by issuing an order requiring every loyal the men who are on "strikes" to resume work.

—The festival of the Ascension was observed by impressive ceremonies in Trinity Church on the 5th of May, and participated in by members of other Episcopal congregations in the city. In San Francisco it was celebrated by high mass.

—Leaders working on custom work are liable to pay the tax on manufactured articles, according to a decision rendered by the United States District Court at New Haven. This decision is highly important, as the principle covers a large number of occupations, which have hitherto been regarded as exempt from taxation.

—The tax paid by Gen. Burbank for the second term of last year induced a great many consumers to lay in large stocks of the article, and the result is that so much is now stored away that it is not believed that its can be sold in the market for the next twelve months. The production for the market has nearly reached 600,000 tons, but the consumption in this section cannot only amount to 250,000 tons. The large companies have all their capital invested in stock and cannot sell. Labor, but who bought of these companies last year, now have the privilege of selling it back profitably to the companies, the "Independent" dealers have controlled the price to the consumer from 50 cts. a ton. This, it is stated, does not more than pay expenses; but the ice-dealers have the fact of selling or letting it melt on their hands. The retail price is now from one-fourth to one-third of what it was last year, and the rates will not advance much during the summer beyond the latter figure.

Military.—Gen. Ruribut, in his farewell address to the 16th Army Corps, states that that body has been consolidated from time to time until there are not enough for offensive operations; that they have lost no honor; and that they have marched, fought, and conquered, and driven the enemy.

—In the House of Representatives the Military Committee has reported a bill increasing the pay of officers and soldiers as follows: Major-generals, $200; to $18; sergeants, to $20; orderly-sergeants to $24; second-lieutenants, to $1,500; first-lieutenants, to $1,500 per annum. Some discussion ensued, and the bill was finally recommitted.

—Brig.-Gen. Devens, who has been on a tour of inspection to the various regiments of New England, is ordered to report at Fortress Monroe, with the Army of the Potomac under Gen. Butler.

—Brig.-Gen. Sullivan, sixty-four Union soldiers have arrived at Fortress Monroe from Richmond almost in a state of nudity. Among the officers is Col. Rose, who was the chief engineer of the tunnel by which sixty men escaped from Libby on February last, he having been recaptured.

—Gen. Grant's pay of soldiers, passed by the House, May 2, will involve an additional expenditure of between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 per annum. The excess is to take effect from the 1st of May.

Naval.—The correspondent of the Shipping Journal estimates the number of Confederates who have been the amnesty oath at 60,000, and predicts that by the 1st of September it will reach 100,000.

—On April 3, Cortinas, with his Staff, was present at a review of the troops at Matamoras, Texas, and, upon its conclusion, dined with Gen. McClernand.

—The Rhode Island Legislature has organized National Guard to garrison Fort Richmond for 30 days. has been authorized, and the Governor assigned that duty.

Naval.—The pirate Florida and the sloop-of-war St. Louis have been at Madeira together. The latter has been dispatched in search of the Florida.

—The sentence against Admiral Wilkes is that he be suspended for three years from command, and reprimanded.

Personal.—It is reported that the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, of London, a celebrated minister, expected to visit the United States in connection with the Evangelical Alliance, and to preside over the British Baptist Missionary Union to be held in Philadelphia, the third week in May.

—The Hon. Reverdy Johnson has resigned his position as President of the New York Central Railroad. He is succeeded by Hon. Erastus Corning.

—The son of Queen Pomare, heir presumptive of Tahiti, has married a young lady of royal blood, and in combination, namely cathedral music and military music, Tahiti, the home of civilization, according to habitians.

—Mr. Masseras, the editor of the Courier des Etats Unis, has been appointed, by the Emperor of France, Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, in consideration of his zeal and talent with which he has defended French interests in America, and the care with which he has constantly enlightened public opinion in regard to the character and policy of the Imperial Government.

Obituary.—The Scotia brings the news of the death of Admiral Austin, on April 10, at Y. Bey, the American Consul-General to Egypt. Mr. Thayer was born in Boston, in 1800, and graduated from Harvard College in 1820. For a long time he was attached to the Legation of the Court of Sardinia, but temporarily left his post on that paper to go with Col. Stevens to Texas, where he was Secretary of the Convention he remained his connection with the paper was severed. He was appointed to the office which he held at the time of his death, the duties of which he discharged with much fidelity and ability.

—Finley Johnson, the well-known poet and sketch writer, died, on May 5, after an illness of but two days. Mr. Johnson was from Baltimore, but was employed in the Quartermaster's Department.

—Rev. Israel Washburn, a well-known Methodist minister, died in Middlebury, Mass., aged 67 years. He resided at one time in Massachusetts, graduating in 1822, and was oft-wards commissioned as a chaplain in the United States Navy.

Accidents and Offences.—A married woman in Jersey City, on the 5th inst., left her infant child upon a bed of live coals on the kitchen hearth, and then left the house and disappeared.

—The memory of the famous Walton murder case was revived in the Surrogate's Court on the 30 of May. William H. Moore, the executor, presented a petition setting forth that Walton was murdered, and that his estate should be administered upon by the Court, and not by the executor; that such conviction was after made to procure forgery, and to conceal the crime of murder. Forgery and murder were convicted. After a new awaiting execution, the Court of Appeals reversed the verdict and took jurisdiction of the case. Moore has sent assets, and praying for an order for payment. The Surrogate held that the executor was entitled to petition a debt of the testator nor an executor of the administrator of the estate, and denied the prayer of the petitioner.

—A verdict of $3,000 damages was rendered against a butcher named Hoffman, in the Circuit Court, Jersey Court lately, for running over a girl named Anabella Gabrella in the street, in December, 1862, while the latter was crossing Dey street, near Broadway. This case is a warning to butchers and others who are reckless to make a trotting course of our public thoroughfares.

Foreign.—Victor Emanuel had an apoplectic fit recently, and for a time was supposed to be dangerously ill. Court lately, for running over a girl named Anabella Gabrella in the street, in December, 1862, while the latter was crossing Dey street, near Broadway. This case is a warning to butchers and others who are reckless to make a trotting course of our public thoroughfares.

—The Government of Nicaragua has concluded a contract with Capt. Pim to build an inter-oceanic railroad.

—"Ashore and Afloat" is the title of a melodrama now being performed at one of the London theatres. To advertise the play, the managers adopted the following appropriate design: They chartered a good-sized full-rigged merchant ship, which was towed in the river, and bearing a manly crew of some half dozen bill distributors, makes sail through the streets and does attractive duty.

—The Irish papers continue to report an extensive emigration from Ireland to the United States. To fewer than 250 persons, for instance, have left Sligo, that number including 40 from Lord Palmerston's estate. His lordship, it is said, provided for the passage and outfit of these 40 persons.

—The beerhouses in London, if placed side by side, would form a row 70 miles in length.

—A curious kind of ovation was paid to Blondin at Valenciennes, namely, the burning of his caricature, together with other celebrities, in what is called a feu de joie. The effigies of Blondin, Joseph's dog; but what Blondin had done to make him obnoxious to St. Joseph is not stated. Perhaps it may be a compliment, as those Hidalgos have odd ways of showing their appreciation.

Chit-Chat.—Mrs. Jane G. Swisshelm, a clerk in one of the Washington departments, has written to Mr. Lincoln refused to sign a pledge not to purchase articles of foreign manufacture, and begs to remind him that in the lavish and expensive style of dress, she believes, from sense cause, that she is thus maintaining the dignity of the nation in the eyes of the representatives of foreign governments.

—A Paris letter says that a gentleman called lately on a well-known Legitimist of the Faubourg, who is badly distinguished for his wealth and avarice, and asked for a subscription for the statue for the Duke de Chambord. "My friend," replied Cæsar, "I have no money, but I would give my blood for the Prince." "You mistake, Duke," was the reply, "the Prince does not want your blood, but your purse."

—At a London theatre lately, during a "ghost" scene, a gentleman who was unable to read his paper except made his appearance before the astonished audience, and taking a seat very near a lady, began to read in a loud record who ever did such a thing in public. The moment he left the house was the result until the laughter of the audience and the arrival of the proper substance of the shadow, when the play went on as before.

—A man was lately tried in France for murdering his wife and mother-in-law. THE POET TO THE WORLD.

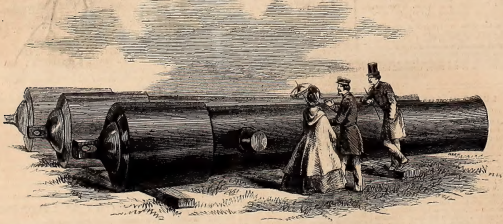
BY ERNEST TREVOR.

THE world's cold malice—Mammon's bitter smile,
And Sleep's undreaming brother, stone-eyed Death,
Wage ceaseless war upon the poet's breath,
And strive his holy mission to beguile
With sordid pleasures, mockeries of fame.
But with Thy Father's holiest music fraught,
Waste not one grain of God's Immortal Thought
Amid the wilderness of Eden stray.
Then to your radiant harps, for had death sealed
Milton's grand lips ere he had tuned his tongue,
And Shakespeare's heart lay cold in Avon's urn,
How had upon his dying moments prest
The solemn music chilled in his breast,
And all that weight of glory unrevealed!

CURIOSITIES OF COLORADO.

In an interesting article in the Atlantic Monthly, Fitzhugh Ludlow gives a most entertaining account of the natural curiosities of Colorado among these are the fantastic creations of the wind, especially of a certain gigantic statue fashioned by the soluble action of rain.



"Upon Canon—The road travelled, if the bold forbid not the name) was carved out of a coarse millstone-grit by the tireless fire, the wind, with material assistance from the unfrequent rainstorms of this region. In Colorado Canon, the Titan's chisel, aided by water, it is rather than any other country in the world. Its mountains are not simply huge, monotonous masses crowded with monuments, obelisks, castles, fortresses and natural colossi from the to the best high, but the angriliaceous sandstone, or a singular species of conglomerate, all of which are more or less modified entirely by the agency of the wind. The arid plains from which these mountains rise, and the rarefied atmosphere, assist her stratum to such a degree that the intensely chilled nights succeed to intensely scorching days, and sudden down to re-establish equilibrium, with a range of from 70 to 80 degrees of Fahrenheit, 50, 60 or even 75,000 feet in height. These floods of water, and the sudden and precipitate action in the characteristic canons which everywhere furrow the Rocky Mountain system to its very base. Now, these are exceedingly torrents, and the descending waste during their journey through the canons are as much as irresistible as the terrace incursions of an avalanche. Wherever, then, a projecting mass after they have issued from the mouth of the canon they have to turn it, or else it must turn as much as 1,000 feet, capable of altering its direction, so as to have curved holes, receiving with inextricable rapidity, and armed with a cutting edge of sleeve.

WOMAN must remember that she brought more sin and misery into the world by her curiosity than ever man has by her drinking.

SOME rich men keep cross dogs around their houses, as rich the hungry poor who stop to get a bite may get it outside the door.

THE PROVOST GUARD IN NEW ORLEANS TAKING UP VAGRANT NEGROES.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, F. H. SCHELL.

TWO HUNDRED POUND RIFLED CANNON AT THE NAVY YARD, BROOKLYN

ARREST OF VAGRANT NEGROES IN NEW ORLEANS.

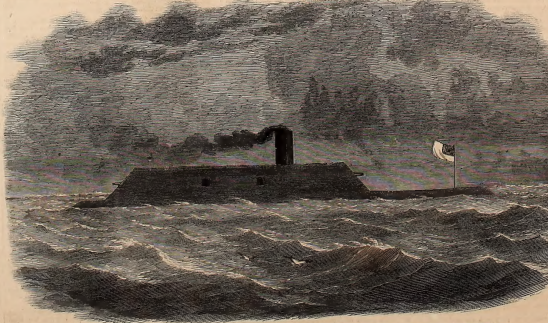
THE Federal occupation of New Orleans produced, as in other parts, a decided effect on the slave population. The bonds of the patriarchal institution were sensibly weakened. The slaves with the idea of freedom had not imbibed the idea of labor, and were in a state of perfect bewilderment. Many wandered around the streets, so many in fact, as to become a growing evil. To cut this floating population to work was soon a necessity, and the stragglers were regularly taken up by the authorities, and employed on Government works at a fair rate of remuneration, unless they preferred to enlist in the negro regiments. Our Artist graphically portrays the mode of arresting and its influence on the children of Africa, dazzled by the first gleams of the sun of freedom.

Some countenances betoken fear, others amazement, others that ludicrous expression of fun which so often bears up the negro in the trials of life.

TWO HUNDRED POUND RIFLED CANNON.

THE recent articles given in our columns on the Rodman guns dispense with any elaborate description of the 200 pound rifled cannon which we illustrate. These terrible engines of war were stocked at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and guns like them we unfortunately supplied recently to the rebels by the defeat at Plymouth. At the last accounts the ram Albemarle, already sufficiently formidable, was taking on board a large rifled cannon of this stamp captured from us.

BALTIMORE HARBOR.



THE recent Sanitary Fair at Baltimore drew many to it, and few could fail to mark the difference between the city in 1861 and 1864. In our last we gave a view of the interior of the Fair which has just closed, after a most successful course. We also gave a view in the city, taken from Loudenslager's hill, still showing the works thrown up by Rogers's battery in 1814, and the fence-encircled magazine. The harbor, with Fort McHenry in the distance, could be seen as you looked over Canton. To-day we give a view of the harbor, showing Locust point, and the railroad wharf, as it was seen on an occasion of interest that drew numbers of boats to that usually more quiet and less stirring spot.

THE REBEL RAM TENNESSEE.

AN officer in the blockading fleet off Mobile sends us an accurate sketch of the rebel ram Tennessee, built to defend Mobile, and a most formidable affair. Our readers will remember their exultation a month ago on reading the following paragraph, which, unfortunately, proved to be merely a poisson d' Avril:

"The rebel ram Tennessee was struck by a squall on the 1st instant, while lying near Grant's pass, causing her to keel over and sink. But two feet of her smoke-stack now remain visible. Her armament will prove a heavy loss to the rebels. It consisted of six 100-pounder rifled Parrotts and nearly as many small pieces."

THE hungry mouth no more readily finds o d than the hungry mind finds truth.

ON BROADWAY.

BY ETTA W. PIERCE.

A WAVE of streamers—a stifled hum,
Then the ringing of cheers through the wehkin high,
And the sound of bugle and fife and drum,
As proudly the troops came marching by.

Marching by with their measured tread,
All bronzed by the sun of the Southern land,
Bayonets gleaming and banners spread—
The dauntless of heart and the strong of hand.
Oh, the old blood warmed in my veins that day,
And the tears leaped up so thick and so proud
I scarcely could see the street or the crowd,
As home came the regiment up Broadway.

For you see it was two long years before—
Ah me! they had seemed so many more—
When the leaves were green on the tender thorn,
And the linnets were singing amid the corn,
When my boy Charlie went marching away
With the gallant hundred of Company A.
He was young of mien—he was slender and fair,
With his laughing eyes and his yellow hair;
But dauntless as any, as loyal and true,
The lad of my heart in his soldier blue!
'Twas a dark and dreadful day, you know,
And what could I do but to bid him go,
And pray that God would take care of the rest?
Though he was my all, and 'twas hard at best.
Ah, there was never a doubt or a pause
When he pledged his fresh young life to the cause—
'Twas a heart's free gift, but I knew, at last,
The pain was over—the waiting past,
And that was why I was glad that day,
When I heard the sound of bugle and drum,
When I saw them coming so gallantly home—
My brave boy's regiment up Broadway!

Steadily—steadily, ah, what a sight
For my old dim eyes, when the noonday light
Fell on them close in the crowded way—
I looked for the banner of Company A.
It was there—high-waving, I saw it again,
From the battle's baptism of purple rain,
Pierced with the bullet, and rent with the ball;
And the faces beneath it—I looked at them all—
I looked at them all, but the sunny hair
And the eyes of my darling, they were not there.
They were not there with their sparkle and shine,
Nor anywhere gleaming along the line,
And reeling backward to and fro
The street and the crowd they seemed to go.
I pressed through the ranks so brown and tall,
I asked where my gallant lad might be—
"Killed in the trenches!" they answered me.
"Killed in the trenches!"—and that was all.
Under the light of that noonday sky,
Where the cheers of the crowd rang long and high,
To the sound of the music, so gallant and gay,
On went the regiment up Broadway.

I never shall look on my darling again
When the linnets are singing amid the grain.
Oh gallant head, oh ringlets of gold,
Oh blue eyes hid in the trenches' mould,
All that the wide world had for me
I have laid at the shrine of Liberty!
And for her sweet sake to-day I stand
By the loneliest hearthstone in all the land,
Listening to hear his voice through the rain—
His voice that never will come again.
But I stand with my face to the golden west,
And I wait in patience for what is best.
And the white stars look on me as I pray
That unto my heart one boon be given—
Some happy morning to meet in heaven
My gallant soldier of Company A.

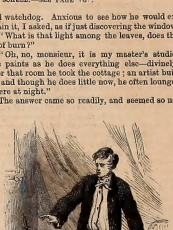
ENIGMAS.

BY MISS L. M. ALCOTT.

(Concluded from No. 450.)

JUNE 8TH.—Found the house silent as a tomb, and fancy the sound of carriage wheels which half woke me at dawn was the only farewell I shall receive from poor madame. A long, quiet day. Noel returned at dusk, and went straight to his room. I seized my hat, concealed myself in the lane and watched the leafy window. Presently it blazed with light, and but for the appearance of Pierre in the garden I should have been tempted to execute my resolve at once. Hearing the rattle of the chain that holds the gate, I sprang into the footpath which turns into the lane from the fields. Pierre showed small surprise at meeting me, as these meadows are my favorite walk, and my assumption of simplicity has quite blindfolded this old watchdog. Anxious to see how he would explain it, I asked, as if just discovering the window:

"What is that light among the leaves, does the roof burn?"



"Oh, no, monsieur, it is my master's studio. He paints as he does everything else—divinely. For that room he took the cottage; an artist built it, and though he does little now, he often lounges there at night."

The answer came so readily, and seemed so natural an explanation I could not but believe it, and saying I should go in and read, I left him. From my window I watched him far along the avenue, he and the maids chatting in the grove, knew that madame's nurse had gone with her from a word Pierre dropped at dinner, and felt that my time had come. It was a moonless evening, fast deepening into night; a light wind was blowing that filled the air with rustling sounds, and the house was quite deserted for the time. I had no fear—excitement is my element, daring my delight, and I desired to earn my liberal reward for this dishonorable but alluring service.

Leaving my hat behind me, I crept to the western wing, with every sense alert. Not by the vines did I ascend, but by a slender Norway pine, whose stem, being branchless for many feet above the ground, seemed to forbid approach by that means. Practice made me agile, and I was soon upon the first bough which touched the roof. With catlike steps I picked my way, crouching low and making no sound louder than the whispers of the wind. The window was closed, and all I heard was a murmur of voices, but parting the leaves at one shaded corner I lay flat and looked down.

A long, lofty room was below, full of light, soft colors, lovely shapes, but how furnished I cannot tell, for its occupants absorbed me instantly. Stretched his full length on a couch lay Noel, looking like a luxuriously indolent young sultan, in crimson dressing-gown and Turkish slippers. He was laughing, and till then I had never seen the real beauty of his face; some cloud of reserve, distrust or melancholy had veiled it from me, but at last I saw the boy's true self, and felt that nothing was impossible to such as he. His white throat was bare, his black curls tumbled, his hands clasped above his head, and as he laughed he hummed a sprightly air, in which a softer voice joined fitfully.

At first he alone was visible, but soon down the long room came a woman dancing like an elf. Great heavens! how beautiful she was! She wore some foreign dress, brilliant and piquante, a lovely neck and arms shone white against the gold and scarlet of her bodice, and bare rosy feet scarcely seemed to touch the carpet. Dark eyes glittered through a stream of rippling gold hair, a sweet, red mouth was smiling, and as she danced the bloom no art can give deepened beautifully on her cheek.

The Spy's Reward.

The Eavesdropper watching the Two Sisters.

With a deep obeisance and a ringing laugh she ended her pretty part of Bayadere, and dropping on a cushion beside the couch, talked vivaciously while gathering up her hair. Noel caressed the bright head which presently leaned against his pillow, sobering slowly as the thoughtful look stole back into his face. Clarice—for this was doubtless she—seemed to chide him, to try and win the gay mood back again, but vainly; for rising on his elbow he began to speak earnestly, so earnestly that his companion soon grew as intent as he. I would have given worlds to have caught a word, but not one reached me, and but for the emphatic gestures of the pair should have gathered nothing of their meaning. She evidently urged something from which she shrank, yet in the end acceded to with tears and eloquently sorrowful eyes. Noel seemed satisfied, and with the fondest gestures dried the tears, consoled the grief, and endeavored to make a light of it. A deep lounging-chair stood before us I easel, on which stood the image of this sweetvoiced girl. A dainty little supper was spread beside the chair, and drawing his model—for model now suspect Clarice to be—into the velvet nest beside him, Noel made merry over it like one content, and yet not heartily at ease.

I was a prettier picture than any he will ever paint; both so young, so blithe and beautiful, so loving and beloved, so free and rich in all that makes life pleasant. I felt like one shut out from some sweet Paradise as I lay looking from the dimness of the night upon that happy pair, but they needed there together, drinking from the same glass, eating from the same plate, serving one another with such charming zeal, and forgetting all but themselves.

Utterly oblivious of the outer world, Pierre's voice nearly caused me to betray myself, so suddenly did I break the hush.

"Catherine, has Monsieur Clyde come in?"

"Yes, long ago; his light is out."

The speaker were in the garden, and waiting till the door closed upon them I crept to the pine, half old, half full in my haste, and safely regained my room.

JUNE 9TH.—Mrs. St. Michael came, had a brief interview with Mr. Noel on the subject, which was prudent but unsatisfactory to me, for I learned nothing from it. Saw no more of him till dinner, when he told me he should pass the evening at the At eight he drove away, and curious to know when he returned, I amused myself with a book till nearly midnight, then weary of it, put out my light and sat musing in the dark. The night was cloudy, close and warm, and finding all still I presently went out into the lane, refreshed by sharing, too, watched and waited for his return. The window was dark, but just as I turned from it I was startled by the sound of wheels close by. I recognised the light roll of the pony carriage, though it was deadened by the turf, for to my dismay it was evidently coming up the avenue but not into the lane. Fearing to be seen if I attempted to get in, I sprang behind the hedge, and holding my breath, saw the carriage pass before me and stop in the garden wall. A man leaped out, seemed to listen, then admitted himself both to the garden and the house, as the sound of a cautiously lifted window suggested. Quite breathless with interest I waited, and sooner than I expected the man reappeared, not alone now, for a slender female figure clung to him. I could just see the outline of their figures, the white gleam of their faces, but I knew them at once by the few words rapidly exchanged in Italian.

"How still it is; have you no fear?"

"I have none with fear, Clarice."

"And I with captivity, thank God!"

"I shall miss you sadly, dear."

"Not for long, your wife will comfort you."

A little laugh accompanied the words, and like spectres of the shadowy hour, house, carriage, man and woman vanished in the gloom.

Here is a clue at last; Noel will marry, and for this purpose clears his house of all encumbrances in your madame and the lovely model must give place to some woman whom he unwillingly marries—if his face and manner are to be relied on. Why he does so is a mystery like himself, but I will yet fathom both.

JUNE 10TH.—It is well that I was prepared beforehand, else the announcement made to me this evening would have filled me with uncontrollable surprise. Mr. Noel wrote steadily all day, was unusually taciturn at dinner, and amused himself at the piano till twilight fell. I had been pacing up and down the hall enjoying his music, when it ceased abruptly, and coming out he joined me in my promenade. The hall was not lighted, except by the softened gleam of shaded lamps from the drawing-room. I instantly observed the anxious look I have learned to know, and by the slight embarrassment of his usually easy manner, also inferred that he both wished and feared to speak. Presently fixing his eyes full upon me, he said slowly, as if weighing every word, and marking its effect:

"Mr. Clyde, as an inmate of my house, I feel that it is but right for me to tell you of an approaching event, which, however, will not materially change my mode of life nor your own—I am about to marry."

He so evidently expected me to be surprised that I instantly feigned what I should yesterday have really felt. Stopping in my walk, I exclaimed:

"Married! you are very young for that experience;" there I checked myself and began the proper congratulations. He cut them short by saying:

"How old do you believe me to be?"

"You look eighteen, your book says forty," I answered, laughing.

"I am of age, however, and though young to marry, have neither parents nor guardians to forbid it if they would."

"It will be soon I infer, as you do me the honor of announcing it to me?"

"On Saturday."

"You mentioned that this event would make no change in my present mode of life—I am then to continue my copying as usual during your absence?"

"I shall be absent but a day. It will be a very private affair, and my—Mrs. Noel will return with me at once."

A little pause fell between us. I was contrasting his cool, quiet manner now with his feverish expression he had worn when with Clarice, and felt more than ever convinced that for some weighty reason he was drawing evidence to his own heart. He seemed conscious that, having said so much, he should say more, and presently added, still in the same measured tone:

"Madame's departure leaves me lonely. My attachment is no sudden one, for I have loved Hortense from her babyhood. She is an orphan, and both being solitary, we see no wisdom in delaying to secure our happiness. Mrs. St. Michael is a married friend, and at her house we shall be married in the quietest manner, for the few relatives we possess are far distant, and Hortense dislikes strangers."

Here Pierre came in, bringing a dainty little note, which he delivered with a smile. Noel took it eagerly, wished me good-night, and hurried away to the west wing. I wish that I, too, were a lover!

JUNE 12TH.—Since our conversation in the hall I have scarcely seen Mr. Noel, and therefore have little to record. For an hour or two he has sat in his sleeve, then dressed and driven away to the St. Michaels, where his happy part, he told me, has already arrived. To-day was the wedding-day, and I waited with intense impatience for the coming of the young pair. I had expected him to be invited to join them so soon, if ever, but because I was burning with curiosity to see the woman for whom he had deserted Clarice, I would not let such scruples about gratifying myself in any way that offered.

At half-past 8 o'clock a carriage rolled up the avenue, and from behind a group of larches on the lawn I watched the party. Pierre came silently to the door as Noel led a lady up the steps. A slender, dainty little lady she seemed, but her face was hidden by the veil of her bridal dress, her bridal bonnet, and all I could discover of her figure, under a flowing white burnous, was that it was slight and graceful. Noel said nothing with his old servant, and I caught a glimpse of his face, and very little like the countenance of a bridegroom did it look.

As both went in I returned to my room, and half an hour afterwards was summoned to dinner.

Twilight had come on and lamps were lit. The table shone with damask, glass and silver, flowers glowed everywhere, and the room filled with fragrance and a feasible wealth of light. But none of these things caught my eye on entering, for standing in the deep window were Noel and his bride. His arm was about her, and leaning there as if content, he looked down at her as she held out an almost childishly lovely hand, and seemed pleading with him. She wore a long drooping upon it. Both turned as I came in, and, with the color mounting to his very forehead, Noel said:

"Mr. Clyde, allow me to present you to—my wife."

Well for me that a bow was all sufficient, and that my command of countenance was great, or I should have betrayed myself beyond repair, for Mrs. Noel was Clarice! I seemed to see her still as I lifted the face was peculiar even in its beauty, and not easily forgotten. There was the rippling, golden hair, dark eyes, never to be forgotten, falling eyelashes—even the smile was the same, brilliant and brief, the voice unchanged, vivacious, yet musically soft. The dress was white, the veil above the flowers in the bosom shone the fair shoulders I had seen, and the round arm that lay on Noel's were the very bracelet I had flashed upon Clarice's but a little while ago. Noel eyed me narrowly, but I believe my face was impenetrable, as I uttered my congratulations after the surprise of that first glimpse had passed.

Half ably, half daringly, Mrs. Noel glanced at me, and as I guessed from her husband's words, was for a bride to make, but it is true. Besides, I want to play mistress, and begin to realise that I am free from all restraints but yours, once more.

We sat down, and a most charming mistress did she prove herself. So gay, so graceful, so frankly kind, so full of pleasant attentions to me, and now and then, as if the novelty of her position overcame her, so sweetly shy and blushing, that before the meal was over I found myself forgetting all the past and full of admiration for this most captivating little creature. Noel seemed to own the charm as well, for he watched her, and once I saw the beautiful blithe nature which he seems to hide and hold in check. He laughed as gaily as the young wife, drank her health more than once, and was more cordial to me than I believed it possible for him to be. Both seemed to forget who and what I was, to make me one of them, and freely to shed the light of their new happiness upon the lonely stranger.

My heart reproached me for my treachery, yet I did not repent, nor shall I till my mission ends. Strange as all has been here, I am fast learning to respect and love this gifted boy, to look leniently upon his peculiarities, and even commend this last act, whatever its causes and consequence may be.

It is evident that he loves his wife passionately, and she loves him with a confiding tenderness which will not be concealed. I felt like one in fairyland, and when they went into the drawingroom longed to follow, yet dared not, till Mrs. Noel, looking backward, beckoned me with an imperious little gesture that was irresistible.

"There is no need of your deserting your old haunts because I have come, Mr. Clyde," she said, looking up at me with eyes that seemed to read the depths of my heart. "Bernard and I have known each other for so many years, have been together so much, and loved each other from our childhood, that the putting on of this ring seems to make no change in us. We care nothing for the world's ways, and rule this little kingdom as we will. You are a musician, Pierre tells me?" she paused, laughed delightsomely, and added, "my husband's book, and help him as he would be helped; then we shall be happy indeed, as much you must live with us, and let two children profit by your age and wisdom."

This friendly speech, so warmly, gracefully delivered, quite touched and won my heart, and I at once accepted the offer, and took the hand outstretched to me. Hardly waiting till my thanks were spoken, little madame danced away to the piano and broke into a song. If anything were needed to convince me of her identity with Clarice this would have done it, for the marvellous voice brought to mind Noel's malicious favor to see how Noel would bear an allusion to the falsehood he once told me, I said, carelessly:

"Monsieur Noel sings distinctly at the time, Mrs. Noel's voice reminds me strongly of Madame Estavan's when she sang 'Casta Diva.'"

Nothing the matter with him, for not a muscle betrayed, with a mirthful look at the goldenhaired, white-robed figure at the instrument:

"Well it may, for Clarice is a near relation of my little wife's, whose voice was trained by her, Hortense, come out upon the lawn, I want to show you your new domain by moonlight."

She came to him with the airy motion which seems habitual to her, and, hanging on his arm, went with him to the door, looking a fit mistress of this enchanting and enchanted place.

JUNE 13TH.—I take the liberty of noting only such events as seem of importance to myself, and therefore when my days are solitary leave them blank. Yesterday the young couple fully proved themselves "a pair of children," for they danced and sang all through the house, haunted garden, grove and lawn, drove, walked and rested, always together, and always happy. Mrs. Noel seems like a bird let loose, her husband enjoyed her joy and gave himself a holiday, for mind as well as heart, he is now given to the study. His wife, I noticed as the window, giving his directions while his wife stuck roses in his buttonhole. Perhaps she was not looked when they did, for suddenly she stepped in and came to me, saying, as she put a flower on my desk and then tripped away again:

"You, too, shall have one, because you are the wise and busy man. I give you this fully expectant that you will note your best. Bernard must have the little white ones, because they are like me."

As I sat at my desk in the dining-room, a few hours later, from the window I saw Mrs. St. Michael's servant come up the avenue and hand a letter to Noel, who, leaving there while madame dressed. The man went back. Noel read a brief note, hastily unfolded the newspaper which contained the paper, glanced to dart at once upon some particular passage. I saw him stand motionless and intent a moment, then drop the paper, turn as if to enter, and fall, face downwards, on the grass.

Darting out, I raised his head to my knee, loosened his collar, and while endeavoring at the same time fingering on his pale lips, I snatched a glance at the note, for the paper was still crushed in his hand. Only these words:

"I go at once to London. Be prepared at all times. Another week and your long task is over, my brave child."

It was Mrs. St. Michael's hand. I had seen it on sundry notes of invitation, but whatever clue I might have found by searching the paper was lost to me. Noel opened his eyes instant I loosened his clenched hand. To my utter amazement his face grew almost fierce as he staggered to his feet and waved me off.

"Have you read it? What have I done? How came you here?"

He spoke as if hardly conscious of what he said; yet, through all the agitation of his manner and the incoherency of his speech, some strange happiness was in his eyes.

"My dear sir, I have read nothing. See, the note lies under your feet and the paper is in your hand. I saw you fall as I ran to help you. Should I have left you here to startle Mrs. Noel?"

The composure of my manner reassured him, and, as if wondering he never cease, he clasped his hands before his face, and great tears fell between his slender fingers as he wept like a woman over his grief. I reluctantly put my arm about him, for he trembled, and, as if the act were comforting, he leaned upon me till the paroxysm passed. Presently he was himself again, and looking up half gratified, half ashamed. His eyes fell upon mine; he saw the note at his feet, and, as if self were forgotten in some returning thought, he caught it up, saying, slowly, and with still downcast eyes:

"Forgive my folly and my harshness; I am not strong, and sudden tidings overcome me. Let me explain, for I owe you mystery."

So, eager to learn, I did not refuse, and he added, after reading the note aloud, much to my surprise:

"This is from my kind neighbor; she goes to London about my book. I am to be prepared to deliver it at any moment, and that is the long task that will be ended in another week."

Nothing could be simpler, and yet I did not believe the explanation. Why? Because I have learned to know this young man's face so well that its expressions are familiar now, and not once did his eyes meet mine while speaking, nor did he once allude to the paper still crumpled in the hand behind him. I could not but accept it, however, and as Mrs. Noel was seen coming out to us, her husband started, thrust both note and newspaper into his pocket, hastily smoothed his disordered locks upon his forehead, and said, fixing on me a look that was almost stern:

"Oblige me by saying nothing of this to my wife at present. I will tell her later. Give me your arm, please, and be so kind as to attract her attention from me for a little."

I obeyed in all things, but Mrs. Noel was not deceived for her first glance at her husband caused her to turn as pale as he, but some look or gesture unperceived by me restrained her, and she endeavored by the unconscious of anything amiss. Pierre also looked expectant, was unusually awkward in his duties, and evidently eager to get me alone. The last solemn dinner was over all three vanished, yet not together, and with every appearance of anxiety to be unobserved.

JUNE 14TH.—Bad one thing has sheltered the household for the last three days, and that has been the book. Such genuine interest and haste have I never witnessed, and I must believe Noel spoke the truth. The study is no longer deserted, for not only has he written steadily himself, but Pierre and I have taken hours also, and every thirty fingers with ink, flushing her sweet face with energetic struggles to keep up with our swifter pens, and making the once quiet room a bright and busy place.

"It must be done before the week is out, if we give up all else as well as our days," he said, looking through this task, Clyde, and ask any recompense when it is done."

Mrs. Noel spoke to me with such energy, such familiarity; his eagerness seemed to put new strength into my hands, his confidence to warm my heart, and I felt almost brotherly affection for him. We did work, silently for the most part, but how rapidly you may understand when I say that the book was done by one. I have read all the study very weary, yet heartily sorry that my share of the work is over, for Mr. Noel tells me he may even need me a little longer. His unexpected note of Mrs. St. Michael's seems to have precipitated matters, and my task ends before the month is out.

JUNE 15TH.—The clue is found, and the mystery solved. Last night, being weary, I slept unusually sound, but was suddenly, sure that some one called me. The moon had set, a light shower pattered on the roof, and a fresh wind blew in. While drowsily thinking that I must rise and close my window, there came a light tap on the glass of the one nearest me, which was open a shut. I sat up and listened; cautious footsteps brushed across the turf, and as if my movements had aroused some one of my presence, a voice breathed softly:

"Pierre! Clarice! Bernard!"

"Who's there?" I cried, but nothing answered, and again the stealthy footsteps caught my ear. I sprang to the window, strained eye and ear, waited and watched for nearly an hour, but no sound reached me, and I reluctantly compelled myself to think it all a delusion, for these names had been sounding through my dreams.

This morning I stepped out upon the terrace early, as I often do, but took only a single step, for there in the hall mingling with the sunlight were two footprints not my own. Peculiar footprints were they; one large, but shapely, the other narrow and slender, and a foot decidedly small to some way. Long I looked at them, but could find no solution of the matter, so strolled on looking for more. I found none, and on my return hastened back to ring for breakfast, when Mrs. Noel came flying down the hall, her hair loose upon her shoulders, her bosom rapper half on, and terror in her face. Seeing me, she cried:

"Where is he? Bernard? Have you seen him? He is gone!"

"Gone! How? When? What has happened, Mrs. Noel?"

"Not you! Pierre," she cried, beating her hands distractedly together. "He too is gone, the maids tell me. What shall I do? Help me, Mr. Clyde! Look for them, look for them!"

"Where shall I look? Tell me more; I cannot help you till I understand."

She was so overcome that for a moment she could not speak, but when I left Bernard and went to madame's room. I heard nothing, knew nothing till I awoke and found him gone.

Bernard and I went for Pierre's room, but had deserted me, and now I have no hope but in you."

Her white face dropped upon my arm as the pale lips and eyes looked up imploringly, so sobbing like a frightened child.

"Let us go to his room, he may have left some paper, some trace that will serve us. Be of good heart, dear Mrs. Noel; I will help you with all my wit, strength and soul."

"You will, you will! Come, then—stay, I must go first—the room is in sad disorder."

Hurrying before me, she ran down the west wing; I followed when she called me, and looked vainly for some trace to explain Noel's absence.

"He never walks so early, never till now has gone even to the grove without telling me. Why did I leave him? Oh, my darling, what has happened to take you from me—"

There she paused abruptly, for I beckoned. The long window was open, and glancing out, I had seen on the newly gravelled walk footprints like those I had seen before. Others were beside them now, slender and small. Mrs. Noel looked, rushed out regardless of her disarray, dropped on her knees and scrutinised the prints, then rose, and carefully compared the smaller one with her own pretty foot thrust stockingless into an embroidered slipper. It seemed to satisfy her; a long sigh of relief followed, yet she began to tremble as her eye wandered far beyond the garden walls. I said nothing of my nocturnal visitor, and waited for her to speak. In a moment she recovered her self-possession, brushed away the larger footprints with a rapid gesture, and gathering her wrapper closer about her, she turned to me with a gentle dignity I had never seen in her till now.

"I have no longer any fear for him," she said, "These tracks show that Pierre is with him. They plan some surprise for me. Thank you, Mr. Clyde, and let me apologize for my foolish flight."

More mystified than ever, I was turning away, when Noel sprang in at the window, rosy, radiant and wonderfully altered. Wherein the change lay I could not tell, but I felt it so strongly that I stood staring dumbly, while his wife explained my somewhat embarrassing situation, and chid him for his flight.

"My dearest, I only went to the St. Michels. The good gentleman had one of his sudden attacks near morning, and sent for me; Pierre would not let me go alone; I feared to distress you, so slipped away, hoping to be back before you awoke."

This statement, like several others, sounded probable, yet I doubted it, and observed that while he spoke he looked steadily at his wife, who looked as steadily at him. Of course I retired after this, and nothing more was said, even when we met as usual.

All day I wrote, copying several fine poems, which I suspect have been lately written, as they are of love. Mr. Noel has seemed more unlike his former self even than he did at dawn, and his wife has been in a state of joyful restlessness which infected us all. Something wonderfully exciting had evidently happened, and something more long desired was evidently to take place at night; for as I left the drawing-room this evening I heard Noel singing, as if to check some impatient glance or gesture of his wife's:

"Wait a few hours more, darling. It will not be safe for him to come till twelve."

That was enough for me; out went my light, and having carefully tumbled my bed that it might appear to have been occupied, I sat down by my window, waiting till the house was quiet. At half-past eleven I crept out, and looked to see what windows were still lighted. None but the study showed a ray. There, then, this joyful meeting was probably to take place. Up I crept, but before I could set foot upon the roof the rain brought me the sound of steps coming to the gate. Motionless I sat, hidden in the sombre verdure of the pine, as two tall figures entered, crept to the window of Noel's room, and disappeared. One was Pierre I knew, by a suppressed cough; the other was almost gigantic, seen through the pale mist that rolled up from the river. An unequal motion in the gait suggested a limp, and as he walked I caught the faint echo of a voice very like Noel's, but far deeper and manlier than his.

Fearing that Pierre might stand guard in the chair with Clarice upon his knee, both her arms were about his neck, and tears of joy were streaming, for she smiled as she fell, and seemed to have no words to express her happiness.

Another woman knelt beside the chair, her face uplifted, fearless, but how noble beautiful I did not look; my heart stood still, then leaped with an excitement almost uncontrollable, for with a shock of recognition I knew that the woman was Noel, and that Noel was a woman. The black locks were parted on the forehead now, the dark moustache was gone, the loose paletot was replaced by one of trailing dress, from whose deep purple sleeves came arms whose white grace would have convinced me had the face been hidden.

Dizzy with bewilderment and a strange satisfaction which I could not analyse, I stared down upon the three, seeing, hearing, yet scarcely comprehending for a time. This stately man was their father; it needed no words to tell me that, for Clarice's eyes were dark and lustrous as his Noel's—I can call her by no other name—Noel's grave, sweet mouth was a perfect miniature of his, and the features of both have a strength and softened resemblance to those finer ones whose repose and strength was beautifully touched by tenderness. An Italian evidently, for though his figure far exceeded the lithe slenderness which usually characterizes this race, there was the olive hue, the southern eye, the fire, the form over which color climates seldom produce. Gray-haired, worn and old he looked; yet suffering, thought and care seemed to have aged him more than years, for his voice had a youthful ring, his gestures the vigor of a man still in his prime. The right foot was smaller than the left, and when tears, for his voice had a youthful ring, his gestures the vigor of a man still in his prime. The right foot was smaller than the left, and when years, for his voice had a youthful ring, his gestures the vigor of a man still in his prime. The right foot was smaller than the left, and when and wears the shoe, the sight of which confirmed my suspicion that I saw the midnight visitor whose tracks I had found beneath my window.

The first words that reached me after a pause were Noel's, and I held my breath to hear, for the faultless tone I had learned to love was now clear with a womanly tone, and now I knew why the seeming boy had been so silent when I was by. As if continuing some subject dropped for a momentary overflow of emotion:

"Padre mio, I will tell you how it has fared with us since they drove me from your presence. Good old Annunciata took us home, but remembering my promise to you to fly at once to your old comrade Pierre in Paris, we went. He, who had believed he would be, father, friend, counsellor and guard. He feared to keep us there, begged us to come to England, and in some safe disguise wait here till you could join us, if your captivity did not end in death.

"As we planned what would be the easiest, safest disguise for each to assume, I bethought me that if we were searched, for when I was discovered that the proscribed book had disappeared with us we should be described as two Italian girls; if we separated each might be found, and apart, our apprehensions for each other would be unbearable. Now, if we could lose our identity altogether, and appear in a new land exactly opposite to what we had been in the old, we should be doubly safe, and could help you without fear. I recalled our wandering life before you knew Clarice's mother, when you and I roamed over Italy and France as a peasant and his little son. I made an excellent boy, and thus the part so well, you know, I cried when forced to give it up; but in my strait I remembered it, and resolved to be, not a little lad, but a half-grown youth, and train myself to dare all things for your sake. Clarice could not if she would, having neither courage, shape nor awkardness, but I won them all to it, and brought my wife home, as happy as a bird when the cage is open and the sky cloudless."

"Lean nearer, my daughter, and answer truly. Did this shadow of love arise from any longing in your own heart for the substance? Have not these quiet summer days, passed in the society of this young man, been hazardous to something more valuable than my safety? Will you not tell me some longing to lean upon, to confide in the new friend lingering under the woman's robe as your brother? Answer me when this gentle bosom hid itself behind a man's vest? Tell me, Monica, do you love this Clyde?"

There was answer, but her face was hidden, and before the mute confession could be accepted she sprang up, as if pride struggled with maiden fear, and shame, and some towards me. Then I saw her face, and knew that the strange sentiment of affection, reverence and admiration I had felt for her sex, when I believed her to be a slanderful gifted and noble boy was unsuspected love; that the blushes, the reserve, the anxiety which had puzzled me were other causes, in truth proceeded from a like suddenly upspringing, swiftly growing passion, whose chief charm lay in its unconsciousness. Bewildered, whirled through my brain as I listened, and when I saw that familiar yet sweetly altered countenance unconsciously betraying what she struggled to conceal from those nearer yet not dearer I could scarcely contain myself, and some half audible exclamation of the truth must have escaped, looked up, seemed to see my face as it vanished. No sound betrayed that she had recognised me, and so brief was the interval that I doubted whether she could scarcely think she saw a human visage through the thickset growing leaves. Like a guilty yet most happy ghost, I crept through the unguarded room, and dashed into bed. Not a moment too soon, for barely had I got my breath when a light step passed my window, and Noel's door. My heart beat as if it would betray me, when the door opened, and the invisible being evidently paused upon the threshold listening. Does the suspense still? I could bear it no longer, and stirred noisily in my bed. Then quietly as it had opened the door closed, and I was left unwatched.

Mr. North, I am your spy no longer, and the record which I now dispatch is the last you will ever receive from me. I break the compact and relinquish the reward your offer.

Those last words were written in the hush of dawn on that morning after the discovery, for I was eager to be done with my now insupportable task, and as Monica's secret and her father was past all danger, I feared no harm would follow the delivery of that final record. I had waited impatiently for the first ray of light that would make it, and when it was written paused for the page to dry. That pause was fatal, for worn out with a sleepless night and the excitement of the preceding hours, my eyes closed, my head fell on my arms, and lost I all consciousness in a deep slumber, which must have lasted for an hour, as when I awoke the sun shone in upon me. Intent on posting my letter unobserved as usual, I looked for it, and seeing it wished that I had never awakened.

There it lay with its infamous purpose clearly confessed in its few lines, and on it a business note, a slip of paper, all three stabbed through by the tiny dagger that pinned them to their place. Leaping to my feet, and seen it on Monica's study-table, and admired its dainty workmanship; I knew the sharp Italian writing on the paper. Now let me finish my day after day; I knew whose eyes had read my words, whose hand had stabbed the treacherous sheet, whose contempt had spared me in its supreme sharpness than any pang of death. The slip held these words:

"We are gone for ever, leaving despair for the lover, wages for the hireling. Retired to the Tuileries."

How long I sat there I cannot tell. The sun came up, the world woke, and life went on about me, but time seemed to have ended.

A dull hope woke at last within me, and I went wandering through the house, looking for that which I shall never find. Every room was deserted, but that of the grim maid, Catherine; and from her I got no help, but a curt request to breakfast and go. I chose the latter, and then the house, and return to her former mistress, Mrs. St. Michael. "Were they there?" I asked. No, they were miles away, and she would have no questions put to her. My one refuge was Mr. North, and to him I hurried. His office was closed. I knew his residence, and ran to it. Crape shrouded the knocker, and when I was admitted it was to find him dead. The day before a strange gentleman had called, had a long interview, and when he went Mr. North was found speechless in his chair. He never had revived, and died at dawn. His secret had died with him, and through all these weary years I have carried a grim knot of it; never seen Monica, never regained my peace of mind, nor found rest from pondering miserably over these unsolved Enigmas.

Ir men will but amuse the world, it will gladly forgive them for cheating it.

WHEN men are long indifferent towards us, we grow indifferent to their indifference.

THINKING.

THROUGH the clouds of gold and purple
Slow the sun is sinking;
Pethick drops within the river
Stand the cattle drinking;
On the bridge above the millstream
Rests the maiden—thinking.

Northward hath that mocks the sunset
With its golden glowing,
Hands above her pitcher folded,
With the graceful seeming
Of an antique-sculptured Hebrid,
By a fountain dreaming.

As a tender thought had swayed her,
O'er the stream she's leaning,
While her dripping curls and quiver
With a sudden moaning,
And a quick red shakes her ringlets,
All her features screening.

For there comes a sound of laughter,
And a merry cheering;
And the cattle turn their faces
To a step that's nearing—
And she waits for words low spoken
In a tone endearing.

Low behind the western tree-tops
Now the sun is sinking;
Towards the bridge the weary cattle
Turn themselves from drinking—
And they never guessed, as I did,
What the maid was thinking.

CAPTURE OF GEN. LEE'S WAGON TRAIN, AT MANSFIELD, LA.

IN the late reverses in Louisiana one of the most disgraceful points was the loss of the wagon train of Gen. Lee's cavalry, which had been sent so far forward that it became impossible for the defeated cavalry to retreat. The blame rests entirely upon those of the men but also the capture of the train.

"Our forces," says our Artist, "were driven in confusion down the road, through the clearing and into the woods. The overwhelming force of the enemy, attacking from the front, almost simultaneously prevented all further resistance. Gen. Lee lost 100 wagons, with 10 days rations, and 200 head of cattle. The officers' baggage was also lost.

The attacking force took a line systematically. In a moment all the rebs, running through a wood, it is merely necessary to say that the front horses or mules of the wagons at the head of the line, and the whole are taken.

CHASING A BLOCKADE-RUNNER.

"WHAT is our Navy doing? Why is not Wilmington blockaded?" These questions are asked everywhere, with friends ashore to guide and signal them. The successful blockader have a chance to pursue a blockade-runner, owing to her superior speed alone, than the fact is made known, and in the darkness the blockade-runner keeps in with lights extinguished, free low and silence absolute. So great is the caution that the blockade-runners have been known, when fairly in, to have deserted each other's dark hull, and each supposing the other to be a blockader, stole out to sea again. An officer doing blockade duty sends us the sketch of a pursuit of a blockade-runner at midnight, under these difficulties.

SECESSIONVILLE, JAMES ISLAND, SOUTH CAROLINA.

SECESSIONVILLE, as its name implies, is a place which has received its name since the war began, and if our present military operations do not miscarry, may soon adopt some other appellation, and its present name be entombed in a gazetteer.

It is on James Island, and was one of the points strongly entrenched by the rebels to prevent our advance, and not far from the scene of one of our disastrous attacks. The sketch was made from a signal station on Long Island, and beside the picturesque village, beyond the marsh and water, may be seen the frowning batteries of rebeldom.

In the foreground is a redoubt for infantry with a dry ditch.

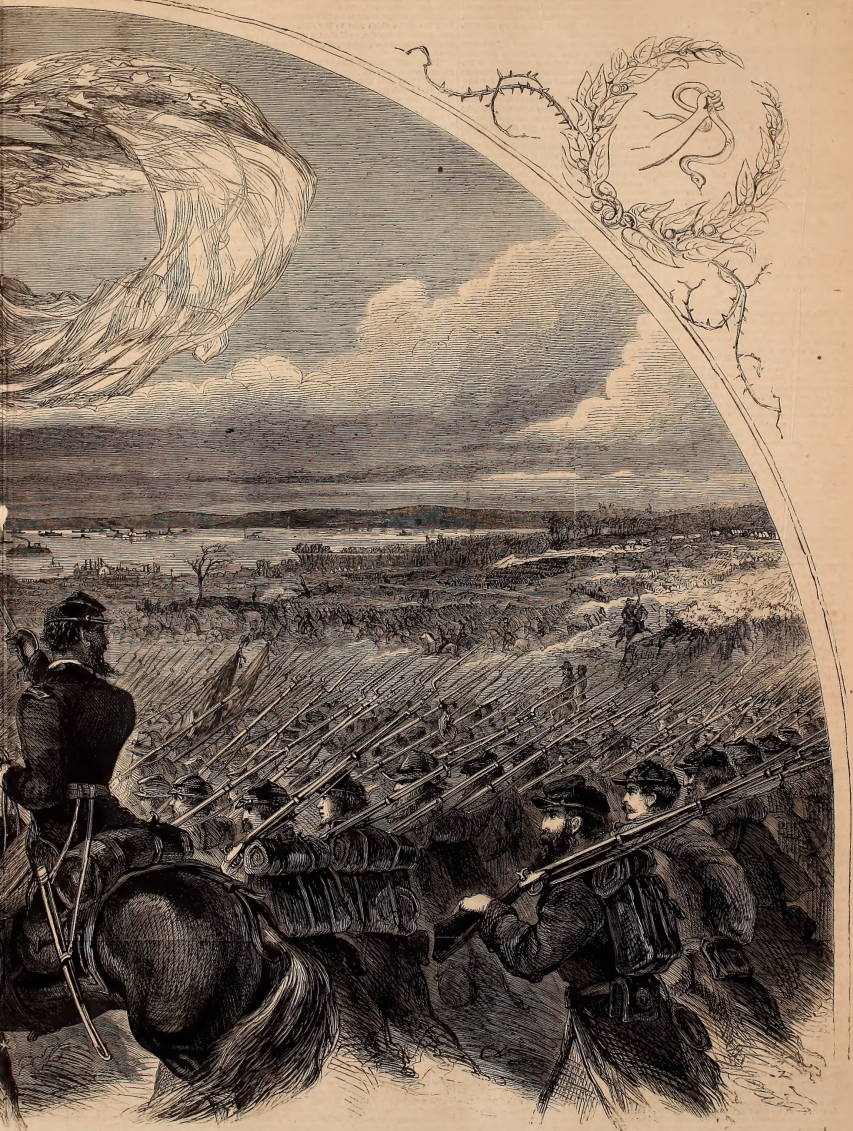
WESTOVER WELL.

THE advance of Gen. Butler up the York and James rivers brings our troops back to the spot which will never be forgotten in the American armies—West Point, the White House, Fort Powhatan, City Point, Harrison's Landing, the Chickahominy. Few of these points had a greater celebrity in the past than the Westover Mansion, and Harrison's Landing, which was renowned in the chivalric days of Virginia as the scene of many interesting incidents. We shall, also famous, has been sketched, and deserves a place before all the relics of the bygone time have passed away.

BOOK NOTICES.

FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE AND GAZETTE OF FASHION for May, 1864.

This unique and attractive issue this month with something which drops out and proves to be full-sized patterns for a new Children's Costume, and the Bodice for Evening Dresses and a Little Girl's Dress, sufficient and varied enough to gratify any lady: while the plate of colored fashions for Evening Dress, Walking Dress, redingotes, chemisiers, collars, fichus, sleeves, jackets, caps, parasols, are enough to perplex many a head, and create inordinate desires.



It is not only a mirror of anything more ample in this respect, and the descriptions are, we are assured, correct and full.

The literary and artistic departments are not neglected. The Doctor's Wife is continued, and bids fair to prove the most exciting of Miss Braddon's novels. Camilla's Stratagem, A Romance of Hallowe'en, Alice in Mart, An Authentic Narrative of a Haunted House, excellent tales, finely illustrated, with poems and charming sketches, give a rich feast.

Two deacons were once disputing about the proposed site for a new graveyard, when the first remarked, "I'll never be buried in that ground as long as I live." "What an obstinate man!" said the second; "if my life is spared, I will."

SLEEP AND DEATH.

SAY, when the infant sleeps its wakeless sleep,
His lifeblood cold—its heart can beat no more—
Its little eyes, erst bright, with hazy film
Are clouded o'er—

Say, is this death?

No, it is only sleep.

Say, when the warrior sinks upon the field,
The hard-fought battle o'er, his duty done,
The last wild cry that strikes upon his ear—
"The fight is won!"

Say, is this death?

No! it is only sleep.

Say, when the old man having run his race,
And seen his friendships fade and leaves decay,
Life's evening close, and in heaven awaits
A brighter day—

Say, is this death?

No! it is only sleep.

Say, when the heart is fresh, and love's young dream
Together binds two hearts, two souls, two lives,
The loved one perishes, one memory lives,
One heart survives—

Say, what is this?

Ah! this is truly death!

The Gulf Between Them.

BY MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

WHILE Mellen stood on the veranda at the front of the house Mr. Rhodes came up the avenue. There was no hope of escape for him; he had not perceived the visitor until it was too late to reverse his course, and a voice called out:

"Oh! there you are, old fellow; I'm in luck after all. You see I walked over to my farm on the back road," he explained, "intending to take the half-past three train to New York, but I missed it. So I said to myself, 'I'll cut across the fields, down the hill, and stop at Mellen's, beg a dinner, and get him to send me over in time for the seven o'clock train'—wasn't a bad idea, eh?"

"A very good idea, on the contrary," Mellen answered, struggling to seem hospitable and to put the visitor at his ease; and he laughed again and burst into the shrill, grating laugh of a man who has no perfect shouts of laughter, as if there was some wonderfully good joke in the affair. "And how is your good lady?" he asked. "And the pretty little sister—quite well, eh?"

"Tolerably so," Mellen answered; "complains of headache and that sort of thing."

He conducted his guest into the library, and meeting Dolph in the hall, directed him to inform his mistress of the arrival.

Mellen made an effort to be civil as possible at so short a notice; and though the man was by nature of an extreme, perhaps it was better to endure his society than to meet his wife without the restraint of a stranger's presence.

Indeed, without some of those social restraints to which all men are more or less slaves, it is doubtful if Mellen could have appeared so perfectly calm. As it was, the fire that consumed him raged unseen. Dolph carried his message upstairs, where it was received with a groan from Elsie, and loud clamor on the part of Elizabeth.

"I can't go down," she said; "Elsie, you must take my place at the table. Say that I am quite unwell, fainting, anything."

"Indeed I'll do nothing of the sort," returned Elsie; "if you don't go down I shall stay with you. I am nervous as I can be, and if you are not at the table I shall break down completely."

The girl was full of selfishness to the very last; not willing to yield her comfort in the slightest particular, but Elizabeth only sighed as she received it, and said, quietly:

"After all, it is just as well—change your dress, Elsie."

These two women commenced the duties of a dinner toilet with heavy hearts, scarcely heeding what they put on.

But when the dinner-hour approached the two ladies arrayed, Elsie looking pretty as ever in her dark blue silk, with those bright ringlets floating about her shoulders, and her volatile spirits already rising at the idea of an escape from that shadowy chamber where they had dragged through the day.

Elizabeth was calm and self-possessed as ever. To a casual observer she looked pale, but her heavy black dress might account for that, and moreover the delicate contrast it gave to her complexion made amends for any lack of bloom.

Mellen sat watching her while she greeted Mr. Rhodes, and listened patiently to his labored compliments.

"Is she stone—ice?" he thought. "Is there no touch of nature about her that she can be so calm?"

If he could have read her mind he might have pitied her even in the midst of his anger and fearful doubts. What she suffered in putting that restraint upon herself was almost beyond the power of human flesh; but woman-like, having formed her resolution, not all the tortures of the rack could have driven her.

Elsie had seated herself on a low stool at her brother's feet, and he sat absently playing with her curls, and looking moodily into the fire, though he had been so silent and sullen by times during the past week that there was not change enough in his manner to be at all perceptible.

Sometimes Elizabeth glanced over at the pair, and then some sharp pain contracted her brows, but there was no other appearance of emotion; she would control even that instantly, and bend her head once more, quietly listening to her persecutor's verbiage.

Dolph announced dinner, and the party passed into the dining-room, Mr. Rhodes honoring the hostess with his arm. Mellen and his sister followed, and Elizabeth heard Elsie whisper to him, in a low voice:

"Grant, dear, you are not cross with me?"

In the midst of Mr. Rhode's uproarious laugh at one of his own jokes, she caught Mellen's answer:

"Never, darling, never! You are my one comfort—my only blessing."

With her head more proudly erect, a faint crimson beginning to burn on her cheeks, Elizabeth Mellen swept on and took her seat at the table, appearing so completely engrossed in Mr. Rhodes's conversation that she did not once meet her husband's eye.

To all but one the dinner seemed interminable, but Mr. Rhodes was so busy with the delicacies Clorinda's skilful hands had prepared, and so full of himself, that he was in a perfect glow of content.

The lights danced before Elizabeth's eyes, every morsel she tried to take seemed choking, the wine was like a bitter fiery on her lips, yet there she sat in patient endurance.

Occasionally Mellen glanced towards her, and her composure sent such a thrill of rage through his soul that it was with difficulty he could help from springing up and overwhelming her with the discovery he had made, on the spot.

The dinner was over at last, but long as it had seemed to Elizabeth, she would gladly have prolonged it; anything to keep them in the house; to keep afar off the stillness of the night, when she must undertake that dreaded task.

But she would not think of that; she dared not; madness lay so near the dismal reflection that it must be swept from her mind.

They dragged through the evening; Elizabeth played cribbage with Mr. Rhodes, and Elsie gave snatches of desultory music at the piano; every time the fresh young voice rang out in joyous song Elizabeth started as if an unseen dagger had stabbed her very heart.

At last it was still, and pass a day with us before long, I hope," Mr. Rhodes said, when the time came at last to order the carriage for his departure.

Elizabeth only answered with a wan smile. She could hardly stand. Mellen responded that she would gladly do so, and she instant they disappeared Elizabeth started for the door.

"Where are you going?" asked Elsie.

"To my room; I can't bear this."

"I'll go—"

"No, no, not yet; stay awhile, for heaven's sake let me rest alone one moment. She staggered through the dining-room and was gone; when Mellen entered the library again Elsie sat alone by the fire, tearing the ball cat, and looking as pretty and childlike as ever.

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE clock in Elizabeth's dressing-room had struck eleven, but there she sat desolately looking into the fire. Not a sob had sunk into her chair on first entering the chamber.

She had heard her husband and Elsie ascend the stairs a full hour before, but Mr. Mellen went straight on towards his own apartments; he had not entered hers since the day the bracelet was found; she knew well that he would not intrude upon her then.

For two long hours she had been alone with her dismal thoughts, no sound to break the stillness, save the monotonous ticking of the clock or an occasional moan from the half spent wind without.

There was too much wretchedness in her mind for any of the nervous terrors which had haunted her during the day. Then, as she thought what the events of the night would bring her to do, the heart in her bosom shuddered. Now it stood still and seemed hardening into iron. If some spirit had appeared with an articulate warning she could not have been more convinced that exposure and ruin were approaching her with rapid strides. She would not flee from it, but that she knew in her innermost soul would lead to destruction. She looked back on the past resolutely, and tried to remember if her plans had failed through her own weakness. Before Mellen's return it had seemed possible to carry them out, but since the joyful yet utterly sad hour in the palace of hope on its grave, but they had all failed. It was not her fault, she had borne up as bravely as she possibly could have done under the circumstances, had been as circumspect and guarded as it was possible to be, but from the moment of his unexpected return all her outward event had occurred to thwart every project she had endeavored to carry out.

"It is fate," she muttered, in a cold whisper; "it is fate! Oh, my God, help me, help me, for I have yet a night to pray!"

But even the consolation of prayer was denied her; the words seemed to freeze upon her lips; she could only moan in that hoarse whisper:

"My God, help me, help me!"

As she sat there, the door opened and Elsie softly entered the apartment, already half undressed for evening-dress, and put on a loose white wrapper; over that she had thrown a crimson shawl, which made the pallor that had come over her face still more apparent.

There was no light in the chamber except that given by the fire.

Elizabeth had extinguished the lamps; the gloom and the shadows befitted her mournful thoughts.

"Bessie, Bessie?" called Elsie, unable at first to distinguish any object in the half light. "Are you there?"

"Here I am," was the hoarse answer; "come in."

"I was so afraid to be alone with Grant," continued Elsie; "I felt as if I should scream every moment."

"What did he say to you; what did my husband talk about?"

"Oh, nothing in particular; he said very little; he did not even ask where you were. I told him you had gone to bed with a headache, but he did not seem to hear. He sat and looked in the fire, sad; he were reading something in the red hot coals. After a long time he asked me if I loved him, and kissed my forehead. That was all."

Elizabeth struck her hands hard together, choked back the groan which rose to her lips, and sat gazing still into the fire, as if she too read something terrible in the scarlet caverns into which it was breaking.

"I'm so cold," shivered Elsie; "there isn't half enough coal in the grate."

Cold! The chill had crept into Elizabeth's very soul which no power could ever warm, and close to her was that wicked creature crouched, moaning out her petty complaints!

Even hours, up to the last, while the glittering hands of the clock were seen in the firelight, creeping swiftly over the dial, and its solemn tick measured off the awful minute on which Elizabeth had agreed with her own soul to go forth on that terrible errand, the wretched woman was cold!pelled to pause in that dim chamber, worse than dead herself, to endure and soothe the creature who lay like a wounded fawn on the hearth.

"What time is it, Bessie?"

She raised herself and looked at the clock.

"Half-past eleven," answered Elizabeth, solemnly. "My hour has come."

"I thought it was later," groaned Elsie. "Will it never be morning?"

"Soon enough," whispered Elizabeth; "soon enough."

"I wonder if Grant has gone to bed; I asked him if he was sleepy, and he—"

"Well?"

"Oh, he only gave a queer sort of laugh, and said 'Sensible people always are sleepy when it comes bedtime.'"

Elizabeth had said truly her hour had come, but she could not go yet; she must wait until all danger of discovery was past and there breathless while her husband forgot his restless thoughts in temporary peace. They were both silent for a time, Elizabeth hoping to shiver again, like some young bird lost from its nest in a storm.

"Oh, if it would only be morning!"

"Soon enough, soon enough," repeated Elizabeth, as before.

"To talk to me; I shall die if you don't!"

"What can I say, child? I can only wait—wait."

"Wait! What do you mean? Oh, I know—I know!"

The girl broke off with a more violent shudder and buried her face in her hands.

"What made you remind me?" she cried. "I shall go crazy now. Bessie! Bessie!"

But this time, when she clung to her, Elizabeth removed her hands, not impatiently, but with quiet firmness.

"You must control yourself," she said. "I have upon me all I can bear now. Be still, Elsie!"

"I will, I will!" she sobbed. "Oh, wouldn't it be better to be dead?"

"Better! Yes, a thousand times; but it is not easy to die."

Elsie checked her sobs again, and caught at the hope with which she had buoyed herself up all day.

"This is the last of it," she said; "this night once safely over and there is an end."

"One way or the other," muttered Elizabeth.

"What did you say?"

"Nothing—nothing."

It was worse than useless to agitate the girl's weakness stood in the thoughts which were in her mind. Whichever way the end came Elsie was safe. Was the creature thinking that as she shot her eyes and leaned more closely against her sister?

"Yes, it will be all safe then," she went on. "The money is paid—we shall have the papers; there is nothing more to fear."

Elizabeth did not answer, she allowed her to think that the danger from that quarter was removed. It could do no good to fill her with added fears.

"There is the wind again" cried Elsie. "Oh, if it would only stop!"

The sound recalled the horror which lay in the lower regions, and she was answered again.

"You are not frightened, are you, Bessie?" she asked.

"I suppose not; there is nothing to fear."

"But to go that in the dark—alone! Oh, I ought to go with you; I'll try—I'll try."

At that late hour some remorse woke in her mind for her unsisterly selfishness, but Elizabeth said:

"You will stay here; you could do no good."

"But I shall go mad while you are gone."

"You must get into bed again."

"How long shall you be away?"

"I can't tell. Stop—don't talk about it. I shall go through with it all; let me alone till then."

Elsie writhed to and fro in hysterical weakness.

"You must stop," Elizabeth said. "Suppose he should hear you?"

"Grant? Oh, I'll be still—I'll be still."

"What time is it?" Elsie asked again.

"Almost twelve; the clock will strike in a moment."

"How much longer shall you wait?" asked the girl in a whisper.

"I don't know; I must discover if he is asleep."

"Grantley?

"Yes."

"What was that noise?" Elizabeth exclaimed suddenly.

"I heard nothing," Elsie answered, lifting her head and allowing it to fall again on her sister's knee.

"It sounded like a step in the hall," said Elizabeth.

"It was only your fancy," returned Elsie. "This house is as still as death."

Elizabeth rose from her chair and walked to the window.

"You are not going?" Elsie cried.

"No; I only want to look. Be still!"

Elsie cowered down on the rug and muffled herself more closely in her shawl, being quite still, with a sort of comfort in the feeling of warmth which began to creep over her.

Elizabeth pushed back the heavy curtains and looked out into the night. A stream of dim silvery radiance shot into the room and played like rippling water over the floor.

Elsie half started to her feet with a cry.

"What is that? What is that?"

"The moon is up," said Elizabeth, simply.

Elsie laid her head down again, Elizabeth stood leaning her hands on the window-sill, looking straight before her.

The moonlight was peculiarly clear, and millions of stars shone forth with the diamond radiance only in a frosty night. Every object was visible. Hoar frost shone up widely from the crisp grass of the lawn, and long, black shadows were cast downward by the trees, shaken up like drapery when the wind tossed the branches up and down.

From where Elizabeth stood she could look out over the withered flowerbeds and into the thicket beyond.

Suddenly her eye caught sight of the cypress tree, rising up gloomy and dark, its branches waving slowly to and fro, looking, to her excited fancy, like spectral hands that beckoned her forth to her task.

She uttered a faint sound and strained her eyes towards it with a chill feeling of horror. Elsie was roused again by the noise, and asked, quickly:

"What is the matter?"

"Nothing, nothing."

"What made you groan, then?"

"I am sometimes cold," returned Elizabeth, in a low voice, leaning more heavily against the window for support.

"Then away, come away!" cried Elsie, ruffling her face more closely in her shawl, as if to shut out some dreadful object. "Come back to the fire, Elizabeth, for—"

"Surely, if I can go out there," she said, "I have courage enough to look at the old tree."

Elsie only moaned now. She sat upright and rested herself against the chair her sister had left.

"How does it look, Bessie?" she asked, in a low, scared tone.

"The moonlight is so ghostly," returned Elizabeth; "it looks frightened. No wonder—no wonder it do!"

Elsie trembled more violently, but it seemed as if some power stronger than her own will forced her to put these questions.

"And the cypress, Bessie, how does it look?"

"Stern and dark," cried Elizabeth. "It beckons me with its long arms. How like giant arms beckoning me out. I must go—I must go!"

Her voice was little more than a whisper, but it was perfectly steady and distinct. Elsie buried her face in both hands, once more to shut out the images it conjured up.

"Come back!" she moaned; "Elizabeth, come back!"

"I must go. It is time."

"What—all—just a moment! Don't go yet—don't leave me—I shall die here alone."

Elsie dragged herself along the floor to where Elizabeth stood and caught her dress in a convulsive grasp.

"Wait a little—just a little?"

Her very weakness seemed to give Elizabeth a sort of insane composure.

"Let go my dress," she said; "I must be gone."

"I can't—I can't leave—can't!"

"Be still—you must!"

She wrenched the garments from Elsie's hands, and the girl fell helplessly on the floor.

"Let me creep into bed first," she moaned; "I shall run mad if you leave me here. Oh, I'll go—I will go, I will. What an unnatural creature I am! I'll go!"

"Hush! You must stay; you would only hinder me."

"But it's so wicked of me—"

"Don't talk, don't think—it is too late," whispered Elizabeth. "If you can pray, do it."

"I can't—I daren't! Help me up, Elizabeth—help me up."

But there was no response. Elizabeth was bending towards the window again, looking straight at the cypress tree, but the dread which had been in her face before was weak compared to the horror that convulsed it now.

"It is going there" she cried, in an awful voice.

Elsie caught hold of her and raised herself so as to look out of the window.

"Who—who? What do you mean?"

"See—see!" continued Elizabeth. "Some one is creeping to the cypress tree. He has a spade in his hand. Merciful God, it is too late!"

"Is it Grantley?" shrieked Elsie. "Is it Grantley?"

"There he goes! I told you I heard steps! My God! my God!"

She fell on her knees by the window, still staring out into the spectral light. Elsie gave one glance, saw her brother running swiftly towards the cypress and then sank back, unable to venture another look.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

ALONE in his room, Grantley Mellen had sat for hours with only stern thoughts for his companions and with them so black and fierce that the most terrible crisis would have been less hard to endure than that horrible suspense.

He waited silent, immovable, till the last sound in the house died away; waited still for slumber to overtake every inmate of the dwelling, that he might carry out the plan he had formed.

He was going out to the cypress tree; he would discover if his wife's agitation, when he perceived digging about it, was in any way connected with the mystery which surrounded her. He believed that it was so, though in what manner it was in a possible to divine. Perhaps there were letters hidden there—some condemning evidence against her which she had found no opportunity since his return to make away with. Whatever it was, he would discover it, drag it out, and with this fresh proof of her treachery in his hands, rush in to overwhelm her with his knowledge of her guilt.

He, too, sat watching the clock, counting the strokes as the hours sounded, but to him the time appointed did not arrive quickly. It seemed as if the hands scarcely moved, in his mad impatience he thought the appointed instant never would approach.

It was a terrible vigil that he kept; the strongest man could not for many hours have endured that wild suspense, while tortured by such fiendish whispers as moaned in his ear.

The time came at last; the moonlight streamed pale and uncertain through the casement; no sound broke the stillness, even the wind had ceased its moaning. He could go forth now without fear of discovery.

He could go forth, but to what?

His very inability to form the least idea of what discoveries he might make increased the fever of his impatience, he could not wait longer—not a moment—not a second.

He opened the door and crept cautiously through the gallery, down stairs into the lower hall, undid the fastenings of the outer door and passed on to the veranda.

The garden tools were some of them in a closet in the area; he went down the steps, opened the door, took out a spade and hurried towards the cypress tree.

There he was, standing under the moaning branches, his head bare, digging wildly and aimlessly about the roots, peering at every lump of earth with his insane gaze, ready to believe that he had at last come upon that for which he sought.

And while he dug furiously into the earth Elsie beth Mellen knelt by the window-seat watching him, and Elsie lay upon the floor, too utterly prostrated to do more than cry out to Elizabeth at intervals in her sharp, discordant voice:

"Is he there yet—is he there?"

"Still there," she answered.

"What is he doing?"

"Digging, digging! He is on the wrong side of the tree."

Elsie gave a cry of relief.

"No, no," continued Elizabeth; "he stops to throw the earth back—he is going farther round."

"Has he found the place—has he?"

"Not yet."

Elsie could not even groan; her breath came in quick gasps; her hands tore madly at the carpet, but Elizabeth leaned motionless against the window-sill, watching always with her insane gaze.

"Where is he now, Bessie?"

"He has not reached it—he is near! No! he is digging on the other side—he has not found the place."

"If we could only stop him," cried Elsie, roused to new courage. "If I opened my window and called out."

"Too late, too late!"

"But he will find it—he will find it!"

"Then God help me, I can do no more!"

Elsie sprang up with another shriek.

"You'll tell—you'll tell! I know you will give way—and Grant will murder you—murder us all."

Elizabeth caught her in her arms and forced her back on the sofa.

"Lie still," she said.

"Let me go, I say—let me go! I want to die—I won't live after he finds you out. I'll kill you, Elizabeth, if you don't let me go."

But Elizabeth held her firmly in spite of her insane struggles, crying out:

"It is nothing to you—you have no cause to fear. You are mad, mad! I tell you the trouble is mine; whatever comes falls on my head; be still, Elsie."

"You promise. Swear it—swear not to bring my name in."

"I have sworn and I will keep my oath," returned Elizabeth. "Disgrace, infamy, death—all will bear him and alone. What should I gain by dragging you down with me?"

She fell away from the girl as she spoke, but Elsie did not attempt to rise; she lay still now, exhausted by her recent violence, and reassured by Elizabeth's words.

Again the woman leaned against the window, still and looked out towards the tree. Mellen was at work still, more furiously than ever, throwing up great mouthfuls of earth and dashing them down with frantic haste.

"Is he there yet?" called Elsie.

"Yes, yes! How he works—dig—dig—dig!"

She stopped suddenly, the silence raised wilder terror in Elsie's mind.

"Has he found the place?"

"Not yet. He is standing still now, he is throwing the earth back."

"What next—what now?" called Elsie, when she paused.

"He is looking about—he is puzzled. There is only that place left—he will miss it. The shadows lie blackest there."

Another instant of intent watching, then a low cry.

"He is there—he is there!"

"Stop him!" shrieked Elsie. "Shout to him!"

And Elizabeth only moaned again:

"Too late! too late!"

"Is he digging?"

"Yes; wait—wait!"

She clutched the window-sill until her nails bent and broke in the woodwork.

"First on one side, then the other," she whispered. "He doesn't touch the right spot—I know it so well—night and day I have seen it——"

"Elizabeth! Elizabeth!"

She never heeded the mad cry, clinging closer and closer to the window-frame, staring out as if every energy of her nature was centred in that gaze.

"He has not found it! He stops again—he throws down the spade! He is stamping on the ground. Oh! once more!"

Then another pause, and at last Elizabeth cried in the same sharp whisper:

"He is throwing the earth back—he turns away!"

"Saved! saved!" shrieked Elsie.

Elizabeth watched his every movement still. He stood for some moments in quiet, then walked about the tree; she could feel the baffled rage and shock him.

He turned away at last, disappeared round the corner of the house. Then Elizabeth sprang to her feet.

"Where are you going?" cried Elsie.

"Lie still—don't speak on your life!"

She ran to the door and locked it, then threw herself down by the fire.

"He might come in and find us," she whispered. Elsie crept across the floor again, seeking protection at her side. There they waited, hushing their breaths, listening for the echo of his step on the stairs. It came at last, muffled and cautious, but terribly distinct to their strained senses. He half paused at the room where they were, passed on, the door of his chamber opened and shut.

"He has gone in," said Elizabeth.

"Saved! saved!" broke again from Elsie's lips, but there was no answering echo from the woman by her side.

For a time they sat motionless, whether moments or hours neither of them ever could have told.

At last Elizabeth rose, moved noiselessly across the chamber, while Elsie raised her head to look.

"What are you going to do?" she asked.

"You know," Elizabeth answered.

"You won't—you won't! Oh, wait—wait!"

"And to-morrow have the whole house to look on while the work is done," the woman answered.

"It shows no other way."

"None. This is the last hope; I shall try it."

There was no elation in her voice at the danger she had escaped, no fear in the way now that she might go through her task in safety, no dread either of what she had to do, only stern determination, the chill of utter despair, ready to struggle but not to hope. She wrapped a shawl about her without the slightest appearance of haste, and stood still a little longer. Then, more like a marble statue endowed with the power of motion than a breathing, living creature.

"Are you going?" Elsie asks.

"Yes; I shall not be long—not long."

But Elsie rushed after her and caught her in her arms, and cried:

"I can't stay; I must go with you."

"Stay here, I tell you. Will you lose our last chance? Let me go—let me go!"

"I can't—I daren't! I should go mad!"

Every moment is worth a whole life," cried Elizabeth. "Let me go!"

She forced the girl to release her hold, and with the fields was Elsie left senseless to the floor.

"Better so," muttered the woman. "When she comes to herself the medicine will make her sleep."

The excitement she was labouring under gave her new strength. She raised the insensible girl, carried her through the vacant chamber, and laid her on the bed in the next room. For a few instants she stood regarding her, then drew the bedclothes over her inanimate form and turned away.

"I have kept my faith," was all she said. "I will keep it to the end—the bitter, bitter end."

She went back to her own room, closing the doors as she passed them, descended further delay, passed down the private staircase which led to the little entry off the library.

Once on the stairs she paused to listen, but there was no sound, and she hurried on noiseless as a spirit. One of the shutters was ajar, admitting a few gleams of light, by which she could see to unbar the door.

She was out in the air at last; the first step was taken safely. She found the spade where Mellen had flung down in his angry disappointment, and she also in turn flew towards the cypress tree. She was darker in the shadow, the branches writhed and moaned like living things, the moon shot in and out the gathering clouds, casting a flickering, uncertain light about that was more terrible than the deepest gloom.

She had no need to search, only too well she knew the place where she must dig. Night and day for weeks the dread spot had been with her, in every dream she had been digging, as she was now—digging—digging with frantic haste, and in her dreams, her strength seemed to fail, and some unseen power to hold her back, so now, in that frightful reality, her arms did fall helplessly and the crusted earth resisted her efforts.

To and fro the branches swayed above her head, casting blossoms about, moaning like evil voices. The wind swept up chill and warningly, but she toiled on.

Such a terrible face it was that bent over the work, such a pale, terrified face, lighted up with those agonised eyes! She worked with a strength that appeared superhuman, but it seemed to her that all her toil made no progress.

The cold nights had frozen the earth. She remembered, too, how carefully it had been packed down over the spot. For nights after the hollow sound of the spade had rung in her ears, and nothing could drown its echo.

Still she toiled on, she would not give up. A horrible fear was coming over her, a supernatural, ghostly dread, that made her flesh creep and her hair rise on her temples, but she never relinquished her efforts.

Spadeful after spadeful of earth was thrown out, but still the bottom was not reached. She had not thought it deep—so deep. If it should be empty—if there was nothing there!

That thought paralyzed her arm as if it had been struck by a hand of iron. If the place had been searched before, if the least possibility of removing that terrible evidence was gone beyond her power!

The idea was too maddening. She shook off the nightmarelike oppression which had been upon her, caught up the spade again, and resumed her task.

Suddenly the shovel struck some substance harder than the earth, and rang out with a dull, heavy sound. For one instant she started back. She was alone in the night, alone with that before her! She dared not even peer into the cavity. It was choked up with shadows, and their blackness seemed to warn her off.

The mighty strength that had carried this woman forward till now left her. The coil pierced her through and through; but she must not pause there, her horrible task was but just commenced. She took up the spade again, dropped it into the impalpable darkness of the hole, and pressed it down, leaning her whole weight upon it. A sharp pain shot through her chest, and she stood up struggling for breath. Shadows from the disturbed cypress boughs were falling all about her, breaking and forming again in a thousand fantastic movements. But one shadow, dark, solid and still, fell across a glimmer of moonlight at her feet, freezing her to the heart. She looked slowly up and saw her husband.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

FOR seven seconds the husband and wife remained looking at each other in utter silence; the moaning of the cypress boughs sounded louder and more weird; through the whirl of her senses Elizabeth heard it still.

"Come forward," she heard her husband's voice say at length, in the hard, icy tones of concentrated passion. "Come forward, woman, that I may see your face."

The words seemed to come from a great distance; Elizabeth did not stir, it seemed as if that shallow trench between them was a bottomless gulf which no power could bridge over. The gulf between their souls—and ever.

"Come forward, I say."

She staggered slowly into the moonlight; the moment was fearfully real, disgrace had come; yet there she stood speechless, motionless, unable even to give utterance to a moan.

For a little while Grant was almost as still and helpless as herself. Suddenly, with a cry that sounded scarcely human, he snatched the spade, hurled it from the hole—and pressed all his force upon it. Slowly the edge of a box appeared. Mellen placed one foot on the handle of the spade to hold it down, and dragged the box entirely out into the moonlight. Pulling the spade up from the crumbling earth, he raised it on high, and was about to dash the box in. Elizabeth lifted her soiled hands in mute appeal.

She hoped nothing from his forbearance. The action was a mechanical one of her whirling senses, such as makes a drowning man clutch at straws, but with the box, obviously, could she fall upon but it knows by the box, still lifting her white face to his.

"Do you think to stop me even now?" he exclaimed. "I wonder I do not kill you; I wonder I don't dig this pit, which has concealed your infamy, deeper and bury you alive."

"If you only would kill me," she moaned; "only kill me."

"I should be," he cried again; stand up, I say."

But she stretched out her hands over the box; some insane idea of still preserving it from his touch rushed across her mind.

"I will open it; I will look on this dishonor with my own eyes."

"Don't open it; don't open it! Let us pass away from your sight for ever."

He caught her arm and pulled her roughly back.

"You shall not touch the dead."

She struggled on to her knees and wound her arms about his, as his fingers grasp; he shook her off with a loathing gesture, as if a poisonous reptile had brushed his garments.

He raised the spade again, and while a last despairing cry died on her lips dashed it heavily down upon the cover; again and again; till the wood board split, revealing a gleam of white underneath.

Elizabeth was lying on the ground; not insensible; no fainting fit had come to her; but incapable of a movement; watching him always with those insane eyes.

He paused at last, exhausted itself in this sacrilegious violence, and he stood over the shattered box, struck with remorseful awe. But the wind blew cold over it, lifting some fold of transparent muslin from a little face that Elizabeth had seen night and day in her thoughts and her dreams since the dreadful night when that grave was dug under the cypress tree.

She saw the face; saw her husband looking down upon it; saw all the shuddering horror in his eyes. Still she could not move.

"This has been a murder!" he hissed through his clenched teeth. "I swear that the guilty ones shall be brought to judgment."

"No, no," she moaned; "not murder; not that."

He caught her arm again and dragged her up.

"Tell the truth," he cried; "I will hear it!"

She could only stare at him with that affrighted gaze.

"I will bring the whole neighborhood to look," he went on; "I will call on his secret guilt out in the face of day if you do not speak! I will give you no time; no chance of escape; speak, or I will rouse the whole house, and let them see you here with this."

"Wait," she shivered; "wait!"

"Do you know what this is?" he cried. "The murder of a child! Do you know that to-morrow may find you a criminal in the hands of justice—you, my wife! You in whose care I entrusted not only my honor but the most innocent soul that ever lived. Speak then! Expect no mercy from me; not to save my own honor; not to keep my own soul would I lift one finger to help you! Think of it! Picture it to yourself! The eager crowd gathering about this spot; the hootings and execrations that will follow you forth to the prison! Think of the days and nights in your lonely cell; remember the trial; the sentence; the horrible death; you shall not escape; you shall not escape!"

"Grantley! Grantley!"

"Not content with one crime, you have added murder; tried to hide your guilt with a deeper sin!"

"This child was dead," she moaned; "it was dead."

"You will speak then, and tell the whole truth. Do it. But have no thought that even confession can save you; never hope for mercy from my weakness! You can have no agency that can prove so relentless as I will; if there was a hope of your escape I would hunt you down!"

"It is only to die," she muttered; "only to die."

"Will you speak; will you confess! Tell me how you murdered it?"

"There was no murder."

"But you will tell me; you and those who shared your guilt? Who were they; Speak that man's name; I will have it, and from your lips. But, oh, if you have let my sister share this secret; if you have blighted her innocence with a knowledge of your guilt——"

"Stop," she broke in; "stop! do not speak of her."

Even in that moment some recollections came back. She had no horns on to the end; her work must not fail at the last moment.

"Elsie knows nothing," she said; "for Her sake spare me."

"If you wish to escape having your shame dragged before the whole world, tell me the truth."

"For her sake, for Elsie's, have mercy! I don't expect it—but, remember, disgrace to me reflects not only on you but her! Think of that—don't blight her whole future in crushing me!"

And I left her in your hands—she has been living in daily intercourse with you—but have stained her lips with your kisses—degraded her by your affection."

"I love not hurt her," she cried; "I tell you she never received harm from me."

There was only one thought in her mind now, to preserve Elsie from his anger—nothing could come to her now. Her present agony was too great for dread—the shame of the world—the most loathsome punishment—nothing could touch pangs as this wrenching away of hope and happiness.

She sat upright on the ground, folding her hands in her lap. Weaker women would have fainted, perhaps gone mad, but now that the first dizzy whirl had left her senses she could see and think clearly.

"And you buried this child?" he said. "Will you own it, or shall I charge the servants as your accomplices—will you carry out your guilt to the last, and let others suffer that you may escape?"

"No, no! I will not struggle. I do not defend myself. Let it all fall on me! But no murder, no foul charge can rest with murder. Oh, I am not so bad as that—I could not bear any of God's creatures."

"Is not your sin worse than murder? Why, the blackest criminal has white hands compared to yours! You that I loved and trusted—you that have dragged a proud man's soul through the depths of your sin."

"I have not, I have not!" she broke in.

He pointed to the box—that could she say—how could she deny with that evidence at her feet.

"Oh, my God, have mercy!" she groaned.

"Will you take his name on you—don't curse yourself more deeply by a prayer!"

She crouched lower on the ground, her wild eyes never raised to heaven, but there was no help—no aid.

"That name," cried Mellen; "I will hear it from your own lips—speak."

She was silent.

"I know it—I have been on your track for days. The wretched man's life was destroyed my life, trampled on my honor, but you must choose for the partner of your guilt the man who had most cruelly wronged me—the one for I had no earth."

"No, no! I never saw that man—never!"

"Peace, woman! I tell you I intercepted yesterday the letter he sent you—I could not mistake William Ford's writing."

She did cry out then—this was a horror of which he had not dreamed.

"I never knew it," she moaned; "I never knew it."

"And you love this wretch? Through him you shall suffer!"

"I hate him, loathe him!" she cried. "Oh, in this one thing believe me—I am innocent of his vice. Ford. The name was changed to deceive me."

"I would not believe a word from your lips though you brought an angel as witness."

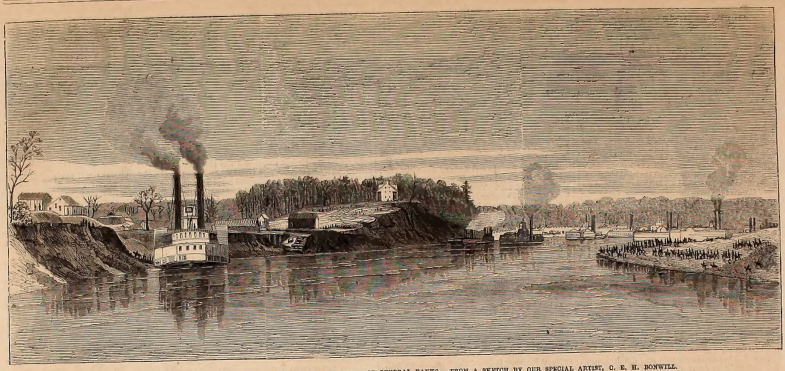
Then he looked down at the little coffin, and a fierce gust of insanity swept over him.

"I will take his name on you—officer of justice!"

She caught his cost and held him firmly.

"For Elsie's sake—don't overshadow her life with the same name that on me. Let me go away—you shall never hear of me again—I will never cross your path! I do not ask for mercy, but for your sister's sake, for your own honorable name, let me go away and die."

There was a wild struggle in his mind, but something like reflection came back at length.



"Alack," of the Tremont Hotel, is perhaps the most "ridgety" man in the Territory. Being a thorough-bred Democrat, he is sometimes pretty hard on the upper ten—or aristocrats, as he calls them.

"And what kind of an animal may an aristocrat be?" asked a bystander.

"What species of the genus Aristocrat do you mean? There are a number of them," said mine host.

"The Codfish."

"Well, sir, a codfish aristocrat is one of those consumers who can pin a dried herring to his coat-tail, and imagine himself to be a whale!"

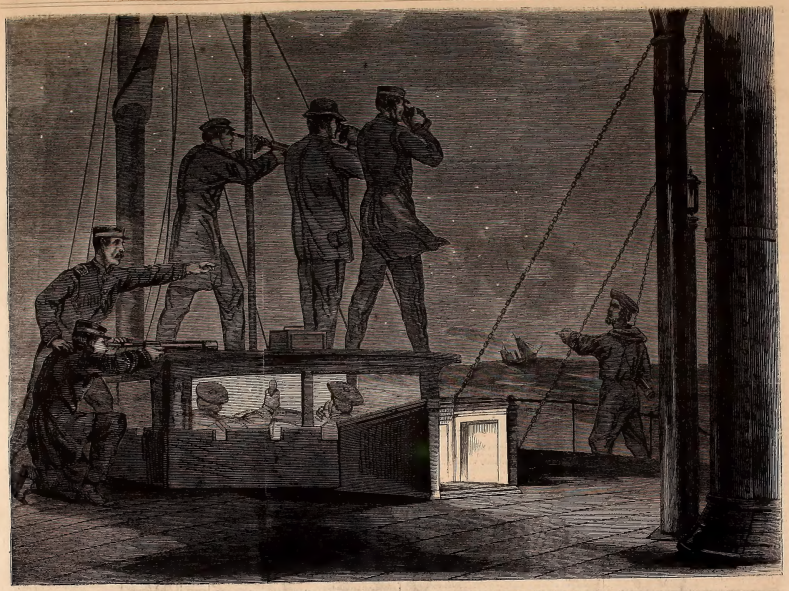
THE WAR IN LOUISIANA—THE FORTIFICATIONS AT GRAND ECORE—THE FIRST MISSOURI BATTERY.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, C. E. H. BONWILL.



GRAND ECORE, LA.

THIS is the spot to which Gen. Banks fell back after the defeat of the Union forces and the battle of Pleasant hill. It is just above Natchitoches, on the Red river, and derives its name from the great bluff on which it stands. During his occupancy of the point Gen. Banks threw up extensive fortifications, a part of which the 1st Missouri battery, Lieut. Callahan commanding, protecting the road to Natchitoches, our Artist represents in his sketch. These temporary works were made of logs and sandbags.

The house on the bluff in the view of Grand Ecore itself is the residence of Col. De Russy, Chief Engineer of the Trans-Mississippi Department in the Confederate service.

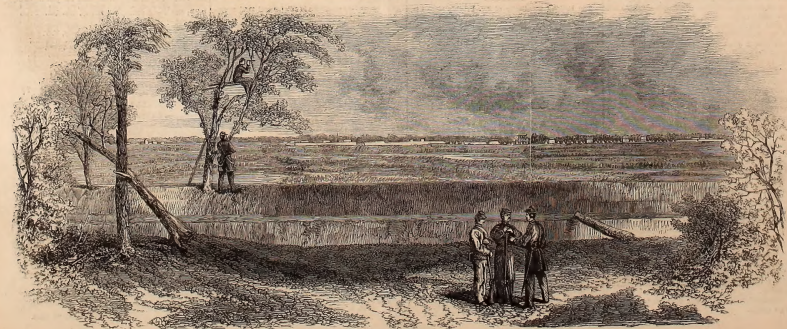
MINNIE GREY.

BY J. H. WEBB.

A VERY strange little being was Minnie, Parson Grey's daughter. So beautiful, yet so habitually sad. I see her now, in imagination, with her large, lustrous black eyes, shining ringlets and delicate little form; and I see, too, that expression of settled melancholy that always appeared upon her face.

Minnie and I had been friends, companions, schoolmates, almost from infancy. Our families were close neighbors, and as Minnie had no brother to guard her from harm during the school terms, I was only too happy to supply a brother's place. And I remember, too, as I now look back through the many years that have passed, how envious my male schoolmates were at my guardianship, and how often I received a bruised head for defending myself and my little lady from the taunts, the sneers and the jibes of larger boys.

Was it strange, then, that our friendship should grow with our youth, and strengthen with our strength? And was it strange that when youth ripened into maturity the friendship of schooldays should transform itself into a warmer passion—a more than fraternal feeling?



WELL OF THE WESTOVER MANSION, NEAR HARRISON'S LANDING, ON JAMES RIVER, VIRGINIA.

When I left the little country town, the home of my youth, to accept a situation in the metropolis, the old story had passed between Minnie and me. She would patiently wait a few years for the realization of my dreams of worldly prosperity, and then——

But enough of that. Life in the city was anything but pleasant to me at first. My business seemed irksome and dull; everything was new and strange to me, and I heartily wished myself back in the little village with the friends of my youth—with Minnie. But I struggled hard to dispel these melancholy feelings, remembering the stake for which I was to play in the game of life—and conquered.

Those precious little missives which I weekly received from Minnie. What a comfort they were to me in my loneliness, and how they nerved me on to use every energy for advancement and ultimate success. And that tender, loving, yet half-melancholy sentiment which pervaded all her letters—how it reminded me of the little dark-eyed beauty's nature—a pen picture of her inner being.

But time passed on—one, two, three years, and with it my notions of city life underwent a gradual though material change. The strange scenes had become familiar; the bustle and confusion of city life had lost their terrors; I had formed new acquaintances and pleasant associations, and had become, indeed, a thorough metropolitan. But another change occurred in my feelings at the same time. A LESSON OF LIFE.

BY BERTRAM R. URBAN.

ILLUSTRATIONS BY DARLEY.

PRICE 25 CENTS.

The striking peculiarity of Mr. Urban's stories is, that he successfully combines the mystery of amusement to the last—sustains it so adroitly as to puzzle the conjectures of even determined novel readers, who are familiar with the unravelment of ordinary plots; and, though there is a certain degree of mystery in his plots, there never is the slightest improbability.

Mailed, free of postage, on receipt of price.

Hastily I entered the house. In her own room, and lying upon her own bed, was Minnie. Death had surely marked her for his victim. But she was more beautiful than ever before. Her nearness to the celestial home had given her a pure, holy and angelic beauty, which is not of this world. The fanning by an attendant caused the jetty curls to wave, and revealed the pallid brow upon which I had implanted so many tokens of affection. Her pure soul was perhaps even then entering the portals of heaven, while I, self-convicted of cruelty, witnessed the transition from life to death. Need I say that in that moment all the old love for Minnie returned, even with tenfold power. Need I tell of the agony which filled my heart at the thought of parting with my little dark-eyed schoolmate, my youthful companion, and once promised bride?

"Minnie! dear Minnie!" I exclaimed in frenzied accents, "you must not die. Live for me. Oh! my God! how cruelly I have wronged you," and the tears of repentance and grief fell upon the little white hand which I had grasped in my own. The sightless eyes opened, the thin lips moved, and in a voice sweet even in the portals of death she said:

"Dear Arthur, I am so glad you have come. I would like to see you once more, but God has decreed otherwise. I have entered the dark valley of the shadow of death, and shall soon be in that land where the blind shall see the——"

Her voice faltered, her hand clasped mine, a heavenly smile irradiated her countenance, and she was gone.

* * * * *

A quarter of a century has passed, and gray hairs now cover my head, but the memory of Minnie Grey remains fresh in my mind. Twice every year I visit the little village where we lived, and out in the churchyard I go to weep over the little green mound, and to view the plain marble slab bearing the simple inscription—"Sacred to the Memory of Minnie Grey."

Literary Agency, Established in 1862.
The subscriber has, for more than 20 years past, been in the habit of editing and preparing manuscripts for the Press. At first this labor was one of kindness, for benefiting a friend only. But it became so burdensome, and absorbed so much time, that a small charge for the labor of a preliminary fee became necessary. This fee, from time to time, and generally has been, to both parties, a careful and critical perusal of a work in manuscript, and the offering of it, if approved, to publishers.

The subscriber continues to receive and read manuscripts in the same manner, giving his candid opinion of their merits, and of the probability of their finding publication, when desired to do so. He makes his charges as small as possible, since his chief object is aid and benefit authors.

In all cases letters of advice should be forwarded by mail, while manuscripts are sent, prepaid, either through the Post Office or by express, legibly addressed.

Who Makes the Best
ARTIFICIAL LEGS?

The following correspondence will explain itself:

CINCINNATI, March 6, 1864.

E. Gunther Jr., Esq., Pere, La Salle Co., Ill.

Dear Sir—I am in want of an artificial leg, but do not know what kind to get, and have decided to write to several parties wearing different legs, and get their advice, as I have not the means to experiment myself. Learning that you were wearer of "Corrupted Medallic Leg" since last August I take the liberty of asking for your opinion of the merits, and also for your experience with other kinds. Although an entire stranger, I feel that you will be willing to oblige a fellow sufferer, JAMES E. PAINTER.

REPLY:

PERE, La Salle Co., April 11, 1864.

Mr. Painter, Cincinnati, O.

Dear Sir—Yours of March 16th, just received, and contents noted. You say you want my opinion on the corrupted bronze leg. In reply, would say:

1st. That if you get such a leg as J. W. Weston, 491 Broadway, New York, sells me, you will get a good, substantial leg.

2d. I can give you my opinion in a candid way. I will answer you candidly. If you get a leg made out of wood, you may find one for less or at least a year; in that time your stump will get thinner a good deal, and then you will have to pad the socket (or where the stump goes in). In my experience with wooden legs, I have found that to be a very annoying process, and is easily broken. In the metallic leg, this is done away with by a steel spring, for this spring takes up a joint and every time you step upon an uneven surface, it yields like your natural foot. You will see that the metallic leg is altogether superior to a wooden one, and costs only one-half what a wooden one costs. Another reason is, that the mechanism in the metallic leg is very simple, where the wooden leg is so complicated that it anything gives out you will have to send it (the wooden leg) back to the manufacturers, and they will charge you a good round sum for the fixing of it. You will hardly find anyone to fix it, you, that when, after six months' wearing of my wooden limb, the knee broke so that I was obliged to put it up to the manufactory to get new hinges, they charged me $15 a piece of new hinges. I, for one, advise you to get a metallic leg for cheapness, durability and neatness.

If you should want any more information in regard to my experience with mine, and I will answer right away. Hoping you may be suited at less than it cost me, for I have paid out over $200 for mine.

I remain yours,
E. GUNTHER, JR.

Advantages the Metallic Leg has over all others:

1st. A fit guaranteed in all cases, and is self-adjusting.

2d. No need of coming to New York to be fitted, thereby saving time and expense.

3d. Being made of metal, with a rubber ankle, it does not get out of order.

4th. It is much more noiseless, is lighter, cheaper, and more durable than any wooden leg can be. Sent by express to any part of the country.

OFFER:

I have such implicit confidence in my Improved Metallic Leg, that I will give all sales, on the privilege of returning it if they are not satisfied, after six months' trial. No need of sending the money, less $30. Price from $75 to $100.

Gray's Patent Molded Collars

Have now been before the public for nearly a year. They are universally pronounced the neatest and best-fitting collars extant.

The upper edge presents a perfect curve, free from the angles noticed in all other collars.

These curves come no nearer to the inside of the Turn-down collar—they are AS SMOOTH INSIDE AS OUTSIDE—and therefore cannot fray or wear by the neck.

The Garotte collar has a smooth and evenly finished edge on burnt sizes.

These collars are not simply flat pieces of paper cut in the form of a collar, but are MOLDED AND SHAPED TO FIT THE NECK.

They are made in "Novelty" (or turn-down style), in every size from 13 to 17 inches, and in "Garotte" (or Gorotte), from 13 to 17 inches; and packed in "solid sizes" in neat blue cartons containing 100 each; also in smaller ones of 10 each—the latter a very handy package for travellers. Ask your Dry Goods Store.

EVERY COLLAR is stamped

"Gray's Patent Molded Collar."

Sold by all dealers in Men's Furnishing Goods. The Trade supplied by

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS.

HOSTETTER'S BITTERS ON THE BATTLEFIELD.—It is satisfactory to know that our field hospitals are no longer unsupplied with this life-saving preparation. Soldiers, who, as private citizens, had become acquainted with its properties, have in many instances made a special request that HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS might be added to the medical stores of their regiments, and their wishes have not been unheeded. As a means of sustaining wounded men on the battlefield, and of enabling troops to bear fatiguing marches under a blazing sun, it has been strenuously recommended by distinguished medical men, and the prospect is that it will eventually supercede all the alcoholized tonics, liquors and dangerous Tonics that have heretofore been considered medicinal stapler. The fact that a small quantity of the Bitters mixed with water from any of the Southern or Southwestern rivers will prevent it from affecting the bowels or the liver, should be borne in mind by Army Physicians, soldiers, and all who have occasion to visit those portions of our country. The man who uses HOSTETTER'S BITTERS in the country with the rivers above, may set at defiance Intermittent Fever and all other diseases generated by the action of an unwholesome atmosphere upon an overtaxed frame.

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

The Clouds Lifting—The Day Breaking.

The stupendous military operations of the last two weeks in Virginia and Georgia, and the great and significant Union successes attending them, will admit of but one interpretation. They disclose a system of combinations and co-operative forces on the part of Gen. Grant, which, under his skilful and energetic direction, must speedily put an end to the rebellion. The clouds are lifting, the day is breaking in the East, and the golden hour of the nation's deliverance is near.

The dislodgement of the main rebel army under Gen. Lee from that extensive district of almost impenetrable jungle, south of the Rapidan river, known as "the Wilderness," though not a positive victory to us, was to him a fatal disaster. That difficult field to an invader, of hills and hollows, thick woods and underbrush grown up over old exhausted and abandoned tobacco plantations. Gen. Lee had deliberately chosen for a crushing surprise to his enemy. For this purpose, vastly inferior as he was in cavalry and artillery to Gen. Meade, this "Wilderness," inaccessible to artillery or cavalry, was shrewdly selected. In thus restricting the late battle there to infantry, the rebel army, behind its lines of abatis and earthworks, and familiar with all the inequalities of the ground, possessed advantages for defence and attack which it can never command again. Strategically turned out of that strong position, the last chance of success to the rebel chieftain was lost, his army was adrift, and the fortunes of the campaign were in the hands of Gen. Grant.

For weeks and months the deeply designing enemy had ostentatiously paraded their plans, involving a resistless advance into the loyal States, East and West. The rail Longstreet mounting an immense force for a destructive foray into Ohio, and while a mere detachment would be employed to draw the army of Gen. Meade beyond the Rapidan, the main body of Lee's army, meantime, 100,000 strong, having swept around the Shenandoah valley and across the Potomac, would be thundering at the back door of Washington. To give color to these reports, squads of rebel guerillas hovered along the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, gauges of freebooters for a descent scoured the mountains of Eastern Kentucky, while the savage Gen. Forrest and his 5,000 savage roughriders, with fire and slaughter in his train, locked it over Western Kentucky and Tennessee. All these threatenings and demonstrations were simply intended to divert large bodies of Federal troops to the front of the loyal border States, while the rebel chiefs were concentrating all their accessible forces into the army of Gen. Lee.

These impotent devices, however, were only amusing scarecrows to Gen. Grant. They signally failed to divert him from his own plans and combinations. He saw that the strength of the rebellion was in Lee's army, and that its citadel was Richmond; and so, from the day of his first arrival in Washington as General-in-Chief, Grant's energies were directed to the overthrow of Lee and the capture of Richmond. Now what are the plans of Gen. Grant for compassing these great objects? Comprehending the real designs of the enemy, he first proceeds to strengthen and reorganize the Army of the Potomac—horse, foot and artillery. Next, to cut off Lee's reinforcements and supplies from the South, a formidable movement, army and navy, is organized for active work at the James river. Next, to detach Lee's army and Richmond from the supplies of Lynchburg and the neighboring country, a strong cavalry column under Sigel is detailed up the Shenandoah valley. Lastly, to give employment to Gen. Joe Johnston in Georgia, and all the rebel forces in that quarter, the terrible Sherman, in overwhelming strength, with his face towards Atlanta, sweeps down upon the plains from the mountains of Chattanooga.

This is, indeed, a formidable military cordon, but it may all be broken up if our Army of the Potomac can be inveigled into a scarce and out to pursue; for then, yes once more, the danger to Washington will be the safety of Richmond. The battle of the "Wilderness" has settled that difficulty; and thus while Grant's cavalry and infantry remain intact and are successful on every side, those of the enemy are thrown into confusion, East and West. Our momentous and inspiring successes widen and deepen in the unearthing of Gen. Lee are too deeply impressed upon the public mind to need a recapitulation here. Let it suffice that his shattered army is between two fires: that his communications and scanty supplies are cut off on every side; that while Richmond must speedily fall unless he flies to the rescue, inevitable capture or starvation awaits him in seeking a refuge within that city's defences. Flying westward, from sheer exhaustion and destitution, his disheartened and despairing army will melt and dissolved, and in pausing to fight again he covets immediate destruction.

The final catastrophe to that gigantic imposture, the "Southern Confederacy," approaches. Its huge enormities, its monstrous pretensions, its reckless, self-sacrificing, savage and sanguinary resistance, its perfidy, its puniment, only ending in its absolute extinction, will soon be among the records of past events. The historian, in defining it, will say that, among all the revolutionary conspiracies of history, that Southern rebellion stands in its revolting audacity without a parallel in the vicissitudes of any nation of modern or ancient times; that there never has been upon the face of the earth a more causeless, a more suicidal, a weaker and yet a more formidable rebellion than this; and that in its bloody overthrow, down to its very foundations of slavery, its appalling fate will stand as a warning, or as a beacon, to the ruling classes of every land under the sun till time shall be no more.

More law-suits than love-suits are brought on by attachments.

DECLINED.—Bessie Gray—Fun and Lust Office—Blue Blouse—Minnie Wallace—Ivonne—A Recipe against Poor Relations.

Summary of the Week.

We are now witnesses of a decisive battle, perhaps of the culminating struggle of the war. After three years of unexampled preparation on either side, every State, both parties seemed to have gathered up all available resources, called in all minor armies, and resolved to make one tremendous effort on the Rapidan. Except the muttering of war in Louisiana, all operations seem suspended in expectation of the great drama. The stage is a wide one indeed, as the operations extend from Dalton in Georgia to the banks of James river; but the movements are all guided by one mind, aim at one object, and advance as one man.

VIRGINIA.

In our last week's summary we followed the operations down to Friday, the 6th, when Grant held substantially the same line as on Thursday.

On Saturday, the 7th, he took and strengthened his right, and began with shot and shell. By noon it was evident that Lee was retreating to Spotsylvania Court House, abandoning Mine run for North Anna. Grant pursued, and a cavalry battle ensued on the Cross roads near Todd's tavern, in which Custer and Gregg replaced the enemy. Lee, with his infantry, faced from time to time to fight.

On Saturday evening Fredricksburg was occupied.

On Sunday, the 8th, Hancock and Burnside led the pursuit. Warren took the Brock road, and coming up with the enemy at Alsop's farm, a severe action took place, in which the enemy were again driven back. We, however, lost 300 killed and wounded, Gen. Robinson, of Griffin's division, being severely wounded in the leg.

Robinson, of Griffin's division, being severely wounded in the leg.

On Monday, the 9th, there was cannonading and skirmishing, during which Gen. Sedgwick was killed by a sharpshooter. Towards dusk Grant again advanced, Wright on the right, Warren centre, Hancock's 2d on the right, and the 6th (now Wright's), on the left; a severe battle with artillery and infantry took place at Bloody Angle, Hancock crossed, but recrossed at night.

On Tuesday, the 10th, our line was in a crescent on the north bank of the Po, the 6th corps on the extreme left. The rebels lay north of Spotsylvania Court House, with his left on Gladys run, and his right on the Ny. Between the two was a dense forest with underbrush.

Grant attacked the rebel centre, driving the enemy to his rifle-pits, but suffering severely and failing to take them. Here Gen. Rice was killed.

In the evening a second attack was made and pounding, but no engagement.

On Thursday, the 12th, Gen. Barlow, of Major. Gen. Hancock's corps, carried the rebel riflepits, capturing a whole division of the enemy, with Gen. Edward Johnson, Brig.-Gen. George Stuart and Robert Johnson.

On Friday, the 13th, Grant advanced, and occupied the crests of the hills over the Ny river.

At 7 p. m. on Saturday, the 14th, the 6th corps had a brisk engagement with the enemy, but no general battle took place.

Meanwhile Gen. Sheridan turned the enemy's right, and getting to the rear destroyed Lee's depot at Beaver dam, with locomotives, trains, 200,000 pounds of bacon, cut eight to ten miles of the Orange railroad, besides recapturing 300 Union prisoners.

On the 11th he destroyed a locomotive and train at Ashland station, with several storehouses, and six miles of railroad, culverts, bridges and telegraph. He met Stuart at Yellow tavern, and after a stubborn fight routed him, losing his life. Sheridan then advanced on the Brock road, and took the first line of the enemy's works at Richmond. Stuart was then crossing the Chickahominy, fought the enemy at Gaines's mills, and joined Butler.

Gen. Sigel is advancing along the Shenandoah, to add to Lee's difficulties by tearing up the railroad between Charlottesville and Lynchburg.

Gen. Butler meanwhile holds Beauregard in Petersburg, having cut off his communication by the Weldon railroad. Admiral Lee has blockaded the rebel ironclads in James river by sinking vessels in the channel at Turkey bend.

On the 12th Gen. Smith, consisting of infantry, mounted infantry and cavalry, with artillery, left Charlestown under Gen. Crooks, to cut the Virginia and East Tennessee railroad. At Princeton they captured a rebel camp.

GEORGIA.

Sherman's move on Dalton was perfectly successful. McPherson struck the railroad at Resaca; Thomas advanced on Johnston's front, and Schofield on his flank. After three days fight the rebels fell back to Rocky Faced and Buzzard Roost. Here this Johnston evacuated those posts and Dalton. We have taken 5,000 prisoners and 10 or 12 cannon.

ARKANSAS.

Marmaduke, on May 1st, had got so near to Little Rock as to drive our whole into the city, but he was driven off by Carr's cavalry.

LOUISIANA.

At the latest accounts Gen. Banks had abandoned the Red river and was falling back to Franklin across the Teche country, and Porter is damming the Red river, so as to get his boats over the falls.

FLORIDA.

At the latest dates, May 2d, Gen. Birney had gone on an expedition into the interior.

NAVAL

The Navy Department has information of the capture, by the gunboat Owasco, of the English schooners Lily, Fannie and Laura, of Velasco, Texas, the property of that they did not know the character of their cargoes. On the Fannie, however, were found eight cases of rifles for the rebel Gen. Price.

Official information had been received by Mr. Mallory, the Secretary of the rebel navy, from Fort Fisher, that the rebel iron clad attacked and sunk the United States gunboat Huntsville, one of the East Gulf squadron in the West Indies, together with ammunition. It is also reported that the Florida recently burned the Boston ship Avon, bound from China to the United States.

The blockade runner Stag, Carolina, captured by four wooden vessels, made an attack on the Nansemond on the 6th inst., in the New Inlet, N. C., but was repulsed.

The United States gunboat Grand Gulf captured the British steamer Young Republic, of Nassau, loaded with cotton and tobacco, from Wilmington, N. C., on the 8th inst., in latitude 32.58, longitude 77.26. She had a crew of 40 men on board, and was commanded by Capt. Harris, formerly of the United States navy.

CONGRESS.

In the Senate, on the 9th of May, an adverse report was made on the expediency of changing the location of the Treasury Department. The bill for the erection of a Branch Mint at Philadelphia was passed. The House passed a substitute for the Pacific Railroad bill. The Senate considered the Bank bill at length, but little or no progress was made. It was amended by Mr. Doolittle, to keep the circulation of the banks within certain bounds, was voted down. Mr. Wade, of Ohio, made some remarks on the Conduct of the War, made a report in reference to the returned prisoners at Baltimore and Annapolis, in the motion that 10,000 copies ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate. Mr. Collamer then read a dispatch from the Secretary of War announcing a victory by Gen. Grant, when the Senate adjourned.

In the House, on motion of Mr. Rogers, of New Jersey, a resolution was adopted instructing the Committee on Naval Affairs to examine into the expediency of locating the proposed Navy Yard on the west side of the Delaware, near nearly opposite Camden, which contested election case of Bruce against Loan came up, but after discussion, was postponed, without any conclusion on the subject.

In the Senate, on the 10th, the bill to adjust the Claims of Deceased Officers who have served in the Navy was taken back from the Foreign Affairs Committee. A bill amendatory of the Act establishing the Grades of Naval Officers was introduced and referred. A bill to facilitate the Payment of Pensions was passed by the Red river and of the North was reported. The House bill for the organization of the Veteran Volunteer Engineers of the Army of the Cumberland and the bill to prevent smuggling were passed. The bill relating Provost Courts and Criminal cases was under consideration for some time, and a proposition to amend the bill was taken up and amended in the section relative to treason, by giving the Government power to try accused five persons for challenges in all trials. The subject was then laid aside, and the National Bank bill was taken up. Many amendments were offered and rejected, among which was that proposing that the banks shall be compelled to retain one-fourth of the gold received as interest on Government bonds as a reserved fund, which was the assumption of specie payments. An amendment was adopted requiring each bank to make provision for the redemption of its notes in the city of New York. The bill was then passed, by 30 yeas to 9 nays. The Senate then held an executive session, and on the opening of the doors adjourned.

In the House, the debate on the contest between Messrs. Long and Bruce for the representation of the Seventh Missouri district occupied the greater portion of the session. Finally a vote on the matter was reached, and it was decided that Mr. Long is entitled to the seat. The Senate bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to provide for the care, in States and Territories where there are no penitentiaries, of criminals sentenced by the National authorities, was passed. Gen. Butler's dispatch to the Secretary of War, detailing his successes in Virginia, was read both in the Clerk's desk and was received with applause. The Senate's amendments to the Internal Revenue Bill were considered. The House under consideration for some time, but the House adjourned without disposing of the matter.

In the Senate, on the 11th, Mr. Lane, of Kansas, introduced a resolution directing the Committee on the Conduct of the War to inquire into the causes of the disastrous military reverse on Red river. After considerable discussion took place, and the resolution was amended so as to empower the committee to investigate the entire administration of Gen. Banks in the Southwest, and laid over from a day adopted. A resolution condemning the President's action in the cases of Messrs. Shields and Blair was proposed by Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, but not disposed of.

In the House, after some unimportant business, the joint resolution to drop from the rolls all unemployed Generals was carried by 72 to 45.

In the Senate, on the 12th, Mr. Wilson offered a bill authorizing every railroad in the United States to carry the Mails, Troops and Government Supplies, at such rates as may be prescribed. It was resolved that the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate with a list of all general officers in commission, and in case the beginning of the year 1861. The bill altering the charter of the city of Washington so as to allow every male citizen to vote without regard to color was brought up for argument, after which the Senate adjourned to Monday.

In the House, the resolutions of the New York Chamber of Commerce recommending the extension of telegraphic communication with the Old World was presented. The House renewed the consideration of the bill to give homesteads from forfeited or confiscated lands to actual settlers, which was without action.

The bill declaring the Raritan and Delaware Bay railroad and Camden and Atlantic railroad post roads and public highways of the United States was also considered.

EUROPEAN NEWS.

THE Opposition in both Houses of Parliament made their long threatened attack on Lord Palmerston's Administration on the 26th of April, and the Government, on the 27th, announced that they in the Peers they did not venture upon a division. The chief grounds of attack were subservience to the United States in the matter of the seizure of arms on the Danish question. In the former, Earl Russell very clearly laid down the principle that the conduct of Lee was scandalous, for they had, merely for the sake of pursuing their own profit, very nearly involved England in a war with the United States. Lord Grey and Lord Derby had very little answer to make to this, but barged about the Queen's message in regard to Mr. Adams, who had the good sense not to deliver it.

Garibaldi had sailed for Caprera in the Duke of Sutherland's yacht; he was accompanied by the Duke and Duchess. It was generally conceded that the meeting would be a failure, and the reception would have only interfered with had his receptions continued. The story that he was driven out by foreign influence is absurd, and the cause lies in the gullible nature of Garibaldi's character.

The Danes had abandoned Fredericia, and had retired into the island of Alsen, and it was stated that an armistice would soon be concluded between the belligerents. In the mean time popular feeling ran very strongly in favor of the Danes, both in France and England.

The Shakespeare Tercentenary festival had been celebrated in England, Germany and Russia, with great eclat. At the Frankfort celebration there had been considerable ill-feeling displayed between the English and Germans, on account of the Schleswig-Holstein war.

The Emperor Maximilian had accepted the throne, and was expected to sail for Mexico in the course of the ensuing week. He agrees to pay France an indemnity of 270,000,000 francs for her expenses under a small amount, considering the enormous cost of their expedition. France would evacuate the country as soon as possible.

BOOK NOTICES.

POEMS. By WILLIAM ALLINGHAM. Boston: TICKNOR AND FIELDS.

This neat elegant edition of a popular poet comes very opportunely. Allingham's coming fame was recognized by several critics in advance of the public mind. Fifteen years ago Gilfillan, the word-painter of literary portraits, has a picture of the author of Fosters sketched in the background the literary features of those whom he himself destined to illuminate the poetical world. Here he foreshadowed the effect of Allingham's verse. Mr. Allingham is a painter, and spoke, among others, of William Allingham as a young man of promise and originality. Gilfillan's views are not always reliable, and we only allude to his notice of Allingham as showing that, as far back as fifteen years, his verses of the latter had so commended their author as to win from a critical bookmaker a recognition as a rising poet. We have heard little of Mr. Allingham since, but the publication of this volume of Fairie Poetry must little volume will be valued by those who appreciate the poetry of simple affections. It is genuine in quality and musical, and exercises a sympathetic vein of poesy by the felicity with which it guides its utterance.

TOWN COSSIP.

SOMEWHERE—in some quaint old volume, studded full with ancient lore, have we met a pleasant legend, and have culled it for our table. Then, as eagerly we read it, pondering on its hidden store, this thought struck us, struck us forcibly, and with lightning like still more. Therefore will we tell the application after we have told the legend.

There was an old king, says the story, who was excessively fond of having stories told him. To cater for his taste all the wits of his kingdom was put to work, and many of the most marvellous stories, even surpassing those of Cobb, were poured into his royal ear every day. The king wearied of the monotony and wished for a tale that should last for ever, promising the fortunate relator of such an article to share his kingdom with him, which, even supposing it to be no bigger than some German kingdoms, is better than nothing. Many a fruitful writing idea has come to newspapers.

We peruse the long in this matter there came gibbering-cool penny-a-liners from every corner of his dominions, who were cunning in spinning out nothing to an indefinite length, but their stories, no matter how many columns long they were, always came to an end, even though they lasted for years.

Finally, there came a wretched person—no doubt an Irishman, for since the year one they have been the very dence at storytelling—who proposed to gratify the king's wish.

"Do you know the forfeit?" quoth his majesty.

"Yis, an plase yer worship," returned the Celt.

Then," thundered the king, "it is that he who faileth shall be hurried to the deepest dungeon beneath our castle's moat, there to rot in chains, fed only upon Dublin whiskey and codfish balls."

"I accept the sintince, yer riverence!" ejaculated the native of the gem of the sea, as prink as possible.

"Begin then," muttered the king, doggedly, settling himself on his throne for a few years listen. The Celtic relator began:

"Once upon a time there was a king who had a dream which troubled him exceedingly. He called together all his wise men, and the result of their deliberation was that a famine would beset the land in 10 years, and that until that time all the grain of the kingdom must be stored as a provision. Then the king built an enormous granary into which went all the grain of those years, the people in the meantime subsisting entirely on peanuts, round-hearts and taffy-candy.

"At the end of 10 years, one day the king was viewing his wonderful granary, which now was full to the top, when he observed a sparrow enter a hole in the top and carry off a grain of corn. And still as he looked there came another sparrow and carried off another grain of corn, and then there came another sparrow and carried off another grain of corn, and then there came another sparrow and carried off another grain of corn, and then there came another sparrow and carried off another—"

"What meaneth this blather?" shouted the listening king, after he had patiently heard the nine hundred and forty-sixth and a halfth repetition of the carrying process. "When will this portion of thy recital end, slave?"

"Your holiness must have patience!" responded the Milesian, "there are yet 10 years grain for the sparrows to carry away, and they have not removed the ten thousandth million of a million part. And there came another sparrow and carried away—"

"Enough! enough!" cried the king. "Take thy half kingdom and cut thy stick, and hereafter let it be proclaimed that no emigrant from Ireland shall enter my dominions, under pain of enlistment and being swindled out of his bounties. The court's adjourned!"

The story is not bad, but the application we shall make is not, perhaps, so good: which is, that the emptying of that granary and the telling of the tale is like the routine of a great city. A sparrow comes and carries off a grain of corn, and then another sparrow comes and carries off another grain of corn, and so on for ever. What happens this year happens the next, and there is nothing new under the sun.

There is one reservation to this fact, which is the all-absorbing interest in which has been one in which the very fate of the country hung trembling in the scale. Let us imagine, if we can, the possibility that our summer campaign should be unsuccessful, and the rebels should succeed in carrying out their programme for an invasion of the North; let us think of New York as occupied by the rebel army and under martial law; let us think of the tax that would be levied on our wealth, of the despoiling of our everyday commerce. Think what a figure Tiffany's, Ball & Black's, Stewart's and Lord & Taylor's would make under rebel rule. New Yorkers have never yet realised this war at their very doors. They have been disposed, all through, to treat it as a summer's day pastime, something of which they read and have an interest in, the same as they would a novel published in numbers, and for which they pay their money. Should the publisher of their weekly amusement find it necessary to raise the price they will grumble, but still go on paying and being interested. It is not until some incident comes into their very homes, some telegram announcing the fall of a son, a brother, or one almost as dear, some deprivation of their comfort or peace of mind, that they realise its real force, and are ready to feel its terrors. We could put our finger on thousands who, since the first breaking-out of the rebellion, have not done one act, uttered one word, or spent one cent to aid the land in its fearful throes—men, and women too (if we can call them so), who would not contribute ten cents from their abundance to aid a disabled soldier to reach his home, or send a nurse to the field in the most fearful emergency.

The Week of Battles,

A Ladies' Meeting.

While speaking of this we are reminded of a meeting that comes off during the week at Cooper Institute, inaugurated by ladies, to take into consideration and adopt measures to stay the extravagance of the day in silks, laces, gloves and all articles of foreign make. However unpractical such a meeting may be in results, and we fear it will not achieve anything, we honor the motive, and trust it may succeed in making luxury of dress and living as unfashionable as it is now fashionable. With such names attached to the call as Mrs. Gen. Dix, Mrs. Ogden Hoffman, Mrs. Alex. Hamilton, Mrs. Daniel Le Roy, and hundreds of others of like strength, the appeal cannot be altogether a failure. They say in their announcement of the meeting: "It is not proposed to recommend the abandonment of any articles necessary even for comfort, but simply that the above-named luxuries, whose import creates the necessity of sending enormous amounts of gold out of the country, should for the present cease to be matters of daily use and purchase, and that the gold should be retained at home to strengthen our own Government. Elsewhere this movement has been already suggested. Women who have devoted themselves to the service of their country's defenders have paused in the midst of their labor and suffering to ask—Is there nothing now to be done? and they have been taught that a mightier help than any they have yet given may be rendered by simple self-denial in outward adorning. Can a right-thinking, patriotic woman hesitate to make so paltry a sacrifice?"

As apropos to this subject, we have heard, from good authority, and that in which we have faith, that to curtail her adornments, when waited on last week by a committee of the Ladies' League, now existing in Washington, and working to the same end as the New York ladies propose. She gave a point blank negative to the idea, and rather took the matter in high dudgeon, and was not at all pleased with the ladies who made the unwholesome proposition. As the young and beautiful Presidentess has just been spending a few days in this city, earnestly and intently devoting her mind to shopping, and has, without doubt, secured many novelties of alarming beauty and cost, it stands to reason that it was rather a rough suggestion that she should not sport them at the coming fêtes and levees at the White House. It was beyond womanly nature to accede, and we cannot for an instant believe that the proposition was made by any other than some horrid old maid, who had nothing new to wear herself, and took this mode of being revenged on one that had. Another item in this connection comes to us from a Philadelphia friend, who is in the jewellery line. He says:

Mrs. Lincoln Refused

The Greatest Sales this Season

made by Philadelphia jewellers and drygoods houses have been made to the wife of one who, at the breaking out of the war, was a chiffonier. One who, if he did not actually carry the hook and basket himself, bought up the contents of other baskets. He got a contract, or permission, or something else, to follow the Army of the Potomac and gather up the debris of bones, fat, rags and offal, and the result is brown stone fronts, Steinway pianos, diamonds, velvet, lace and general fixings, to an astonishing degree. And now

A Word to Shopkeepers:

Gentlemen—and ladies, too—you have had a clear benefit for the last six months. Taking advantage of the unsettled state of the country, you have forced up prices to a degree not warranted by circumstances, in some instances almost 100 per cent. You have, in fact, acted much like some hotel and restaurant keepers, who have kept no account against a guest, but when asked "What's to pay?" answer with any amount that flashes through their brain, provided they have any, and then are dissatisfied when the swindled guest pays because they did not take advantage of his goodnature and charge more. We say to you that you have had your harvest, and that this week is fraught with mischief to your coffers. With the success of Grant—and that is a foregone conclusion—comes such a tumble in the prices of every commodity of daily food and wear, that you will rue the day when you laid in large stocks or invested in that which is as unstable as water. Those who have kept down their stocks have done wisely, and will have less cause to regret, but the heavy dealers will be the sufferers, with no escape.

How the City is Amusing Itself.

And while all this is going on the city is still as gay and reckless as ever. Every theatre is full nightly, to say nothing of the numberless balls, concerts, readings, minstrels and other entertainments, that draw their hundreds and thousands. Wallack's, steady and conservative, does little to record, because it produces no novelties, but appeals to the quiet, good taste of New York with its fine old comedy, occasionally interspersed with Rosedale-ism. On Friday, the 13th inst., that play was performed for the 118th time, which, to say nothing of its dramatic merit, is a merit in itself, the merit of success.

Niblo's this week produces John Brougham's "Bel Demonio," with Vestvali as Angelo, Fechter's great character. The play should be a success if we can judge by its effect in London, and the fact that Mr. Wheatley has been several months agitating the subject among the company—scene-painters, carpenters, property-men and all. There will be a ballet in it, and the whole affair will be under the superintendence of Mr. Vincent, one of the cleverest stage-managers in the country, and a warrantee for something good.

At the Winter Garden Mr. Booth has closed his engagement, and the Florences come once more with that inevitable "Ticket-of-Leave Man." When that will end, judging by the past, is a mythical matter, but we may safely put it down for sixty nights.

This week Barnum has made a decided hit in the engagement of Mdlle. Ernestine, and the production of "Belphegor." In the second act of this play the dances are introduced, and Mdlle. Ernestine has stepped at once into the favor of the Barnumnian audiences by modesty of execution and force. She is pretty, and New Yorkers rarely have a chance to see more skill or grace than they can see now upon the Museum boards. "Belphegor" is a cleverly constructed play, cleverly done, and is well worthy a few hours' attention, even from the critical. The Olympic has given us "The Chimney Corner," through the past week, with Davidge's charming personation of Old Probity, and promises soon "Aladdin," which, though not a novelty, is decidedly better than producing bad new things. This week Mr. George Wood inaugurates the drama in the Broadway Theatre—once Wallack's—with something new, entitled "An English Tragedy," of which more anon; sufficient to say now that it was written by Fanny Kemble, and is at this house first baptised on the boards.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—There was a meeting of the American Christian Union, at the Cooper Institute, on Thursday, the 12th. The Rev. Dr. Kirk, of Boston, presided. The Rev. Mr. Duryea, the Rev. Mr. Lockwood, the Hon. Eli Thayer and others addressed the meeting.

—— The sale of Goupil & Co.'s collection of paintings realized $22,147. "The Bullfight," by Verboeckhoven, brought $3,000; "Going to School," by Frère, $870; and the "Standard Bearer," by Meissonier," $3,100.

—— The anniversary of the American Bible Society was held at Irving Hall, on Thursday, the 12th. The meeting was opened with prayer by Bishop Gates, and addresses were delivered by the Rev. Dr. Taylor, the Rev. Mr. Petit, the Rev. Mr. Thornton, the Rev. Dr. Sunderland, the Rev. Dr. Cox and others. The report shows that the Bible has been translated into 250 languages; the receipts amount to $500,578 60; number of books printed, 1,592,196; copies of Scripture granted to the army and navy, 2,000,000.

—— A special meeting of the Chamber of Commerce was held on the 12th May, for the purpose of considering a memorial, to be presented to Congress, concerning the additional 50 per cent. duty on imported goods, levied from the 29th of April until the new tariff goes into effect, a period of 60 days. A draft of the proposed memorial was presented, and called forth considerable discussion from Messrs. Sturgis, Opdyke, Bloodgood, Conkling, Ludlam, Low and others, the majority of the speakers opposing the document for the reason that it it imputed unworthy motives to the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Low favored the memorial, but the discussion culminated in a motion, which was adopted, to refer the memorial back to the Committee.

—— The Alexandria (Va.) State Journal complains bitterly that Lieut.-Col. Fillebrown, formerly of the 10th Maine, and who was confined in the Old Capitol Prison for obtaining grain in Virginia, under the pretext of being a U. S. Deputy-Marshal, is now acting under a permit to carry $300 worth of goods into Loudon county. The Journal says that the loyal inhabitants of the county are much embittered against him, as on the former occasion he sold the grain, which they sold him for half its value, not venturing to dispute his authority, to the Government at double what he obtained it for.

—— Butter leagues are forming in Philadelphia on a very extensive scale. The farmers complain of small sales in consequence.

—— Ballooning in the army has been voted a failure, and all the aerial apparatus belonging to the Government has been sold at auction.

—— The Report of the Eastern Penitentiary of Philadelphia says: Out of 4,271 prisoners who have been discharged, 405 have been reconvicted, some of them several times, making the total 490. In the course of 33 years only four prisoners have been convicted four times.

Southern.—The Richmond papers, despite the braggadocia of Lee's bulletins, which are finished specimens of lying, evince considerable trepidation. The Examiner announces that even now it is not too late for General Lee to carry out his original plan of crossing the Potomac at the head of a large army, and carry the war into the enemy's country. Lee's dispatches, one after another, contain a victory every day. The Whig says that Butler will be forced to remain pent up in City point under the protection of the Lincoln gunboats, contenting himself with an occasional raid into the country. From what deserters say it would seem that Beauregard has about 30,000 men with him.

—— The Richmond Enquirer gives this account of the death of the second son, Joseph E. Davis, aged four years, of the Rebel President. He fell from the east portico on the 7th of May, between three and four o'clock, a distance fully 15 feet, fracturing his hip and injuring his head. Mr. Davis and his wife were absent from the mansion at the time of the accident and the discovery of the condition of the child was made by the servant. The sufferer was taken into the nursery, and a messenger dispatched in haste for the President and his lady. Drs. Peticolas, Conway and Garnett, the family physicians, successively came in and applied their skill without avail. The child was insensible when picked up, and never recovered consciousness, dying in about three quarters of an hour after being taken up by the servant and carried into the house.

Personal.—Mrs. Lippincott, better known as Grace Greenwood, lectured lately in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, to a brilliant audience. The subject was The War. She is a very strong abolitionist, and considers that Abraham Lincoln and George Washington are two of the greatest men ever born. She urged a vigorous prosecution of the war, and denounced Copperheads in good set terms.

—— Miss Teresa Esmonde gave her farewell reading from the poets at Irving Hall on the 3d inst. The selections embraced The Famine, from Longfellow's Hiawatha; John Savage's Shane's Head; The Two Flags, by Anna S. Stephens, and others from O. W. Holmes, T. Davis, &c.

—— Miss Anna Dickinson, the well-known lecturer, has declared war against Abraham Lincoln and some of his Cabinet, on account of their not being sufficiently sound on the colored question. In her lecture at Boston she unsparingly castigated "the half men of the times."

—— The Charleston Mercury gives an account of the killing of Miss Pickens, daughter of ex-Gov. Pickens. She was about to be married, and the wedding party had assembled at the house of Gen. Bonham, when a shell from the Union forces penetrated the house and wounded the bride so that she died soon afterwards. The marriage ceremony was completed as she lay dying on the floor. Lieut. De Rochelle was the bridegroom.

Accidents and Offences.—Henry Barneum, of Olean, N. Y., deliberately killed his wife and infant son as they laid in bed a few days since. He stunned the woman with an axe and then chopped her to pieces—the little boy awaking, screamed terribly and shared the same fate. Barneum, who has been arrested, says he killed them for fear they would suffer from hard times.

—— Capt. Morris, 11th Kentucky cavalry, of near Louisville, Ky., who last fall, while drunk, sent out a file of men to capture a neighboring farmer, named Johnson, with whom he had quarrelled, and not bring him alive, the men obeying him by killing Johnson, has been arrested in Chicago. The Government had offered $1,000 for his capture, dead or alive.

—— The First National Bank of Fentonville, Mich., has been robbed of $10,000 in United States money, beside a number of deeds and mortgages. The safe, a small one, containing the property was blown open. The main safe was untouched. There have been no arrests, though $1,000 reward has been offered.

—— A terrible railway accident occurred on the 5th, near Gallatin, Tenn. A construction train collided with one carrying 300 of the 10th Indiana cavalry, and three men were killed and 60 wounded, among the latter being Capt. Jones, badly; Lieut. Littlepage, arm and leg broken; Lieut. Kemp, badly; and Lieut. Couch, mortally injured.

—— The Palace Garden at Cincinnati has been destroyed by fire. There was a collection of rare animals, birds, etc., at the place, much of which, including a sea-lion, happy family, eagle, performing monkey, etc., was destroyed. The fire is supposed to have been the work of an incendiary.

—— A serious conflict ensued one day this week between two waiters of the St. Nicholas Hotel, in the kitchen of that establishment. O'Keefe becoming incensed, drew a knife and stabbed his fellow-waiter so severely that his life is despaired of. O'Keefe was arrested.

—— Another case of the knife occurred at a drinking saloon in Henry street, where a man named Hammel stabbed John O'Shay, a conductor on the 4th Avenue railroad. His recovery is very doubtful.

—— Holden, late postmaster of Malden, who was convicted of murdering Frank Converse, has been sentenced to be hung in June.

Foreign.—The number of political journals in Paris and the departments at present is 318, of unpolitical, 6,700.

—— Large numbers of English tourists have flocked to the seat of war in the Duchies, and their unnecessary exposure of themselves to shot and shell has excited the greatest surprise among the combatants. A youth of 17 perched himself on the top of a windmill at Duppel, "to see the fun," and could not be prevailed upon to descend till he saw all he wished in the way of bloodshed.

Items.—Some time since a man in Maine wanted to exhibit an Egyptian mummy, and went to the Courthouse for a licence. "What is it?" asked the Judge. "An Egyptian mummy, may it please the Court, more than three thousand years old," said the showman. "Three thousand years old!" exclaimed the Judge, jumping to his feet, "and is the critter alive?"

—— A soldier of the 1st Pa. cavalry, in the Potomac Army, was a short time since found asleep near Warrenton, Va., having slept 24 hours. He stepped up to his captain and said, "Captain, I die to-morrow at four o'clock, and the war will end in June. You have no more for me to do." As the clock struck four on the following day he died without a groan.

CHIT-CHAT FOR THE LADIES.

WHEN we sit down together to talk or write to each other, is it not sad to think that, instead of the old, silly lightsome topics—gossip about flirtations, guesses at probable betrothals, what was worn at Mrs. A's. last night, or will be worn at Mrs. B's. to-morrow; that handsome singer at the opera, or that lovely debutante in society, fresh from boarding-school, and said to be a fortune; or the weather, or the Central Park, or any of the subjects of which we used to converse; of that talk which skimmed from one thing to the other, like a humming-bird over a flower-garden; is it not sad that, instead of these, the first words upon our lips are of the war? "Have you heard that Willie Blair was mortally wounded in the last battle?" or that Lieutenant B.'s wife is a widow, or that that handsome fellow with whom all the girls fell in love last year at Saratoga has been so frightfully maimed and disfigured that his dearest friend would not recognise him? And then we wonder when this will end, and how, and speak of dear ones far away, and of friends from whom we may be called to part, and grow sad and sick at heart. I did not mean to write a word of war or of war's horrors when I opened my portfolio, and I think I should not but for the thoughts that would fill my mind of the sad fate of Anna Pickens, and which would be written down.

Have you wept as I have over the sad fate of that beautiful girl? Have you forgotten in your womanly sympathy that she was "a Rebel?" I think so; I am sure you have. I know that any one of you would have done much to stay that Union shell had such a thing been possible. The tenderest emotions of the soul are involved in this sad occurrence—human love blighted—human hopes crushed—a bride in the full flush of hope and beauty done to death. We were less than women if we did not grieve. Oh, cruel War, scourge of our once happy country, God banish thee, and send us, instead of thee, Peace, with her green olive branch.

Time was when we read such tales in old romances, or heard them from the lips of the aged, who, in their turn, had heard them from those old when they were young, and scarcely credited them, or, if we believed such things could happen, thought of them as we might of the cruelties of Nero, or the tortures of the Inquisition, horrors belonging to an age gone by, which we could never see repeated in our own.

We know a great deal about war now; but, dear readers, the Southern women know more; blood has not dripped on our doorsills yet, shells have not burst above our homesteads—let us pray they never may.

A Request.

We don't like to ask too many favors, but we wonder whether the members of the Academy of Design might not be induced by their gallantry to ladies, especially short ones, to keep step-ladders in the vestibule for their convenience; that, in case (odd things happen now and then, you know) any one wanted to see a picture not painted by one of the Hanging Committee, she might hire one, and with a lantern investigate the high places and dark corners. It would be a great favor, and would be appreciated.

Absent but not Forgotten.

Is cloth getting dear, or has a particular tax been laid upon coat-tails? or for what reason have the gentlemen discarded them for their little brothers' jackets? While the toiles of our basques have been growing longer and longer, theirs have been shortening until nothing is left of them.

Wicked slanderers declare that the fashion originated in the fear of an invasion by the Southerners, in which case the "Stay-at-Home Guard" determined to leave nothing for the enemy to catch them by as they ran away, but we don't believe a word of it. Do you?

Slander.

And talking of slander, I wonder why we should have the blame laid upon our shoulders. We do not indulge in half the scandal men circulate through the medium of the press. Our false witness of our neighbors is generally whispered in corners, not printed in black and white; but theirs, how it flies and how it grows? Don't they love to catch a woman in naughty tricks? Are they not delighted to write neat little pararaphs about her? And are they not always scissored out by other editors, and circulated from Maine to Georgia? And if the fair culprit is the wife or sister of some political enemy, or of some one on the opposite side of any question, is not the deed doubly delightful? And then after dilating and improving on the story, and rounding the sentences, and putting in the full names of unhappy relations, and doing all they can to make the miserable affair more miserable still, these good souls sit down and write a homily on scandal-loving women, and censure tea-table gossip and sewing-circle calumny, until to hear them one would say, "Listen to those who couldn't say a word against any one if they were paid for it (in gold)."

Women slander-mongers—nonsense! the name should be handed over to the men.

The Last New Chambermaid.

"Biddy," said a lady friend of ours to an Hibernian damsel recently engaged, "where have you been so long?"

"In your bedroom, mum," replied Biddy, "afther takin' a patthern uv a basque; I'm goin' to have one the loike uv it, only a bit more bugles an' lace; I allers takes pattherns from the missus if she's tasty, an' I tried the basque above on me yestherday, an' it fit like me skin; wouldn't you be tellin' me where ye buyed the silk?"

The end of the anecdote we forgot to ask, but probably the lady fainted, and Bridget received a month's wages in lieu of a warning that very day. "The girl," is just now an irrepressible individual. We heard of one lately who gave as her reason for leaving a place that the missus had only two bonnets, and she had worn them both three times already, and was not used to doing with so small a number. Poor thing! she suffered probably as much as the lady who went to Saratoga with only 50 dresses last summer, and was obliged to fly thence in two weeks on account of her slender wardrobe.

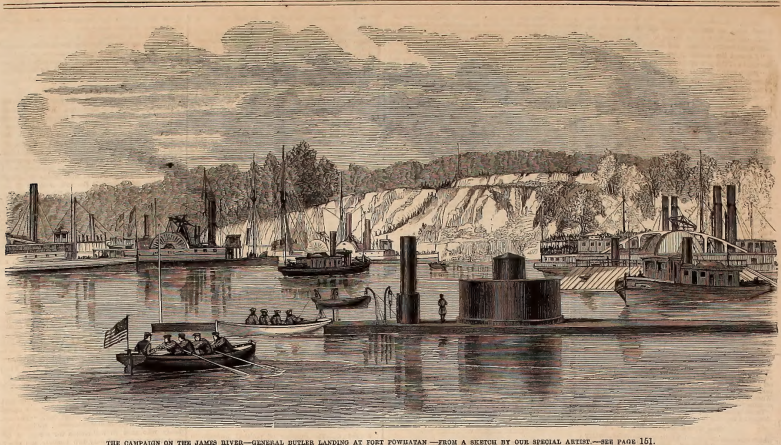
Ladies' Headaches.

Headache is as common to most of our sex as sleep, and when we think of the life most women lead we cannot wonder at it—from morning until night every possible effort seems to be put forth to produce the unhappy result.

The first performance is to squeeze the waist and the feet; the next to braid and twist and hairpin the hair to the last point of human endurance; the next to breakfast on nothing but very strong tea; the next to shut one's self up in a room with five or six children (one beating a drum, the other shaking a rattle, a third "tooting" through a trumpet, and the rest crying alternately), and work scallops on cambric muslin for several hours. Then, for lack of appetite at breakfast induces noontide starvation, a lunch of the most indigestible nature. After that a shopping excursion.

A woman's bonnet always hurts her somewhere. It is always—piquante though it may look—stiff and bristly with its buds and flowers, and lace, and crown lining; and the ears suffer, and the neck, and the poor, poor head. Air might prove of some avail, but the idea that women receive any of that blessing is preposterous. Very few ever attempt to walk, but are shut up in one disagreeable omnibus after another until they reach their place of destination.

If they make calls they are received in semi-darkened parlors, from which dust and flies are shut out by heavy curtains, and when they return home every room is in the same state of headache-producing gloom, save the kitchen and the nursery. Yet home is the only place where a woman can lay aside that torturing bonnet. At church, at all places of amusement—save the opera—at all times and seasons when men can remove their hats, we must keep our headgear on and suffer. Neither does night bring relief; what with hairwaves and curl papers, and hairoil, and a nightcap, torture only commences with that hour to very many. And the fashionable belle in these days of waved bandeaux could tell a direful tale of her midnight agonies. What bonnets and nightcaps and curl papers and tight lacing fail to complete, the piano and the latest novel finish; and the wonder is, not that the fashionable woman has such sieges of headache, but that she is ever without one.



Shall Have a Sword.

It appears that McClellan's lady friends are determined that he shall have a sword, if he could not have the one fought for by his partisans at the Sanitary Fair. All over the country they are making contributions of small sums for the purchase of a McClellan sword. We hope the General is properly thankful; he should be, for the ladies are all on his side. Even Mrs. Grant, they say, voted for him, and if it had not been for masculine politicians the sword would have been his. So cheer up, little Mac, you shall have a sword, so you shall, if we are obliged to buy you one out of our own shopping money.

Spiritualism.

We live in the days of "manifestations," that is certain. Witch-burning being no longer practised, a good many maids and matrons have professed themselves to be what the old Puritans would have called "daughters of Beelzebub." Every fourth lady of one's acquaintance is "spiritually inclined." Some can "tip tables," some have the power of producing raps; others can give you advice from your departed ancestor as to the cultivation of radishes, and a host read sealed letters with those specimens of the hairdresser's art styled "Grecians" and waterfalls. As for the gentlemen, always practical, they turn their endowments into money, charge investigators four shillings a head, and use each other for repeating patented manifestations.

THE hat was passed round in a certain congregation for the purpose of taking up a collection. After it had made the circuit of the church it was handed to the minister, who by the way had "exchanged pulpits" with the regular preacher, and he found not a penny in it. He inverted the hat over the pulpit cushion and shook it, that its emptiness might be known, then looking towards the ceiling, he exclaimed with great fervor, "I thank God that I got back my hat from this congregation!"

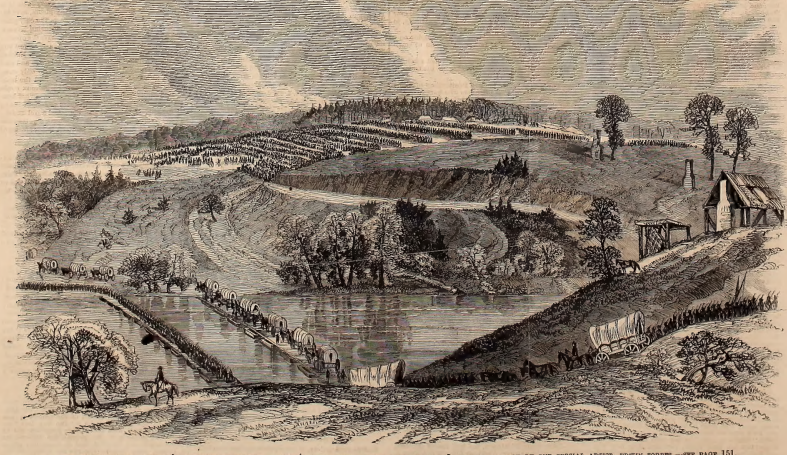
GRANT AND MEADE IN THE WILDERNESS.

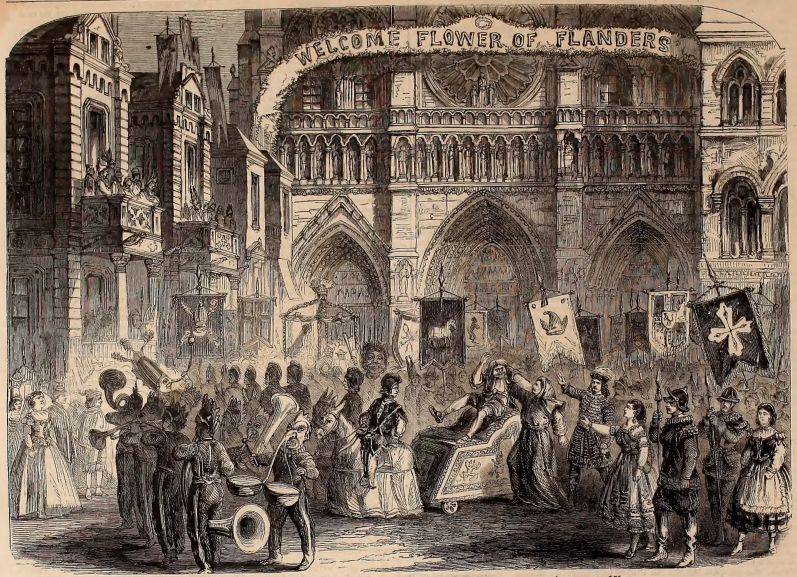
A CORRESPONDENT of one of the dailies, Mr. James C. Fitzpatrick, whose sketches our readers will remember, gives this interesting account of Grant during the battle of the Wilderness, which is a better description than we can give of the illustrations forwarded by our Artists:

Gen. Grant's headquarters were located in a field between the plank road and a small road leading to a little hamlet known as Parker's store. During the fight, however, he was principally with Gen. Meade, whose headquarters were on a piney knoll in the rear of Warren's corps. I had seen Grant at Vicksburg and in Tennessee, and his appearance was familiar; but as I strolled through the group of officers reclining under the trees at headquarters I looked for him some time in vain, such was his insignificant, unpretending aspect and conduct while the battle was raging in all its fury. A stranger to the insignia of military rank would have little dreamed that the plain, quiet man who sat with his back against a tree, apparently heedless and unmoved, was the one upon whom the fortunes of the day, if not of the age and country, were hinging. It was only when some aide or orderly rode up in hot haste with a communication from some portion of the battle-field that his eyes upturned to seek in those of the messenger the purport of the message. The consultation with Gen. Meade or the direct suggestion or command—all took place with that same imperturbability of countenance for which he has always been remarkable. No movement of the enemy seemed to puzzle or disconcert him. Fertile in resources, the petition for reinforcement was speedily answered. And while all this transpired he stood calmly in the group, at times smoking his favorite cigar—a more vigorous or a more frequent puffing only indicating the inward working of the mind. If something transpired which he deemed needed his personal attention, away he darted on horseback to the immediate scene, the one or two of his aides and orderly exerting their utmost to keep up with him. Arrived on the spot, he calmly considered the matter requiring his attention, with ready judgment communicated the necessary orders, and then galloped away to another part of the field, or to his seat beneath the pine tree, there to enter on the order-book some record of the battle's progress. It was amusing again at times to see him—the Commander-in-Chief—whittling away with his knife upon the bark of a tree, pausing now and then to throw in a word or sentence in the conversation of those grouped about, and then going to work again with renewed vigor upon the incision of the pine. The contemplation of this by those who were with him at Vicksburg will recall an incident of a similar character in that memorable siege. When the columbiads were mounted in front of Logan's line Gen. Grant was desirous of superintending the operations. During the preliminary work of cutting the embrasures he mounted the epaulment, and while the rebel bullets struck all around him, deliberately whittled a rail until the guns were placed in position.



BATTLE OF THE WILDERNESS, MAY 5-6.

OUR sketch of the first of the great battles of Gen. Grant in Virginia will give a striking idea of the battleground, to be henceforth for ever famous like Manassas, Gettysburg, Pittsburg landing or Fair Oaks. The eye can take in the five mile line-of-battle, which for two days advanced and met hostile advances, gaining ground to be lost in a moment, but holding steadily to their line till the furious rebel charge on the 6th corps swept away Seymour's and Shaler's brigades of the 3d division, and had well nigh won the day.



Sedgwick, soon to fall, saved the right, but our loss in the two days was not far from 15,000, and we mourned General Hays and Wadsworth.

On the left is the Wilderness house, one of the few human habitations in this wild district. The house in the centre is Warren's headquarters.

MANHATTAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.—At a meeting of the board of directors of this company, held recently, the following important resolution was adopted after mature consideration: "There shall be added to each policy issued, or hereafter to be issued, the following words: 'This policy is incontestible after five years from its date, for or on account of errors, omissions and misstatements in the application, except as to age.'" No other American company, we believe, offers this important advantage to insurers. All policies in force five years at once become incontestible, under the operations of this rule, greatly enhancing their value to families and creditors. The liberal and just measure should secure to this company increased favor and patronage, as it exhibits the strong desire of the directors to throw every proper and safe advantage around the policies.

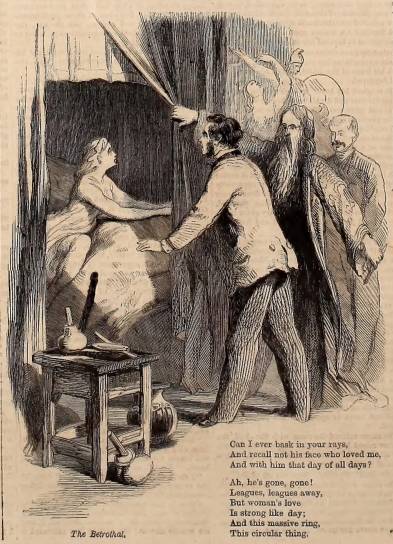
MY RING.

BY MAUD L. CRIMSON.

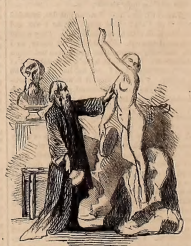


Massive, golden,
Worn and olden;
But I love it
For the giver.
He so gladsome,
Eyes so madsome—
Madsome for their thrilling quiver,
Madsome for their melancholy—
He the giver!

On his brow white
Shone the starlight;
Fell the dew down
On his hair brown;
Soft as lip dents
Dropped his accents;
Longer, linger—
So he placed it on my finger.

Hot, hot kisses,
One long drinking—
Heart to heart seems
Melting, sinking.
One long sweetness,
Then the starlight
Chased his shadow
With its fleetness;
Onward, onward,
Through steep gladeland,
Westward, starward,
Into shadeland.

Oh, that last long sweetness!
Clinging lips
Rich with love's completeness—
And now as then the dizzy moon
Swings and dips.



Oh, boundless Heaven!
Oh, trailing stars!
Drawing dark Even
In spangled cars—
Can I ever note you above me,

The Betrothal.

Can I ever bask in your rays,
And recall not his face who loved me,
And with him that day of all days?

Ah, he's gone, gone!
Leagues, leagues away,
But woman's love
Is strong like day;
And this massive ring,
This circular thing,

The Mad Sculptor,

Is a link between us,
Is a bond between us,
And I'll never cease loving him, never,
Not e'en on the strand
Of the angel land—
On the strand of the land called For Ever.

The Serpent-Woman.

BY Z. W.

CHAPTER I.

He is deformed, crooked, old and sere,
Ill-faced, worn-bodied, shapeless everywhere.
Comedy of Errors, Act IV., Sc. 2.

Thou hast entertained
A fox, to be the shepherd of thy lamb.
Two Gentlemen of Verona, Act IV., Sc. 4.

On a sunny afternoon in May, about twenty-three years ago, a man was walking up Broadway, in the city of New York, whose peculiar appearance fascinated the gaze of almost every person he met. He was simply and neatly clad; painfully sensible of the curiosity, mingled with repulsion which he provoked, and encountered the impudent stare with which the handsome fops regarded him with a glare of defiance. But he did not only suffer from the eyes of the promenaders as he passed; their tongues, busy with him ere they were out of his hearing, wounded him with wanton ruthlessness.

"Did you ever see such a fright?"

"I couldn't believe my own eyes!"

"Why wasn't he smothered in his infancy?"

"What havoc he would make in a looking-glass store!"

And so on. The subject of this exclamatory and running commentary, supposed by those who kept it up to be given beyond his earshot, had the sense of hearing almost preternaturally acute, and was pierced with many a shaft never intended to reach him. These insulting references to his exterior were, however, made inexcusably loud, and the mocking laughs that followed them were as inexcusable as heartless. He entered a cigar store located behind a large wooden figure of a Scotch Highlander, then standing between Reed and Duane streets, but now in the front of St. Nicholas Hotel, and was served with snuff by a fossil cynic, indiscreet, who had the politeness to gaze at him neither more nor less than he would have looked at any other ordinary customer. Two dashing young fellows, dressed in the extreme of the mode, having just bought and lighted their cigars, were, however, prescient, and did their best to compensate for his want of rudeness by the excess of their own. They were hardly out of the shop ere they began the following coarse and heartless dialogue. Its subject was close behind them, and heard every word of it:

"Charlie, that old fellow's mother must have been a devil once upon a time."

"And she never forgot him—how could she with such a vivid remembrancer in the shape of a son?"

"What would you wear, through life, such a mug as his for?"

"Why, Ned, I wouldn't change my phiz for his for all John Jacob Astor is worth. The Man with the Iron Mask and the Veiled Prophet of Khorassan must have had countenances like his, I'm certain. Why is such a human blight allowed at all? If we subject the infected with pestilence to a quarantine, why should those afflicted with frightfulness be permitted the free range of civilized society?"

"His parents neglected their duty, and he ought to fulfil it."

"How?"

"By hanging himself."

Genuine sympathy is costly, for it shares and relieves the pains of others; but, without that, no one can be a true gentleman. To feel and act towards others as we would have them feel and act towards ourselves is the essence of real politeness and the etiquette of heaven. Have you never suffered with the mis-shapen and hideous man, as you saw how continually he was reminded of his deformity by the wounding stare of adults and children? Have you ever, in imagination, changed conditions with him, and endeavored to feel as keenly to have he jokes among the barbarians of civilization? If you have considered his case fairly, your mind is prepared to make allowance for the bitterness of spirit which impelled Mr. Gregory Grimgrip to mutter, as he crossed Broadway and turned into Anthony street:

"Why am I, who have done no murder, branded worse than Cain? God made me as I am, and fools find fault with his workmanship. They would have me destroy it. Would I had the power, as I have the will, to annihilate every man not uglier than myself! We would have a new standard of masculine beauty, and I—ha, ha, ha!—I would be the model. A sublime idea, if it were only practicable! Not the headsmen and grandest boy-in-Broadway haunts half so much attention as I do, let me I not vain, not even flattered. I am stared at and stared after by every fool I meet. Here's little brat runs them!—runs after me, with eyes and mouth wide open, and then scampers away screaming and howling its astonishment. Is that man viable to stigmatize another he detests, what does he do? Growing hyperbolical, he declares his enemy to be 'As ugly as old Grimgrip.' Then says the object, 'I am looked upon as a monster, and it is thought monstrous that I should lay claim to the common joys and consolations of humanity which make life endurable. It is regarded as a decree of fate that there is no amenity, no justice, no redress for me. I must be despised, shunned and contemned. I must bear contumely and the torture of the mind, peacefully and patiently, to the end. Where the delights of friendship and the pleasures of beauty are concerned I am always omitted and forgotten, and only remembered as the ugliest one. Shall I submit to these prescriptions, and, like a worm, crawl that I may be trampled on? Not I. I will revel in all that the best, the bravest and the handsomest enjoy. I have wealth—plenty of it. I once bought beauty—surpassing beauty—it cost me dear, almost my life—but it was mine awhile, and for awhile I enjoyed it, triumphantly. I'll have it again, with love, too, as sure as I have more wealth than youth, more brains than beauty, more cunning than honesty, and more love for myself than for all mankind."

Gregory Grimgrip's green eyes gleamed with passion and excitement. Even in the vile neighborhood through which he was walking the rudest people moved out of his way, as soon as they caught of the intense expression of his face and heard the tone of his wild mutterings. Those who did not know him, observing that his carriage was too firm and equal for a drunken man, thought him mad, and others who recognized him knew how dangerous he was in his sane mood, and gave him "ample room and verge enough" as he passed them.

Mr. Grimgrip was collecting his own rents that day, and he proved a harder landlord than usual, which was needless. Bitter, sharp and menacing were his responses to the excuses of delinquent tenants, and his harshness made many a heart ache, for the year of 1837 was disastrous to the poor. He was tramping his way upwards in a dingy house in Mulberry street and had reached the second floor when he met a handsome, whitehaired, old doctor.

"How is your patient, doctor?" he inquired.

"Worse; she will die before morning, I fear."

"Have you procured a nurse for her?"

"Yes; she will be with the invalid in a few minutes."

"Have you, as I requested, examined the child?"

"I have, and she is as healthy as she is beautiful."

Mr. Grimgrip bade the doctor good evening, ascended the narrow stairs, and after knocking at a half-open door and receiving a double invitation to "come in" from one feeble voice and another clear and childlike, entered a miserable garret, containing a rickety bed, two broken chairs and a few other valueless articles of furniture. Upon the bed lay a dying woman, ghastly pale and emaciated, but still retaining the stamp of original beauty, as the storm-beat, war-rent, tattered flag its ingrain of nationality. She was beauty in its last living stage, as her little daughter, sitting by her side, was loveliness in all its tender freshness and incipiency.

"Ma, Dimdip's tum!" exclaimed the little one, about two years of age, slipping off the bed and running up to the old fellow, who caught her up in his arms, kissed her, sat down near the bedside, with the child on his knee, and gave her the cakes and candy he had brought for a special treat him. After making a few abortive efforts to cheer the sick woman, Grimgrip observed:

"Let us hope all will end well; but it is ever best to be prepared for the worst. Now, you owe me some months' rent and for money advanced. I conducted myself honorably with the dead man's affairs, paid him the last dollar of his doctor's bill and other expenses, and see no prospect of a return for this past and prospective outlay, unless you are willing to bequeath me something. What will you do for me?"

"Anything I can. I have nothing. What can I do?" replied the dying woman, faintly.

"Listen," said Grimgrip, with emotion; "I have no one to love me—no one to love. Shameful as has been your relatives' neglect of you, the conduct of mine towards me has been incomparably worse. They heaped contempt and contumely upon me, and gave me poison for food. I am rich, and would bequeath my property to you. Give me your little daughter, and she shall be my heiress."

The deadly pallor of the mother's countenance flushed and her eyes brightened for a moment with joy. She murmured her thankfulness to Heaven and then to her benefactor.

"I am content to die now," she said. "It was only for my child that I wished to live. Heaven reward you," she added, pressing the hand of the poor orphan, and may you live long to enjoy the blessings of her affection and duty."

It is a lovely child, observed Grimgrip, stroking the little one's golden ringlets. "She will soon monopolize my affections; but as soon as she has learned to speak and walk well, I shall lay claim to my treasure. I wish to have a legal right to the child, that I may, without stint or apprehension, love and consider her my own daughter."

The mother intimated her willingness to sign any document calculated to strengthen his hold upon the child, and Mr. Grimgrip had his legal papers in readiness, the nurse had no sooner arrived and another witness been procured than the subject was signed, and he was called, because the sole guardian of about the loveliest little mortal ever ushered into this world of sorrow and sin, to had fortified his claims upon her by having her apprenticed to him till her majority.

Grimgrip gave the nurse money, and told her to procure everything the dead man required. He then took his leave of the latter, kissed his little ward, and departed.

He reached his home in high spirits, and surprised his deaf and dumb housekeeper with a smile of genial grimness. She was seriously alarmed at the phenomenon, and was still more so when he had condescended to indulge her with a long digital explanation, which he afterwards elucidated by means of a slate and pencil, that she became at all reassured. Grimgrip rose very early the next morning and visited his dying tenant before he took his breakfast. She was dead, and he secured by all save the mother, and she lay apparently lifeless. He thought she was dead, for death never looked more pure and peaceful than she did, awakening in the mind of the solitary gazer recollections and feelings that thrilled and harrowed him to its very core.

"How like and yet how unlike her corpse to Matilde's!" he muttered. "Both so beautiful; but this is pure and holy, and that was foul with her crime. Shall I ever look in the face of beauty again without suspicion of deadly treachery? Never. Yet she has departed with a smile on her dear infant daughter's, for which I am not a trap. Little did this guileless creature dream that the little lamb she innocently left with me was what had been heart torn from its seat or her babe slain before her eyes than have signed it away to me. But treachery for treachery! Was she so? I never had a kind but hatred and revenge? I will gratify both without stint or mercy. I will pity none—spare none!"

As he uttered these last ruthless syllables he looked down upon the face of the corpse, and was horrified to perceive wide open and staring at him with an expression that froze his soul. He could not move or speak, he was petrified with horror.

The nurse entered the room with the child, the mother raised herself in the bed, stretched forth her arms towards her, screaming wildly, with a voice of terrible agony:

"My child! my child! Give me my child!"

The nurse rushed forward and placed the little one in the arms of the mother, who fell back the next instant, turning to the hue of ashes, a gurgling sound rose from her throat, her eyeballs rose, fixed to the last on her child, glazed, a faint convulsion shook her frame, and she was dead.

CHAPTER II.

Life as lovely mocked as ever
Still sharp mocked death. Yet no man mock me,
For I will kiss her. Winter's Tale, Act V., Sc. 3.

Out of my sight, thou serpent! That name best Befits thee. Paradise Lost, Book X.

A MAN named Mordaunt Elfstone, who had a remarkable "method in his madness," was confined in a maison de santé near Paris for many years. He had long enjoyed an ample fortune, when he met with an accident which deprived him of one arm. Having previously, from long study and love of the sublime art, become a proficient in sculpture, he continued to exercise his plastic skill, and, with undeterred, and being supplied with materials by his rich English relatives, wrought many beautiful works in marble. Most of them were, however, destroyed ere he left, through the perversity of their mad author, who had no sooner brought them from the mystic than, in some wild hour, he would imagine them to be possessed with the spirit of his deadliest enemy, and, in a paroxysm of fury, shatter them to atoms. Some few fine productions of his chisel were, in spite of him, snatched from destruction ere they were quite finished, but this interference with the iconoclast of his own creations plunged him into the deepest melancholy and despair. It was most difficult on such occasions to prevent him from committing suicide. Twice he resolutely attempted, whenever thus cheated of his idol victims, Mordaunt Elfstone, despite his demented condition, never failed to select a peculiar spot. Although not very old, his hair and beard had turned white as snow, and the latter flowed down to his waist. He was tall and graceful, and all his features were inexpressibly noble and striking, impressing the beholder with awe and admiration. It was only in the occasional wild and gleaming of his eyes, unnaturally brilliant, that his madness ordinarily betrayed itself. There was a dangerous if winning tenderness in his voice that melted the hearer's heart with love and pity for him, and elicited more melancholy wonder in the mind that beheld the most magnificent wreck of art the world ever saw.

When his friend Julien St. Croix introduced a very handsome young Englishman, named Bertram Hapswell to him, the haughty lalander was for the first time awed by mental presence, and thought that the madman would have looked more at home among the gods of the ancient Grecian Olympus than even among the images of human sublimity about his studio. The old sculptor in turn gazed at him with manifest pleasure, and seemed to be revived at the sight of his manly beauty.

"I heard you were melancholy, Mr. Elfstone," said Julien St. Croix, as he brought this blooming countryman of yours, in the hope that so pleasant a face would cheer you."

"I thank you, he does me good," replied the sculptor. "He does me good, and yet he makes me sad. Young man, I was as blooming and fresh as yourself not very long ago, yet that reflection does not make me sigh, for my good looks were my curse, and brought me to what and where you see me. No; it is the thought that sometimes my art fails me. I revel in all color, but it is not given me to represent it. I can give the graceful waves of your chestnut hair, and catch the hue, nor the happy blending of white and red in your transparent complexion. But even of these prettinesses the need I could not imagine, for the eye, the glorious, life-illumined, soul-speaking eye, is lost to my art as to a blind man."

Bertram Hapswell answered not a word, but his frank, blue eye expressed sympathy with the sculptor.

"Which is your art?" demanded the latter.

"I have no art," said the young Englishman, simply, "but sculpture is my adoration; for, as far as it is presented, nothing is so perfect; but painting, assuming so vast a province, is rarely but a very partial and modified success."

The sculptor's eye glowed like burning stars upon the speaker. He examined him again from head to foot. He was, although appearing in his first manhood, a splendid, finely proportioned very delicate organization, and his countenance sometimes evinced a degree of nervous sensitiveness it was unjust to nature. He was one of those beings who can stand unmoved amidst a crashing world, and yet tremble before the fall of a withered leaf which many would consider a trifle.

"You shall see my lost love," said Elfstone.

He drew aside a curtain, revealing a magnificent piece of unfinished sculpture, representing a female of ineffable beauty, upon whose exquisitely chiseled face the expression of longing for some one lost and dear was portrayed with touching tenderness and fidelity. The sweetness of melancholy and regret which this sight awakened seemed to encompass the figure, and the perfection of the proportions were unheeded and forgotten in the overwhelming power of the masterpiece.

"Who is this?" asked Bertram Hapswell. "The marble is the seeming, for she lives and I love her. What is her name? tell me, for I will wed no other."

St. Croix looked at the ardent Englishman with surprise and wonder, and regretted that he had brought such a mental incendiary near the madman.

"Mute is her name, for she cannot yet speak," said the sculptor, gravely. "She is my daughter, and when she is as sentient and perfect as Pygmalion's statue, she shall be yours, young man."

"She is lovelier now; I cannot wait," said Bertram with impatient imperiousness, ranging himself beside the statue and clasping its beautiful hand. "Betroth us now!"

"I do!" exclaimed the artist, carried away by the earnestness of the youth. "Call me father henceforth, for I will have no other son."

Julien St. Croix thought he beheld two madmen instead of one. But this scene of untempered enthusiasm passed like a dream. Bertram kissed his marble fiancée; the curtain that shrouded it from the gaze of the profane was drawn together, and rational conversation resumed with the most facile transition.

Elfstone talked with unusual brilliancy, and St. Croix congratulated him on his excellent spirits.

"You brought them with you, Julien, in the shape of your friend. I was fast sinking into the depths of despair, for my Serpent has deserted me. I have not seen her for seven weeks, and I fear she is gone for ever."

He was now Bertram Hapswell's turn to look puzzled and dubious. St. Croix replied calmly:

"She has been to Rome, I believe, but I think I saw her in the cathedral this morning. She will doubtless visit you to-day."

"She cares for me no longer, the ingrate," resumed the sculptor, in sudden wrath. "I look at this beautiful Virgin and Child I carved for her! Since she does not think it worth a visit, thus I dash—"

"Hold!" I am here!" shouted a voice behind them.

Turning round they all beheld the "Serpent" standing near them, tall, slender, graceful as the undulating sea, and smiling with a sweetness that seemed neither of earth nor heaven. Remarkable as was her appearance in every respect, it was impossible to see her for the first time and think of anything but her eyes. They resembled the scripture's, but though not more penetrating, were softer, darker, and more alluring and fascinating in their gaze. They had not the hard, gloss brightness of the serpent's little orbs, but a tenderness and softness that they seemed intended merely to look love into the heart and dissolve it with their tender ardency. Bertram Hapswell, whose sensibilities were so acute as to embarrass him continually, felt the power of their glance and of the strange, wild, yet graceful bending in his being emotions unfelt before, and he no longer marvelled at her influence over Mordaunt Elfstone.

Her love was the broad, fair and indissolvable of great perception; her eyebrows strongly penciled by Nature's graceful hand; her nose small and beautifully chiseled; her mouth; though not diminutive, very beautiful; and her hair black as night and profusely ringletted. But it was her swanlike neck, her slender form, lithe as a snake's, and her exquisitely rounded arms, tapering to handsome-sized infantile size; and still more, the musicality of her address, so subdolous and ingratiating, that had suggested to the mad sculptor the idea of calling her a serpent.

She burst into a low musical laugh at the start of surprise her effective entrance had caused, displaying two rows of small pearly teeth between her luscious lips, while her eyes danced with wild electricity.

"Come, thou truant Serpent of my bosom!" exclaimed the old artist, stretching forth his long arms to her. "Coil thyself about me, for my heart has grown cold from long want of its stung life."

She undulated into his arms, twined herself about him with fawning tenderness, murmuring words of love and penitence, that shall fondness. Their mutual gaze was like a stream of light, and for awhile they were so absorbed with each other as to be entirely unconscious of other presences.

The young man had withdrawn to the further side of the studio, and pretended to be examining and discussing the merits of an antique bust, of which a cast lay in the corner; but Elfstone soon recalled them to him and introduced Bertram to the "Serpent" as the so called his favorite protégée. She greeted St. Croix, with whom she was already acquainted, with winning grace, and bowed to Bertram as if he also she was a stranger, with the elegance of the most refined lady. The Englishman, who at first hardly knew whether the passionate Madonna she exactly was in turn worshiper or attraction to her, now began to believe with a sort of vague terror that she would compel him to love her in spite of his own will and conviction.

He walked resolutely away from her several times, but soon found himself again by her side, listening to her half-surmised conversation, and gradually kindling under the magic effect of her sidelong glances.

"Have I permitted to know your real name?" he inquired of her.

"Are you not satisfied with the Serpent?" she replied. "I think I can think I am like one?"

"I should certainly prefer another name for you," replied Hapswell, evasively.

"But you will find it only too appropriate," said she, withdrawing herself, while a shadow crossed her brow and a gleam shot from her eyes.

Bertram Hapswell cursed Bertram Hapswell, "she could not have looked more like the creature she is named after if she had coiled herself up for a spring."

"I forgive you for not telling me the falsehood I asked of you. My name is Marina Nisouche, daughter of—Stop, if you please."

As Hapswell raised her hand to his lips he felt a strange life thrill through him, and said:

"I am afraid of you."

"Why?"

"Because you are able to awaken feelings in me that I had deemed slumber for ever."

"You are too young for such cold caution. Why should you deny yourself any great sensation? I never do."

At these remarks Hapswell opened his eyes rather wide, and the Serpent, thinking she had betrayed too much of herself, would fain have withdrawn into the thicket.

"You are rash, Marina. I suppose I ought to run the gauntlet of this world's heart-buffetings with the rest, but I begin to suspect that I am in this regard an errant coward."

"You are, if you are afraid of me."

"I do not see that. We are, however, all cowards in one sense or another. I have too much perception not to be apprehensive of you; but if you will do me a favor—I dare you to do it—I will fear you no more."

"If it be honest, I will."

"Be yourself the judge. Look me truly and fairly in the eyes, and tell me you are not dangerous?"

In a moment the Serpent lifted her black orbs to comply, met the clear, frank, fearless blue eyes of the Englishman, and dropped her glance as quickly. Thus directly had she never stared at any one, except in hate or triumph. It was to her like outgazing the sun. What she had intended to utter was, too, she knew, a lie, which she could have spoken while planning issuance, but which she found very hard to tell while encountering the steadfastness of his pure, manly gaze.

"Try again," said he, tauntingly.

"I do not like to look into any man's face so boldly. If I were the Serpent I am called, I would gaze you into helplessness."

"Which is the reward ever?"

"Not I. I will do it, would my modesty as it may."

She lifted her eyes, flashing through their tears, to his, and said, steadily:

"I—am—not—dangerous."

"I will take you at your word, Marina; at least, if I cannot help doubting, I will act as if I trusted you implicitly."

"You break your bargain withme at once, but your countrymen are proverbial with us for perfidy; why should I look for an exception in you?"

St. Croix had been showing a book on gothic and emblematic architecture to Elfstone, and expressing his views of its merits, while the proceeding dialogue, which now attracted the sculptor's attention, was in progress, and the old man called out:

"What! my son, are you flirting with my Serpent? Beware! she will coil about your heart, entwine with your affections, and make you her slave for life."

"I have just been telling her that I foresaw the danger, and entreating her to spare me."

"And I had just convinced him how harmless I am when you broke in, and with a word undid the good work."

"Not so the better. "He is betrothed to Muta. An act of infidelity on his part would not only break her heart but shatter her to atoms, and the next time he came hither he would find her remains swept from my studio."

"Well," retorted Marina, as she turned with a mischievous smile to Hayward, "I consent at your father's intercession to spare you, for fear of breaking the stony heart of your fiancée.

"Allow me," she continued in a tone of mock solemnity, taking one of his hands in both of hers, which sent her electricity quivering to his heart, "allow me to congratulate you on your narrow escape; for I now ingeniously confess that, like a siren, I did intend to lull you into the slumber of false security, in order that I might devour you at my leisure. I am not a serpent only—the serpent is only the lowest base of my nature: I am a Royal Bengal tigress also; in fact, a compound of a man's credulity in deceit, a fox in cunning, a monkey in mischief and a panther in stealth. I am ravenous as a wolf, obstinate as a mule, revengeful as an elephant, insatiable as a shark, and fatal as a cobra de capello."

A truce to irony," said the demented but cunning sculptor. "You would have done all you say if I had not forbidden it. Why don't you try your arts on this young saint here? He captures of the soul of St. Croix would be a victory upon which Satan might plume himself, but such prone sinner as we are fall, like over-ripe fruit, on the slightest provocation."

CHAPTER III.

Oh, what a noble mind is here o'erthrown!
Hamlet, Act III., Sc. 1.

Snatch'd one-half out of the jaws of death.
Twelfth Night, Act IV., Sc. 3.

THE two young men took their leave of the sculptor and Marina Nitouche, and returned to Paris together.

"Bertrum," observed Julien, as soon as they were fairly on their way, "I promised to introduce you to a remarkable man, and I think you will admit that I have kept my word."

"You have, Julien. Elfstone is a marvel. I never saw a being who looked so capable of receiving the highest degree of inspiration."

"He was very quiet and rational to-day. I cannot say as much for one of his guests, who passes for a sane person."

"Your humble servant? I assure you that I can no more claim your account for the time than upon which I acted so wildly. I have, however, as little of the phlegm and stolidity of my countrymen as Elfstone; and my intense nature like his, in its moments of exalted enthusiasm and frenzy, sweeps mine away with it like the flood of a cataract."

"You informed me, prior to our visit, that you are partially acquainted with Elfstone's history. In this respect you have the advantage of me."

"I once received from a relative of his a brief outline of the incidents supposed to have caused his insanity. He was an unfortunate as he fell in love with the fiancée of his elder brother Alfred, while the latter was absent with his regiment in India, and upon the report of Alfred's death, married the not inconsolable fair, who is said by some to have been the most beautiful woman of her period. The elder brother was, however, alive, and returned suddenly to hear Mordaunt's conduct maliciously misrepresented to him, rushed to the house of his successful rival, gained access, and encountered our friend on the stairs, who gazed upon his brother like a man paralysed with horror. Alfred mistook his amazement for guilt, and in his rage hurled him to the bottom of the stairs. He seems to have made no effort to save himself, and fell upon his head, sustaining the injury which has so lamentably affected his reason. The young wife, hearing the noise of a fall, ran out of her room, beheld her former betrothed lover, as she fancied at the moment, risen from the grave, and swooned away. Imagining that he had killed his brother and perhaps frightened his sister-in-law out of her mind, Alfred Elfstone rushed out of the house as abruptly and madly as he had entered it, and was, I believe, never heard of afterwards. Some say he committed suicide, but I believe his fate has never been ascertained with certainty. Mordaunt attempted to trace him, but was himself found wandering among the Alps, as crazy and nonsensical as Hayward's kindred, and was finally placed in the maison de santé in which we have just visited him. His wife was dispatched by some interested and unnecessary relative after him in a wrong direction, and died abroad, it is supposed, before you knew how or where. Such is the sum of my knowledge concerning my father-in-law elect."

"My knowledge of his antecedents amounteth next to nothing; but I have recently visited him almost daily, on account of a medical prediction of which I am told he was the subject in 1858, now ten years ago, according to which he will be restored to his nominal condition and regain the perfection of his mental faculties within a few weeks of the present time. I need not tell you how eagerly I hope that this scientific prophecy will be verified, or that I would not envy winnowing so great and glorious a phenomenon for the world."

"I never heard of this before, but I will watch the event with you, and sincerely second your hope and hopes as fervent as your own. But I have this day been introduced to a person who has excited my curiosity and interest much more than Elfstone."

"You mean Marina Nitouche."

"I do. I have read much in poetry and romance of the Snake-Woman, but she is the first genuine specimen of the species I ever beheld."

"You do not overrate this singular creature. Her mobility is amazing, and I think it would be hard to tell what form she has not assumed. Of late she has been haunting old cathedrals, ancient ruins, sacred places, and has just returned from Rome and an interview with the Holy Father of the Church, and passes for a saint with some of the most devout. Only the other day I met her on Elfstone, however, she keeps her piety in the background, for any undue exhibition of it is certain to drive him into fits, and caustic mood from which she well may shrink."

"Her intimacy with Elfstone is a strange one."

"Not a bit. She is a woman, and a child in all the way, but with her it is the most natural thing in the world. She has many friends by whom she is equally loved, but the sculptor seems to make an idol of her. That she has good cause I can bear witness. I had just paid a visit to Caroline Marina, who was governess to my children, with whom I had long corresponded, and was returning by way of New Haven and Dieppe, when I first saw Marina. She was playing with my children, and Hayward was on board, and her lovely infant daughter was in the arms of her nurse, a lively girl, who, by way of amusing the child, had engaged in a little game with a handsome large dog that happened to be on board. The dog was a goodnatured but rough animal, and pursued his playmate in the fondness, where it raised itself on its hind legs, and with its forepaws and opened mouth threw itself upon the breast of the new favorite playfully. The child was but a child, and her struggle to extricate herself from her rudely sportive assailant, and her hold of her little charge, had dropped the innocent into the English Channel. The nurse's screams the next moment roused the sea-dog to action, and who rushed to the spot, fearing that the dog was tearing her child. When she became aware of the truth, she sprang into the sea without a moment's elapsed after her infant into the sea, and have been drowned. The count, who was no better swimmer than his wife, rushed to the gangway and implored him to reverse the engines and save his daughter. The captain promptly adopted every measure calculated to effect any good, without entertaining the slightest hope that they would be of any avail. But Marina, who was standing near the nurse when she let the child fall, sprang into the sea without a moment's hesitation, and with action quick as lightning flung off her bonnet and shawl, snapped the arm of the nurse in passing, and leaped into the sea. I rushed to the side of the vessel, and saw the beautiful woman rise to the surface with the babe in her arms. Her long hair was streaming down her shoulders, her black eyes burning with excitement, as she swam with the ease of a mermaid, and clasped the child. Then an arm she held the child and with the other made the waves sustain her, striking through them as if they were but mere playthings to her muscular arm, and, after a delay that, encumbered as she was, would have exhausted almost any other swimmer, she was picked up and taken on board. The countess caught the babe from her arms and covered it with kisses and tears. Poor Marina stood before the captain and count, almost reasoning to her heels, streaming with salt water, her tight velvet bodice saturated and dripping, and her drenched clinging to her limbs in a manner more suggestive of their perfect symmetry than conducive to her comfort; and the count, taking the infant from its mother, bade the latter show some regard for its preserver. In a moment the countess sprang towards Marina, pressed her, not the babe, to her heart, and kissed her cheek, face and lips with a great and sudden affection, that, strange to say, seems never to have abated. Marina was led blushing into the cabin, and soon reappeared in dry attire, apparently, and, I really think, actually more unhurt of what she had done than any of the spectators. The countess would not, during the remainder of the voyage allow her out of her sight for a minute, and is now as enthusiastic about her as ever, maintaining strenuously that she has the loftiest soul and the coolest head of any of her sex."

"Are you of the same opinion?"

"No; I hold Marina to be one of the most dangerous women alive. She is a sad coquette, if not worse. She is in league with secret and subversive societies, and is as treacherous as the element after which she is christened."

"She is, then, in your opinion, a sort of seaserpent?"

"She is a woman capable of all good and all evil, but sadly prone to the latter."

"She is indeed a terrific beauty, and I trust I shall not have to mourn that her sweet society."

"You apprehend that you might fall in love with her, and that she would but mock you for it?"

"I did have a fear nothing, for I have a talisman that will protect me against the fascination of the basilisk."

"I wish I was as well provided. I believe, however, that her fickleness and indifference are our best and only security. Desperate as I am, I know I could resist Magius, if she once devoted her charms to his subjugation?"

BREASTWORKS OF THE FIFTH CORPS.

14th New York awaiting Attack.

THE battles have not been in open field, as our readers will see, but scenes fought in dense woods, and used them for defence. At night trees were felled, and formed with earth into temporary breastworks. If time permitted a trench was made, as shown in the case illustrated in our engraving. Here our men would make a stand against the enemy, whose approach was heralded only by their presence.

The sketch above is from a photograph of the 5th corps (Warren's) on the left, where the 14th New York, the well-known Brooklyn regiment, were posted.

BATTLE OF SPOTTSYLVANIA COURT-HOUSE, MAY 10.

On Tuesday the incessant storm of battle culminated in the most terrific battle of the campaign a little after noon. The attack was at 12 m. On the 9th our Artists have sent us extended views. The accompanying sketch will give a full idea about the centre of the view behind the woods. Hancock's 2d corps is on the right, Wright's 6th corps in the centre, Wright's 6th corps on the left.—Dense woods, thick set with underbrush, covered the enemy's position; masses of troops could be seen but in glimpses, except when they would break into the woods, making no force an opposition, resolved.

Our sketch shows Hartzuff's 1st brigade 3d division (Wilcox's) 9th corps going into action on the left, and on the right Gen. Burnside's 9th corps. Burnside's corps coming up in season to decide the day.

The rebel line is in the distance.

GEN. BUTLER'S FORCES LANDING AT FORT POWHATAN.

SIMULTANEOUSLY with Grant's advance Gen. Butler, the man of all others most hated by the rebels, advanced up the James River, debarking the enemy by a false show. He seized Wilson's wharf landing and debarked a brigade of Wild's colored troops there. Our Artist shows the debarkation of the troops of the same brigade at Fort Powhatan, an important position which the rebels only surrendered after a desperate struggle with field artillery, never having thoroughly forthem manned it. This fort commands the landing by our troops, as part of the grand operations on the river.

FRY'S GRAND OPERA OF NOTRE DAME DE PARIS,

Represented at Philadelphia, May 4, to open the Musical Festival for the Sanitary Commission.

PHILADELPHIA, to give her Sanitary Fair a new zest, initiates the entertainments by a representation of Fry's grand opera of Notre Dame de Paris, which has been written expressly for the occasion. The opera itself is a proof of the immense stride made as a composer by the author since his opera of Leonora some years since was produced in this city, and without the projector which prevails too generally, would soon be a universal favorite.

The gorgeousness of wardrobe, scenery and other accessories left little to be desired in these objections. There are actually few places where it could be properly produced. The representation in Philadelphia was eminently successful, and with all the difficulties of a first night, and a company by no means accustomed to be produced so by practice, the music was given remarkably well.

To convey the impression of the drama to our readers is not our province, but we give a fine and truthful sketch of the scene on the Sunday morning "Jack" again appeared at divine service, to the elegant of rank of the Metropolitan Cathedral. Admission was given to Moses, the village bellman, and Bina, the rural policeman on duty at the church door, had their instructions to remove the bird. "Jack" was too sharp for them. Having secured a good position possession of the pulpit, and aroused himself by taking an inventory of the cushions, he commenced operations in a manner highlied on the reading desk, and appeared to be busily engaged in the service. Once something resembling the sermon was nearly over, when his quick eye observed an elderly lady in a side pew, who had taken off her spectacles on her prayerbook. In a moment "Jack" was down on the pew, and flew with his booty to the altar table, where he stayed during the remainder of the service. Service and communion, Moses and the solitary Bobby again attempted to eject the table intruder, but he refused to be done, for he took refuge on the top of the organ, and waited there until the sacrament was over. The churchwardens have since given strict orders that "Jack" is to be caged during church hours, or else that his life is to be sacrificed to cut the villagers, on the other hand, declare that they could better spare old Moses or the policeman.

THOSE real gems of thought that shine like stars in the night, were not struck out at a heat, as sparks from a blacksmith's anvil are, but deliberated and polished with a patient, and a weary, and an aching head and heart.

LOVE'S FIRST KISS.

BY JEAN INGELOW.

WALKING apart she thinks none listen,
And now she speeds, and now she stops;
While the evening star begins to glisten
Between the tines of blossoming hops.

Sweetest Mercy! your mother taught you
All uses and cares that to maids belong.
Apt scholar to read and to sew, she thought you,
But she did not teach you that tender song!

A crash of boughs—one through them breaking!
Mercy is startled, and fain would fly
But e'en as she turns, her steps forsaking,
He pleads with her—"Mercy, it is but I!"

"Mercy!" he touches her hand unbidden—
"The air is balmy, I pray you stay—
"Mercy!" Her downcast eyes are hidden,
And never a word she has to say.

Till closer drawn, her prisoned fingers
He takes to his lips with a yearning strong.
And she murmurs low that late she lingers,
Her mother will wait her, and think her long.

"Good mother is she, then honor duly
The lightest wish in her heart that stirs;
But there is a bond yet dearer truly,
And there is a love which passeth hers."

"Mercy, Mercy!" Her heart attendeth,
And the blush on her maiden brow it sweet;
She lifts her face then with low en bendeth,
And the lips of the youth and the maiden meet.

An Amorous Aeronaut.

A LATE French journal relates the following story, which, it will be seen, is French all over:

While Monsieur Gadard was filling an immense balloon in the Champ de Mars he amused the spectators by sending up the small figure of a man, the perfect semblance of M. Thiers without the moustache. The balloon being filled with gas rose majestically into the air and was soon lost to view among the clouds. His adventures, which lasted more than the next day, were curious. Thanks to a strong and favorable gale, which impelled him on his course, the little balloon man reached the Loire some afternoon in sight of a fine country houses in the neighborhood of Blevre. It was near the hour of dinner, and the lady of the mansion, as was naturally thought herself perfectly safe, was occupied in the mysteries of the toilet. It was a warm day, and the open casement of the window which looked out upon the park, and the balcony, was safe from any prying eyes. While tranquilly engaged, by the assistance of several maids, in rendering her waist to a size and shape that would reflect credit on her husband's taste, she was suddenly startled by a flash of lightning, followed by a terrific noise, and immediately the casement was thrown open and our little friend, the human aeronaut, was announced. The lady utters a cry of terror and throws her self into the shoulders. The little man, driven by the wind, throws himself upon the window sill, and, who, screaming with fear as ever, pushes him off, and he conceals himself under the bed.

Just as he wife, in a supplicating voice, says to this novel Don Juan, "Ah, monsieur, go away or you will ruin me!" the husband furiously rushes in, crying, "Ah, the wretch, I have now!" and even in search of his enemy he runs through the body. The wife, more dead than alive, entreats, in the midst of sobs:

"Fly, fly, monsieur, and save me the sight of a dreadful tragedy!"

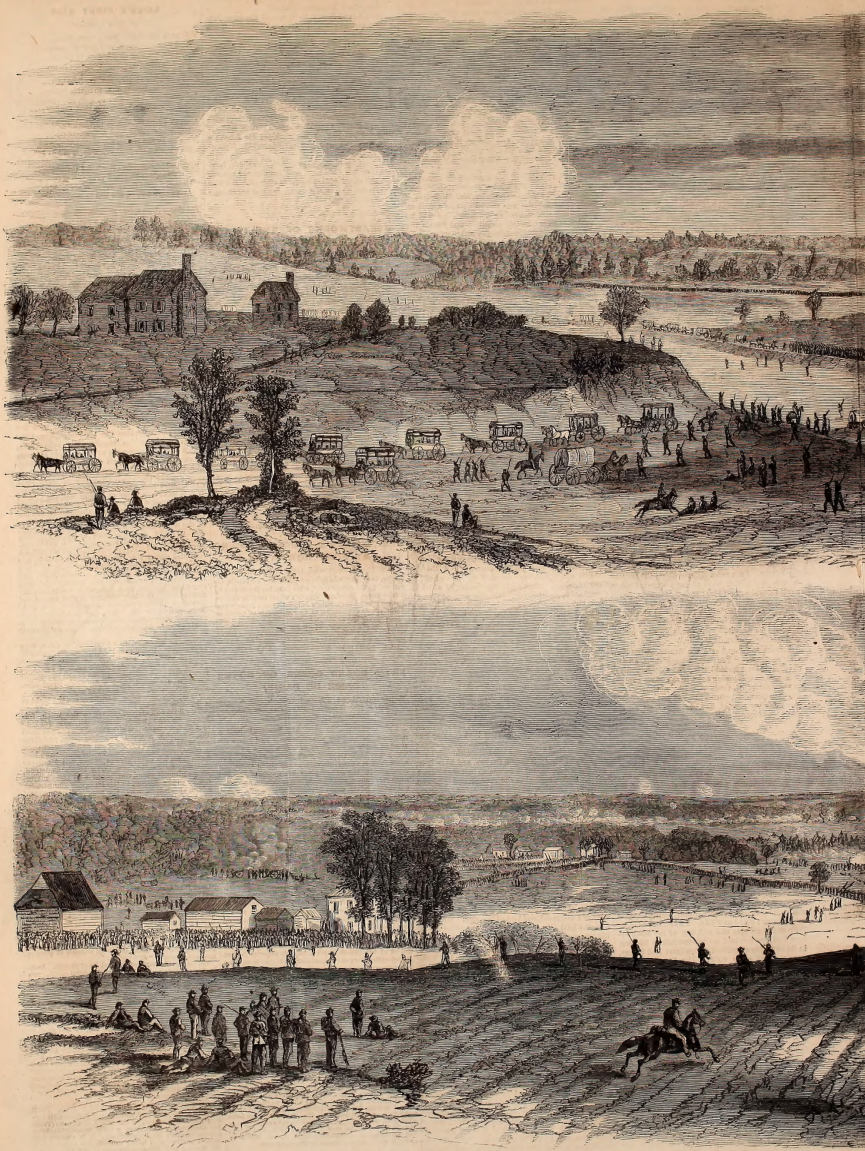
The husband arrives, armed to the teeth, followed by the whole household, who seek to modify his anger. While two of his friends hold the husband, a third, stooping down, perceives the intruder. The husband is disarmed, utters not a word, and catching him by the leg, draws him forth from his concealment, when, lo! Monsieur Balloon, no longer held down by the bedstead, raises himself erect, swells out and rises majestically to the ceiling, to the immense amazement of the spectators, while the poor jealous husband is left lonely, sad and all, heartily ashamed of his causeless wrath.

A WITTY ARCHBISHOP. — "Young Archy" contributes to the Dublin Mail some sons of the witty exchange for which Archbishop Whately was famous in London:

"What is the difference," he asked of a young clergyman he was examining, "between" between" and between?" The meaning seems nearly the same; yet there is a very nice distinction. Your answer was unsatisfactory."

"Well," he said, "it lies in this: you sit upon a form, but you sit between two."

Morrow's Library is the Muse of Dublin, and the Muse's favorite entertainer. Among the anecdotes told the Archbishop, "is the piety of certain ladies who, before they sit down to dinner, always say grace for a novel."



At a dinner-party he called out suddenly to the host, "Mr. ——, what is the proper female companion of Milton Dyer?" After the usual guesses he presses the answer came, "Ann Chovy!"

"Ah, Mr. ——," he said, shaking his head at dinner, "I see you could not have hoped to have a bishop: "come, though you are John Jones, you must be content to be Bishop." The answer was not taught: "I see your lordship is determined to draw me out."

ON DR. E——'s promotion to the Bishopric of Down, Archbishop Whately remarked to a friend that "The Irish Government will not be able to stand many more such appointments as this."

At a Lord Lieutenant's banquet a grace was given at which Archbishop Whately left the room. Subsequently, "did you ever hear the story," Lord Normanby's chaplain had preached a sermon of great length. "Sir, I have preached a sermon of great length. "Sir, I have preached a sermon of great length." Sir, I have preached a sermon of great length." Sir, I have heard some things in my time, but I never to day I never heard before." Such was the flattered chaplain's fate. A sermon next, and I could not have hoped to have said anything more on the subject." "I heard the clock strike twice, said Lord Normanby.

WOMAN WITH HORNS.—The New York Observer of the 19th inst. contains a letter from its correspondent at Larnaca, in the island of Cyprus (Turkish dominions), describing a most remarkable bona mulier recently discovered there. It is nothing less than a woman with horns growing out of her head, she has one large horn on the side of her head of the size and consistency of an ordinary ram's horn, besides three or four cornicles on other parts of the head. The writer says that he has seen her, and that she has been reached by nearly all the Consuls and Europeans in that place, some of whom are making an effort to secure her for exhibition.

A WEDDING SONG.

BY ADA VROOMAN.

OH, Love, though life's secluded ways
Allure us on with many a smile,
With many a sweet and tender wile,
We may not waste our precious days.

As sealights on a rocky shore
Illumine all the gloom around,
And guide the sailor homeward bound,
When dark and angry tempests lower,

So we, from our sweet height of bliss,
May be the blessed light which saves
Some toilworn battler with the waves,
Who never knew a love like this.

Sweet faith and trust shall be the crown
That brightens both our happy brows,
And faith in love and wedded vows
Shall cheat the world of worldly scorn.

And Love when envious storms assail,
Our hearts made by each other strong,
Shall do brave battle with the wrong,
And turn to love the bitter gale.

Our two souls, blended into one,
Shall walk in humble trust in God,
The way our blessed Saviour trod,
Until our earthly work is done.

The Gulf Between Them.

BY ANN S. STEPHENS.

CHAPTER XXXVII.—CONTINUED.

LOST and guilty as this woman was, there existed still one human feeling in her soul—even in his rage he could feel that she spoke the truth—she was not asking mercy for herself—she was pleading for the innocent girl whose future would be destroyed were it known how vile the creature was with whom she had been the associate.

"Where will you go—what will you do?"

"Anything—anything! You shall never hear from me again."

"You are going to that man! I will shoot him before your eyes—you shall see him die at your feet."

"There is no life so horrible that I would not prefer it to his presence," she said; "no death so shameful that it would not be heaven compared to seeing his face."

There was a brief pause then; Mellen caught up the spade again.

She thought he was about to kill her. She sank on her knees, and a broken prayer rose to her lips. She would not have struggled; she would have knelt there and received death patiently from his hands.

"Do you think me lost and vile as yourself?" he cried, reading her thoughts in this gesture. "I do not want your life—do with it what you will! For my innocent sister's sake I will spare you—but go—go where I never can hear your name—let me have no reason to know that you exist! If you cross my path again nothing shall keep me from exposing you to the whole world."

She made an effort to rise, but he put out his hand.

"Sit still," he said; "I have work to do—you shall stand by and watch."

He began throwing the earth back into the trench, and Elizabeth sat still and watched him.

It seemed to her that she did not suffer—there was nothing in her mind save the blank feeling which one might experience sitting over the ruin an earthquake had made, after it had buried up home, love, everything the soul clings to. He filled up the chasm and smoothed the earth down over it carefully. Then, without a pause, he straightened the lid of the coffin—there was no haste, no recoiling—he drove back the nails that he had loosened into their place—then he raised the box in his arms, saying, only:

"Come!"

She rose from the ground—she did not ask a single question, but followed him slowly down the avenue towards the outer gates. They passed through, out into the high road, up the little hill, Mellen walking sternly on, and the woman following.

They reached the graveyard; the fence was broken in one place; Mellen wrenched off the picket and forced a passage. He passed through, and Elizabeth mechanically kept in his footsteps. At the lower end of the graveyard was a single grave, with the earth still fresh around it; not a tuft of grass had sprung on the torn soil, but dead leaves had drifted over it, and the frost crusted it drearily, turning its moisture to ice. Elizabeth might have recognised this grave as one that had been given to a fair woman who had perished in the late shipwreck, had she found any room for thought instead of her great misery. But she only say a dreary-looking grave, at which Mellen paused. He set down the coffin and again raised his spade. Elizabeth stood by, silently turning to stone, as it were. She watched him dig a deep cavity, saw him lower the box down into it, then he began filling up the gap.

"It is done," he said; "we part, and for ever."

"We part here!" echoed Elizabeth.

"I have no more to say," he went on; "no words that I could speak would be able to change anything. If you can live, do so; but, remember, death comes at last—death and the judgment. I think, had your sin been other than it is, I could have promised you forgiveness in your last hour. But the horror of your crime in choosing that man——"

"I never knew it," she broke in. "Oh, believe that—do believe that! I ask nothing more—I have no right even to ask so much—but if you should one day hear that I am dead, believe that I have now told you the truth."

"You have the means of subsistence," he went on; "the stocks I settled upon you will be sufficient for your support."

"Only say that when I am dead you will pardon me—only say that, Grantley Mellen, for I have great need of one kind word."

"You will be careful that your name never reaches my ear," he went on, regardless of her appeal. "Hide yourself in some strange land, where no tidings of you may ever come near my home. I warn you, for your own sake."

"Give me your forgiveness in my dying hour," was all she moaned; "only that, Grantley, for I have loved you so!"

"I will not. This mockery is worse than your sin!" he exclaimed. "If it was to keep your soul from eternal torture I could not speak a pardoning word."

She fell forward upon the ground, moaning still:

"Only for my deathbed—your pardon for my deathbed?"

"Never! Never!"

The voice rang out clear and sharp, as steel striking steel. It was like the sound of prison doors shutting out the last gleam of hope and light from a condemned criminal.

"Don't be found here," he said; "don't ever be heard of again. We are parting now for ever. Go, look to the shelter of my roof, I will not send you forth in darkness—go, but we meet no more!"

He turned and walked away, she lay there and watched him threading his path among the graves.

He had reached the palings, he was passing through. She raised herself, her last expiring energy went out in one agonized cry:

"Your pardon—for my deathbed—Grantley—husband!"

He never turned, never paused—perhaps he did not hear—but walking steadily and firmly on, disappeared down the hill.

Elizabeth looked up at the cold sky; the moon was partially hidden, the dawn was struggling up gray and chilled in the east, the wind moaned faintly among the graves, and rustled her garments with a sound like the stirring of a shroud; there she sat among the graves of her world, as utterly helpless and lost as if eternity swept between her and the past, and there she remained during some minutes that lengthened out like years, with the wind moaning around her and dead leaves crackling under her feet. She could see her old home through the naked trees, with the dull smoke curling in clouds above the chimneys, and the great trees sweeping their naked branches over it. Oh, how her heart yearned towards it, how wistfully her eyes watched all those signs of her forfeited life through the leafless grove and the drifting leaves!

Grantley Mellen turned back to the miserable grandeur of his home. The proud heart ached in his bosom. But what if, from fear or weakness, she did not return to the house? What if she remained there among the cold graves or wandered off in terror of his wrath?

The graveyard was full half a mile from the spot where this thought struck him. He turned at once and went back, feeling how unmanly it was to leave the miserable creature alone, stricken with such anguish. He remembered how her uncovered head had drooped under his denunciations in the moonlight, that the cold wind had lifted the waves of her hair and revealed the dead marble of a face in which all hope was quenched. Notwithstanding his wrongs, notwithstanding the ache at his heart, he would go back and take her home for that one night—only for that one night.

He walked rapidly towards the graveyard, more eager now to find Elizabeth than he had been to separate from her only a brief time before. He looked to the right and left in search of her, but the moon was obscured now by thin gray clouds, and a fog drifting up from the ocean was fast obliterating the crowd of golden stars that had been so brilliant when he went forth.

Mellen walked on, growing more and more anxious, till he came in sight of the graveyard, then he paused under a clump of cedars; for he saw his unhappy wife forcing her way, in desperate haste, through the broken pickets of the fence, with her face turned homewards. The gray woollen shawl was floating loosely around her, giving a weird ghostliness to her appearance.

Mellen turned and went back, sheltering himself under the cedar trees. When he saw that she was safe a revulsion came upon his feelings, a sense of the wrong she had done him returned with bitter force, and when she passed along the outskirts of the cedars, making her way down the hill, he retreated deeper into the shadows, recoiling from contact with her.

"She will go home," he said, gloomily, "no one is more familiar with the paths through the woods. Thank heaven she does not know that I am weak enough to care for her safety! Let her reach the house first, we shall be less likely to meet."

With these thoughts in his mind he lingered in the cedors till Elizabeth was out of sight. The wind was dying away in low sobs now, smothered down by the fog, through which he could hear the moaning of the ocean afar off.

Mellen left the shelter of the woods and made the best of his way home, believing that his wife had already found a shelter there.

The house was dark and still as the grave when he entered it again. Instinctively he trod with caution along the halls and crept stealthily upstairs, for in the depths of his heart he was anxious to conceal Elizabeth's movements that night from the servants, and, above all, from Elsie. He paused and listened a moment in the square passage that led to her rooms, hoping to hear some movement by which he could be certain that she had come in safely. But there was no sound, and he turned away sighing, for compassion and the tender pity which every generous man feels for a fallen woman whom he had once loved was turning the bitterness of his rage into intense pain.

Hearing nothing, and with vague uncertainty at his heart, the unhappy man entered his own dark chamber, threw off his clothes and flung himself into bed, wretched beyond any power of my pen to describe.

But he could not sleep, could not even rest, the very effort at repose drove him wild. He got up again, dressed himself and sat down by the open window, looking out into the darkness. All at once he started and leaned far out of the window. Was it fancy, or had some wailing voice pronounced his name? Something gray and weird seemed floating from his sight through the gathering fog. At first it had the form of a human being, then it seemed as if a pair of wings unfurled and swallowed it up. Was it his wife? Could that winglike envelopment be her gray woollen shawl, tossed by the wind? Had her voice been engulphed in the far-off moan of the ocean? In this dreary state the unhappy and most wronged man sat all the rest of that gloomy night.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE day began; the sun was up; once more the old house awoke to life and activity.

Sitting in his chamber, Grantley Mellen heard the familiar sounds below; he knew that life must sweep in again, that he must rise once more and go forth among his fellow-men, hiding his misery as best he might, taking his place in the world and bearing the secret burden of his dishonored life. He went to the window, swept back the curtains which he had drawn over it, and looked at himself in the glass. If he had wished to know how his corpse would look after the ravages of time and disease, he could have learned in that prolonged gaze.

It was absolutely the face of a dead man; even the eyes looked lifeless—there was only a heavy, stony expression, which had neither life or humanity in it.

It was late in the morning when Elsie awoke from the heavy slumber which had succeeded her swoon. For a few moments she lay still, believing that the events of the past night had been only a dream. Suddenly she raised herself with a cry—she had caught sight of the shawl which Elizabeth had wrapped about her—she knew that it was all real.

She sprang out of bed, opened the door, ran through the empty chamber and entered her sister's room, crying:

"Elizabeth! Elizabeth!"

There was no answer—she looked about—the fire had died down in the grate, the room was empty and desolate as a grave.

She hurried through into the sleeping apartment, calling still in a voice which frightened herself:

"Elizabeth! Elizabeth!"

The bedchamber was empty too—the bed untouched.

"Gone!" cried the wretched girl. "Gone! Where is she? What has become of her? Elizabeth, Elizabeth!"

She shrieked frightfully in her anguish—cried out in such terrible anxiety that the sound reached the chamber where Grantley Mellen sat.

He went out into the hall and approached the door of the dressing-room. Elsie heard him—her first impulse was to flee, but her limbs refused to aid her.

She heard him try the door—heard him call:

"Elsie! Elsie!"

She must meet him—there was no escape.

Again the summons was repeated, and more imperatively.

"Elsie, open the door—quick, I say?"

She got to the door, she turned the key; her brother entered quickly, and there they stood, in Elizabeth's desolate room.

"Where is Elizabeth?" she cried. "I can't find her—I want Elizabeth."

Mellen felt a shiver of dread pass through his frame. He pushed the chamber-door open and looked in, pale with anxiety. She was not there—the bed was untouched, and gleamed upon him through the crimson light that filled the room like a crusted snowbank. There was none of that luxurious confusion which usually marks the apartment of a sleeping lady. The rich toilet service was in complete order. There was no jewellery flung down with half sleepy indifference, no garments laying ready for use on the chairs, or across the sofa. The silken window curtains were drawn close. The carpet looked like moss in the deep shadows of an autumnal forest.

"Gone, gone! Oh, my God, what has become of her?" he exclaimed.

"Where—what has happened? Is she dead? Oh, I shall go mad—I shall go mad now," cried Elsie.

She fell into spasms, but still preserved her senses sufficiently not to speak again—she dared not utter a word more, lest she should betray her knowledge of Elizabeth's sorrow.

Mellen carried her to the sofa and laid her down upon it, wrapped shawls and eider down quilts over her, holding her hands, which trembled like frightened birds, striving in every way to soothe her, as Elizabeth had so often done in the time gone by for ever.

She lay back at length, quiet but utterly exhausted.

"Where is Elizabeth?" she moaned. "What has happened?"

"Never take that name on your lips again," he said; "let even her memory be dead between us. That woman is no longer my wife—you will never see her again. She shall not suffer; I will deal gently with her; but to you, my dearest sister, she is dead."

"You have killed her!" shrieked Elsie. "Elizabeth! Elizabeth!"

"She leaves this house of her free will, Elsie—the only condition I have made is that she takes her name far out of our lives. Have you known—have you suspected this woman, Elsie?"

"No, no! I don't know anything but what is good of her—I don't believe anything! She is good and kind—send for her! You shan't drive her away—she shall come to me now! My dear Elizabeth—I love her! You shall not do this—you are mad, mad! She is the best woman that ever lived! Let me go to her—I will go!"

She was writhing again in hysterical spasms, but Mellen forced her back when she tried to rise.

"Be still, Elsie—try to understand me! I can't tell you the whole story—but we are parted. Do not plead for her. Do not mention her name."

"But, Grantley, Grantley!"

"No more, I say—not a word."

"She is innocent," moaned the girl; "she is innocent."

"I know what you suffer—think of all that I endure—let that give you strength."

"I tell you she is an angel—she has done no wrong!"

"I had the confession which separates us from her own lips—I tell you I would not have believed any other testimony. Don't struggle so, Elsie—lie still."

But she fought with him like an insane creature—she had no control or reason—it was only her inability to speak which kept her from shrieking out in Elizabeth's defence. She could only gasp for breath, and when words did come it was only that broken cry:

"Elizabeth! Elizabeth!"

"You must try to understand me, Elsie! You are all I have left in the world—oh, Elsie, Elsie! She has gone for ever, and I loved her so—I loved her so. You and I must live on as best we can—it is only for you, child, that I live at all."

"Only bring her back—clear it all up—the truth—the truth at last! Oh, Grantley, I—"

Her words were so indistinct that he could not gather their meaning; she was struggling more fiercely than ever, and it required all his strength to hold her.

"If you love me, Elsie, strive to be calm! Oh, think of my trouble, my anguish—my sister, my sister!"

"Only send for her—call her here!"

"Be quiet and I will search, but she went off last night, I do not know where!"

Elsie gave one frightful cry and sank back in his arms insensible again, a swoon so deathlike that it seemed as if life had gone out for ever.

Just as Elizabeth had raised her and carried her into her own room, so did Grantley Mellen carry her now, stricken by a fear so horrible that his past agony paled under it—if she was dead—if she should wake a raving maniac, and all from the evil influence of that woman.

He called no assistance; he watched over her in that lonely chamber, trying every remedy he could find, but for a long time his efforts were unavailing; she lay there, white and cold, as if the snowy counterpane had been her winding sheet.

Just as he was calling her name in a last frenzied burst of grief she opened her eyes. She was too full for speech, but she remembered everything clearly—she made a vain effort to rise.

"You must not talk, Elsie; don't stir—you will hurt yourself!"

He searched on the toilet table, found a bottle of laudanum, and administered as large a dose as he dared; he knew that the effects could not be so dangerous as her present suffering.

He sat down by the bed, folding his arms about her, calling her by every endearing name that his tenderness and fear could suggest, striving to soothe her into slumber.

Elsie would lie quiet for a few moments, then she would begin to struggle and cry out in that dreadful way, till it seemed to Mellen that she would die before the opiate could take effect.

The potion worked at length; she lay back on the pillows white and still—her eyes stared drearily about the chamber once more and then closed—she had fallen into a heavy sleep.

For a long hour Grantley Mellen remained on his knees by her bedside, where he had fallen.

He rose at length. Victoria was knocking at the door, and warning her young mistress that breakfast was on the table.

Mellen went to the door and opened it, checked the girl's cry of astonishment with a gesture, and said:

"Miss Elsie is very ill—go downstairs at once, and let there be no noise in the house."

She crept away in frightened silence; he followed her down into the hall, gave orders to one of the men servants to get a horse ready, went into the library and wrote a dispatch to his physician in the city, and came out again.

By the time the man was starting off to the station, Clorinda and several of the servants, to whom Victoria had communicated her tidings, were assembled in the hall.

In their consultation they forgot their awe of their master, and asked a thousand eager questions, which he answered with brief sternness.

"Go back to your places, all of you," he said; "Miss Elsie is asleep, and must not be disturbed till the doctor arrives."

"Is missus wid her?" demanded Clo.

He turned upon her with a frown which made her spring back as if she had received an electric shock, and entirely checked any further desire to question him where his wife was concerned.

He turned towards the stairs again, but 'Dolph interposed with one of his profound bows.

"'Scuse me, sar, but de brekfus is on de table."

The self-restraint must be kept up; whatever suspicions might arise when the fact of Elizabeth's disappearance became known in the house, he must not expose himself to the curious eyes of those menials.

He went into the breakfast-room, drank the coffee 'Dolph poured out with a skilful hand, pretended to eat a few morsels, then shoved his chair back and hurried up to Elsie's chamber—he could not trust himself yet in the presence of his servants.

Below stairs all sorts of stories were rife. Victoria peeped into Elsie's room and came down with the information that

"She lay dar like a beautiful corpus!"

Everybody groaned in consent, but she added new astonishment to their feelings by saying:

"And missus ain't nowhars about. She ain't in Miss Elsie's room, and she ain't in her own, and her bed ain't been touched all night."

Clorinda began to nod her turban with a sapient air.

"What did I tell yer!" cried she. "Now what did I jis' tell yer."

"But whar can she be?" wondered 'Dolph. "What do yer 'spose has happened, Miss Clorinda?"

"'Nuff 'a happened," returned Clo', "and more'n enuff. I told yer de tunderbust would break, it has."

They urged and entreated her to speak; but it as difficult to speak when she literally knew nothing, so she contented herself with going about her work with unusual energy, while the rest stood round and watched her, deeming this an occasion when idleness was to be taken quite as a matter of course.

Clo nodded her head, shook her woolly knots, muttered to herself, and made dreadful confusion among her pots and pans, exciting her fellow-servants to a fearful pitch by her air of mystery, but not a word would she speak beyond vague and appalling hints.

While the servants below stairs wore away the morning in such conversation and surmises, growing every instant wilder and more improbable, Grantley Mellen sat in that darkened chamber watching his sleeping sister.

The physician arrived late in the evening; by that time Elsie was awake, and he looked a little grave while giving his medicines and examining into the case.

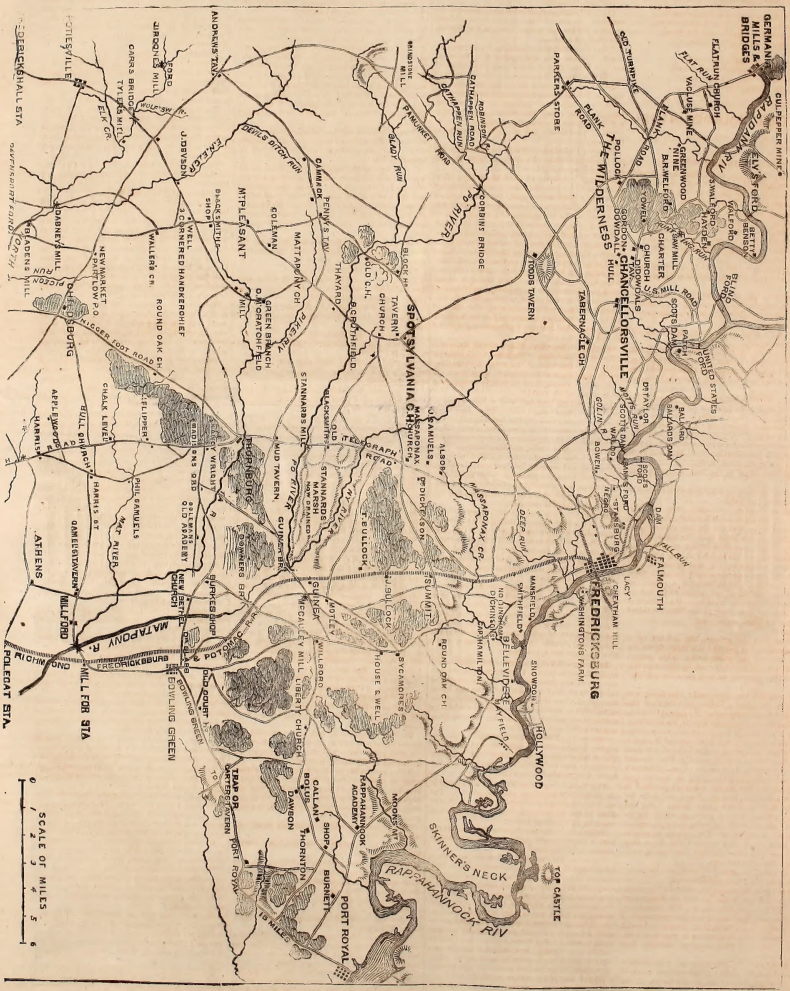
"Keep her very quiet," he said to Mellen, who followed him into the hall; "it is a severe nervous attack, but she can endure nothing more. Don't let her get up—I'll come back to-morrow. Where is Mrs. Mellen? she is so good a nurse I should like to give her my directions."

"She—she is not here," Mellen answered.

"In town, I suppose? You had better send for her, or give me her address and I will call and tell her how much she is wanted the moment I reach town. To-night I stay in the village."

"Thank you, I won't trouble you," replied Mellen. "You will be here to-morrow morning?"

"Oh, certainly! Don't be at all alarmed—Miss Elsie is subject to these nervous attacks. So I shan't call on your wife?"

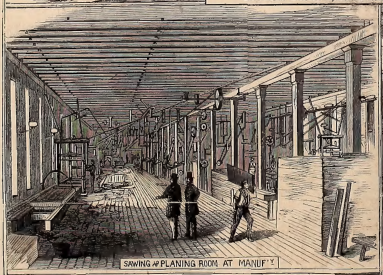


"No, sir, no;" he answered, impatiently. "I must return to my sister."

He bowed the doctor downstairs and disappeared, leaving the son of Esculapius to go on with all sorts of strange ideas in his head.

He had another patient in the village, and so drove over there in the carriage which had brought him from the station. As he was standing on the hotel porch old Jarvis Benson came up, caught him by the buttonhole and began a long story, to which the physician listened with such patience as he could find.

COMMENCEMENT OF GRANT'S GREAT VIRGINIA CAMPAIGN.



OUR series of war pictures would scarcely be complete without giving the initiatory movements of this great campaign, as well as its battles in general views and in detail. Hence we give the crossing of the Rapidan, a crossing that leads to victory. With what satisfaction may not we look on this passage of our well disciplined army, fully equipped, full of courage, trust in themselves, their commander, their cause and God.

MESSRS. STEINWAY & SONS' NEW BUILDING.

IT is only a year or two since we illustrated the magnificent new pianoforte manufactory erected by Steinway & Sons, on a block on Fourth avenue extending from Fifty-second street to Fifty-third street, and now we are called upon to record the extension of that great building and the erection of another splendid structure on East Fourteenth street, near Fourth avenue, designed by Steinway & Sons, for their own use as a warehouse for their pianofortes. This building is in a commanding situation, and is of such ample dimensions, and is so beautiful architecturally, that it is an ornament to our city, which can now boast of having the finest pianoforte store, probably, in the world.

The front on Fourteenth street is of white marble, and is 50 feet wide, with a depth of 85 feet. It has four stories above the basement. The first story is in the Corinthian style, with a portico in the centre 17 feet wide, and projecting five feet from the face of the building. The portico is constructed with fluted columns and pilasters, with full Corinthian caps, resting on moulded and paneled pedestals. These columns support rich Corinthian entablatures with carved modillions. The part of the cornice over the portico is in the form of a segment. From the top of the cornice to the under side of the main cornice the front is in the Renaissance style, and is divided into three compartments by two rows of rustic blocks, extending from the top o the first storey to the main cornice. The width of the centre compartment compares with the width of the portico, and contains one large window in each floor, which are rather more ornamented than the side windows. All the windows are ornamented with attached columns supporting rich segment-formed cornices. The main top cornice is supported by handsome carved modillion blocks and carved trusses, with a handsome pediment over the centre part of the building. Over the cornice there is a handsome balustrade, with a vase on each end.

The four windows in the front storey have in each one single pane of plate glass. The interior finish is of the most solid and best kind; all the principal woodwork, such as doors, stairs and partitions dividing the office from the store, are solid black walnut, oiled and waxed. The main stairway is six-and-a-half feet wide; the entrance to the building is through a handsome vestibule, wainscoted and trimmed with black walnut. The floor is of Italian marble tile of mosaic pattern. To the left is the large wareroom, exclusively for the sale of square pianos; to the right is located a smaller one for upright pianos; and on the second floor is located the large room containing the grand pianos. The height of the ceiling from the floor is 15½ feet in the lower storyys. The two upper storeys are used for music-rooms and artists' studios. The whole height of the building is 72 feet from sidewalk to roof. In the rear of this building a plot of ground is also owned by the Messrs. Steinway, 100 feet wide by 125 feet deep, with a frontage of 100 feet on Fifteenth street, which is reserved for the erection of a large concert hall.

The building was designed and built under the superintendence of John Reilun, architect. It is certainly the finest building in the United States of its class and for the purpose for which it is designed, and we doubt if there is a pianoforte store in any of the large capitals of Europe or England that can in any way compare with it.

The Steinways' new store was officially and socially opened on Tuesday, the 10th inst., when a large party of distinguished literary and eminent musical gentlemen assembled at noon to inspect the building and visit the factory. Carriages drove up to the door at one o'clock, and conveyed the whole party up to 53d street, Fourth avenue. The factory is a noble pile and is an ornament to the avenue. It comprises an entire block, fronting on the Fourth Avenue, and extending from 52d to 53d streets. The front on Fourth avenue has a length of 201 feet, with a depth of 40 feet. The wings on 52d and 53d streets are each 165 feet in length and 40 feet in depth. The whole building is six storeys high, including the basement. The architecture is of the modern Italian style, with brick lintel arches, brown stone trimmings, and brick dental cornices. It is very substantially built, the basement wall being grouted brick two feet thick; the first storey walls 20 inches, and the upper walls 16 inches in thickness. The main building covers 14 city lots, 11 other lots being used for the purpose of seasoning lumber, of which there is a stock of 2,000,000 feet always piled upon the grounds. In the yard there are four drying-houses, each of which is heated by 2,000 feet of steampipe, and contains about 60,000 feet of lumber, so that there are about 240,000 feet of lumber constantly under the process of kiln-drying. L. Burger is the architect.

After admiring the handsome exterior, the party entered through the office in 53d street, and came at once upon the store-room, which contains the actions, felts, hardware, ivory, cloth, pins, wire, etc., etc., used in the interior works of pianos. Of these materials there is a vast supply always on hand, amounting in value to over $30,000.

They next visited the engine-room. Here a splendid engine of 50 horse power, burnished as beautiful as the works of a watch, was moving, with easy regularity, the entire machinery of the factory. This room is situated in the spacious yard, where also are located three steam boilers of 50 horse-power each, supplying steam for power, heating and drying purposes. A supplementary engine of 20 horse-power is located in the basement of the 52d street wing, the better to guard against any interruption which might occur through accident or stoppage of the main engine for necessary repairs.

From thence to the front basement, which contains all the iron work, plates and frames, drilling machines, japanning works, and the rosewood veneers. Of the latter the stock on hand is rarely of less value than $12,000. No fire of any kind is used within the building. Every part of the factory is heated by means of steampipes, 40,000 feet of which line the interior. The wood-heating apparatus is also warmed by steam, which also heats the kilns for japanning, etc.

In the basement of the 53d street wing all the heavier machinery is located. Here are three large planers, one of which is certainly the largest instrument of its class existing, planing the largest piano tops or bottoms at once. There are also four up-and-down saws, several circular saws, besides turning lathes, etc. These wonderful and powerful instruments are constantly at work, shaping the rough plank ready for use in the first floor above, where the bottoms, blockings, wrest planks and other parts of the case are got up with the aid of moulding, jointing and other machinery.

From this department we ascended to the fourth floor, where the casemakers hold undisputed sway, and who take all the single parts made below, put them together, and veneer and finish the cases ready to go up to the top floor or varnishing-room, where every case remains about three months to be thoroughly varnished. On each casemaking floor there are three large warming boxes, constructed of sheet iron, and covered with wood, with sufficient steampipes in them to raise the heat to 200 degrees.

Higher up we reach the varnishing department, which extends the whole length of the front side buildings, in all 530 feet. Here we passed through avenues of cases, stacks of them piled up six and eight deep. There must have been many hundreds of squares, uprights and grands ready to receive the inner works. The vastness of the number conveyed to all the most convincing proof of the immense business done by the Steinways.

The sounding board, the stringing and the finishng rooms are located below, and were alive with busy men and the hum of work.

The department which excited the most intense interest was the room on the third floor, where all the finer machinery for scroll sawing, rounding corners and shaping the various parts of the mechanism is located. Groups crowded round each machine, and it was curious to watch the expression of interest and astonishment on the faces of the observers as squares became round in a moment, and unbroken surfaces were metamorphosed into the most recherché patterns of scroll work in a very few minutes. The operations are indeed simple and beautiful. Telltale clocks in the extremes of the buildings insure that the watchmen attend to their duty with unerring certainty.

There are over four hundred men employed in this factory, which, considering the immense aid given to them by the labor-saving machines, are fully equal to 600 fifteen years ago. This force enables them to turn out about 40 square and five grand pianos every week.

The statistics of the factory show that there are about 800 pianos constantly in course of construction. These represent, in connection with the stock of hardware, lumber, veneers, machinery, engines, &c., &c., the sum of at least $450,000, exclusive of the building, which cost, together with the ground, $150,000—making in all a represented capital of six hundred thousand dollars. This estimate is for the factory alone, while the superb building in Fourteenth street and the valuable lots both in that street and Fifteenth street are entirely unaccounted for. For these at least $200,000 more may be added—making, at a low estimate, a capital invested in the business of at least eight hundred thousand dollars!

Enormous as this result is, it seems to increase in importance when we remember that it is the growth of but nine or ten years, and that it all sprang from making one pianoforte a week. We doubt if the history of the piano business in any country can parallel such an extraordinary success as this.

The success of the Steinways has never wavered for a day since the tide of good fortune set in. The improvements which, from time to time, they have added to their instruments keep their reputation fresh and vigorous, and continue to increase their circle of purchasers. They fear no rivalry, for they have always gained the first prize over all others where their pianos have been exhibited, having received within the last nine years thirty-two first premiums, gold and silver medals. The fact, however, upon which they pride themselves the most is, that at the Great International Exhibition in London, in 1862, where 269 pianos from all parts of the world were exhibited, "they were awarded a First Prize Medal, for powerful, clear, brilliant and sympathetic tone, with excellence of workmanship, as shown in Grand and Square Pianos." Notwithstanding this immense competition, the special correspondent of the Times says, Messrs. Steinway's endorsement by the Jurors is emphatic, and stronger and more to the point than that of any other maker. Such testimony as this is conclusive as to the superior excellence of the Steinway pianos.

The private telegraph line which connects the factory with the store announced, we presume, that the party was on its way to Fourteenth street, for on its arrival a splendid collation, which was in fact a dinner, was found prepared, and was keenly enjoyed by all present, for the lengthened tour of inspection by no means served to blunt the appetites of the guests. Of course the success of the Steinways formed a marked feature of the speeches. To these just and flattering compliments Mr. William Steinway responded in an earnest and practical speech, which was very warmly applauded. The musical part of the entertainment was specially enjoyable, for the distinguished artists present played with infinite spirit and brilliancy.

The visit to Steinway & Sons' piano manufactory and new salesrooms was both instructive and pleasant. It gave to many an insight to a business which has assumed gigantic proportions in the past few years, and which is, even now, increasing daily; and the impression left upon the minds of all was, that the two magnificent buildings erected by the Father Steinway and his four Sons, were proud monuments of their industry, energy, probity and enterprise, and that they richly deserved the magnificent success which has crowned with prosperity their intelligent labors.

MEN cannot take a satisfaction for sin, though they seem to find satisfaction in it.

Which words no plummet have to reach,
Thou, Silence, art the lips of speech.

Truth

How vain are Falsehood's vagaries—
If there be one thing sure, 'tis this:
Vict'ry attends the thing that is.

Avarice.

If Love is cheated, bartered, sold—
Though piles of wealth I heap untold,
To basest dross turns all my gold.

The Rose.

Because no fairer blossom grows,
Whereon the day his radiance throws,
I am the flower they call the Rose.

DREADFUL ENCOUNTERS WITH BEARS.

THE following is from "British Columbia and Vancouver's Island," by D. G. F. Macdonald, C. E.

Three men were out hunting, and unexpectedly roused a grizzly. The bear charged upon the party. Two of the men were large and powerful. Instead of using their guns, however, on the enemy, they sought safety in flight. Their companion, though a small man, stood his ground; and as the bear advanced he fired at him, wounding him just enough to add tenfold to his ferocity. The snow being deep, the man was soon buried in it with the monster, furious and open-mouthed, above him. With great presence of mind he thrust his left hand into the animal's mouth and grasped his tongue, holding it with the determination of despair while he unsheathed his knife with his right. In making a stab at the heart the point of the weapon struck the animal's paw, broke off, and in consequence became useless. The tusks of the infuriated monster had by this time met through the poor man's left arm which fell helplessly from the brute's jaws all mangled and bleeding. He then thought that the only hope lay in counterfeiting death, which he did, and fortunately succeeded in inducing the bear to believe that he had won the victory. After licking the blood off his victim the grizzly moved away some distance, and was attacked by a dog belonging to the party; but paying no attention to his canine enemy, he again approached the man, who still lay motionless in counterfeited death, and having licked his face slowly retired. The two men who had run away, having viewed the whole fight from a safe distance now, when the danger was past, came up to their half dead companion, whom they found severely injured in many parts of the body, with a part of his scalp torn away. They carried him to a hut at a distance, where, by careful attendance, he in a few weeks had all but recovered from the horrible wounds he had received. A strong party armed to the teeth went early next morning in search of the grizzly, which being easily tracked by the spots of blood on the snow, was soon discovered and completely riddled with bullets.

Shortly before I left the territory another encounter occurred between a miner and a bear, upon which he came suddenly in a small canon. He had dismounted from his mule, his only chance of escape being to climb a tree, which he lost no time in doing. However, the grizzly soon followed him and seized him by the leg. With the desperate strength only known in danger, the miner had grasped the limb of a tree, and held on with one hand, whilst he fired at the bear with the other. This caused the animal to let go the man's leg, but not to give up the pursuit. Having paused for a few moments to examine how matters stood, it made another effort and seized the rifle, dashing it with great violence. The miner kicked the bear in the snout with his uninjured leg so violently that she fell, turning a complete somersault. Feeling somewhat disgusted with the state of affairs, she gave vent to her fury on the man's hat, which lay at the foot of the tree, tore it to shreds, and then coolly retired, but, alas! only to return when she could make more sure of her victim. The miner descended, thinking all danger over, when up came the bear behind him, and seizing him round the middle pressed him to death. This sorrowful scene was witnessed only by an unarmed pioneer, who unfortunately was so panic-stricken that he did not venture in aid of the poor miner. The day following the occurrence, this homeless and childless man was committed to the earth in a spot selected for its quiet beauty and the security from desecration which it promised. Thus departed the stranger miner, who had come to these lands so recently in the fulness of hope and joy.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A GENTLEMAN in Chicago had occasion to call at the house of a friend. He rang the bell, but before he could speak the buxom Dutch girl threw her fat arms about his neck, and fastened her red lips to his in a "long, long kiss," ejaculating:

"Ach, mein bruder! mein bruder!"

But the cool Chicagoian merely ejaculated:

"What the d—l!" and Katrine on discovering her error retired much redder in the face to her quarters in the kitchen. She "dink he vas mine soldier bruder, come home from de wars."

WOMEN keep a secret, but it generally takes a good many of them to do it.

THE paper containing many fine points—a paper of pins.

A MEAN man grudges a canary his sugar, and counts out grains of barley to his horse by tens.

OF what use is it that a woman can prate about Bacon, if she cannot cook pork?

THERE is a man out West so forgetful of faces that his wife is compelled to keep a wafer stuck on the end of her nose, that he may distinguish her from other ladies, but this does not prevent him from making occasional mistakes.

WHAT IS GOLD.

"What is Gold?" I asked a child;
In its ignorance it smiled.

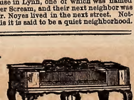
"What is Gold?" I asked a boy;
"Pretty little yellow toy!"

"What is Gold?" I asked of man;
"I will hoard it while I can!"

"What is Gold?" I asked old age;
"An illusion on Life's page!"

"What is Gold?" I asked of Heaven;
"As a test to man 'twas given!"

"What is Gold, United States?"
"Seventy-three at latest dates!"



RHYMES that satisfy the eye but not the ear:

Wife, make me some dumplings of dough,
They're better than meat for my cough;
Pray let them be boiled till hot through,
But not till they're heavy or tough.
Now I must be off to the plough,
And the boys (when they've had enough)
Must keep the flies off with a bough
While the old mare drinks at the trough.

THERE are, or were recently, two families living in one house in Lynn, one of which was named Yell and the other Scream, and their next neighbor was named Ball. Mr. Noyes lived in the next street. Notwithstanding this it is said to be a quiet neighborhood.

Literary Agency, Established in 1842. The subscriber has, for more than 20 years past, been in the habit of reading and preparing manuscripts for the Press. At first this labor was one of kindness, and performed gratuitously. But it became so burdensome, and absorbed so much time, that a small charge in the nature of a preliminary fee became necessary. This fee, not exceeding $25, and generally less, compensated both for a careful and critical perusal of a work in manuscript, and the offering of it, if approved, to publishers.

The subscriber continues to receive and read manuscripts in the same manner, giving his candid opinion concerning them, and arranging for their printing and publication, when desired to do so. He makes his charges as small as possible, since his chief object is to aid and benefit authors.

In all cases letters of advice should be forwarded by mail, while manuscripts are sent, prepaid, either through the Post Office or by express, legibly addressed,

Gray's Patent Molded Collars

Have now been before the public for nearly a year. They are universally pronounced the neatest and best fitting collars extant.

The Gray collar presents a perfect curve, free from the angles noticed in all other collars.

The Gray cravat cannot be puckers on the inside of the Turn-down collar—the ends are SEWED INSIDE at STRIDE—and therefore perfectly free and easy to the neck.

The Gravette collar has a smooth and evenly finished edge on some sizes.

These collars are cut from the end pieces of paper cut in the form of a collar, but are smoother and stiffer than any raw cross.

They are made in "Novelty" (or turn-down style), in every half size, from 13 to 17 inches; and in "Gravette" (or Gazette), from 13 to 17 inches; and packed two in a box, with the proper cravat, containing 10 each, also in smaller sizes of 10 each—the latter a very handy package for Travellers, and Navy Officers.

☞EVERY COLLAR is stamped

"Gray's Patent Molded Collar."

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

HOSTETTER'S BITTERS ON THE BATTLEFIELD. It is satisfactory to know that our field hospitals are no longer unsupplied with this life-saving preparation. Surgeons, who, as private citizens, had become acquainted with its properties, have in many instances made a special request that HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS might be added to the medical stores of their regiments, and their wishes have not been unheeded. As a means of sustaining wounded men on the battlefield, and of enabling troops to bear fatiguing marches under a blazing sun, it has been strenuously recommended by distinguished medical men, and the prospect is that it will eventually supersede all the alcoholized decoctions, liquors and dangerous Tonics that have heretofore been considered medicinal staples. The fact that a small quantity of the Bitters mixed with water from any of the Southern or South-western rivers will prevent it from affecting the bowels or the liver, should be borne in mind by Army Physicians, soldiers, and all who have occasion to visit those portions of our country. The man who uses HOSTETTER'S BITTERS in conformity with the directions, may set at defiance Intermittent Fever and all other diseases generated by the action of an unwholesome atmosphere upon an overtasked frame.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 453—Vol. XVIII.] NEW YORK, JUNE 4, 1864. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

"If he Wins in Virginia he Wins Everything."

It has heretofore been the boast of the leading orators and oracles of the rebellion, that the independence of their Southern Confederacy is but a question of time. They have preached this doctrine of ultimate Southern success against all possible disasters and all the teachings of history. What, they have asked, does it signify, though King Cotton be dethroned, though England and France have betrayed us, though our Northern friends have been cowed into submission, though our cities and towns, from Richmond to Mobile, may be seized and occupied by the enemy, and though our armies in the field be broken up into guerilla bands?—we shall be strong enough to wear out the armed legions of our Northern enemies, and reduce them to the recognition of our nationality. This absurd Southern delusion, however, is at length dispelled. The Richmond Examiner, in a late commentary upon the present grand campaign of Gen. Grant, is constrained to the confession that "if he wins in Virginia he wins everything."

The impressive lessons of this destructive war to Secession theories and anticipations, and to the Southern people concerned, have satisfied them that, with a decisive defeat to Lee and the loss of Richmond, their Southern Confederacy is at an end. As one by one the false lights by which they have been led astray have been extinguished, their eyes have been gradually opening to their real situation, until they have discovered that there is a point, even in Southern endurance, beyond which further resistance is certain destruction. Hence this frank, though reluctant confession of the most prominent, the most unscrupulous and the most implacable of all the organs of the rebellion, that if Grant "wins in Virginia he wins everything." The veil is lifted; further disguises are useless; the army of Gen. Lee is the last hope of Jeff Davis. The prestige of invincibility which has hitherto been accorded to Gen. Lee, notwithstanding his past defeats and narrow escapes, is at length destroyed. His situation is admitted to be critical, and yet, as success on his part would repair all other misfortunes, we see that all the available forces and resources of the so-called Confederacy are being concentrated in his army.

What is the prospect? We have heard much of the triple lines of fortifications which encircle the rebel citadel; much of the chains of formidable defensive positions which will enable Gen. Lee to overmatch a vastly superior opposing army, in leisurely falling back to Richmond; but the developments of the campaign have already shown that, against the combinations of Gen. Grant, no line of retreat, however advantageous to Lee, and no system of fortifications at Richmond will avail to avert the impending catastrophe to the rebel cause. Gen. Grant has shown in his recent flanking operations that, when the way immediately in his front is blockaded by lines of destructive military defences, they may not only be avoided, but that the enemy may be dislodged by simply turning to the right hand or the left. Thus the elaborately strengthened position of Gen. Lee at Spottsylvania Court-House is rendered untenable, and so it must be with any other position commanded by an open country on either side. In fact, as was aptly said by the late rebel Gen. Sidney Johnston, when turned out of Bowling Green, Kentucky, by the capture of Fort Kearney, many leagues to the westward, "there is not a defensive position in the Confederate States between their northern border and the Gulf of Mexico that may not be turned."

In the next place, Richmond is but a cul de sac to the defensive army in occupation, unless secured from a siege by an abundant supply of provisions. Is Richmond thus provided for a siege? The testimony to the contrary from all sides, and in every shape, is overwhelming. It is doubtful whether the city's supplies would be sufficient, under a close investment, to subsist a garrison of 50,000 men for a single month; and yet through the channels which feed the city, and to a great extent by way of the city, Gen. Lee's army is itself subsisted. If defeated, then, in the open field, Gen. Lee will be utterly incompetent to defend Richmond within its encircling fortifications. The city, should he seek it as a place of refuge, will be to him what Vicksburg was to Pemberton—a trap, from which there will be no escape.

Profiting from the experience of Pemberton, Lee is evidently pursuing a different programme. We conjecture, therefore, that, if driven into the Peninsula, he will abandon the city to its fate, and fall back with his army into North Carolina, rather than run the double hazard of sacrificing his army and the city together. But the Federal occupation of Richmond, in connection with Gen. Sherman's descent into the heart of Georgia, will be none the less appropriately interpreted by the rebel confession we have made the text of this article—that if "Gen. Grant wins in Virginia he wins everything." That he will win in Virginia is as evident as it was that he would win at Vicksburg, when his lines were drawn around the city, and its otherwise impregnable defences were rendered untenable in being cut off from all hopes of reinforcements and subsistence.

Perry Davis's Pain Killer.

This great public benefaction, we are happy to learn, is still fulfilling its mission of relief, and alleviating many of the thousand ills that flesh is heir to. Its domain is the wide, wide world, and wherever a Yankee has set his foot may be found doing its work. Its virtues have been so thoroughly tested, that it needs no lengthy recommendation to entitle it to the public confidence. It is emphatically a household remedy, and if kept on hand and used as occasion may require, will save much suffering, besides very sensibly diminishing the expenses for medical attendance.—*Providence, R. Summary of the Week.

VIRGINIA—GRANT'S ARMY.

The movements which we epitomized in our last were all, in fact, notwithstanding their bloody character and heavy loss of life, mere flank movements, which have not brought our army nearer to Richmond. As Grant moved, so Lee moved confronting him. Grant now lies with one wing resting on Fredericksburg, while Lee lies before Spottsylvania Court-house, the pivot of his various positions.

On the 19th considerable skirmishing took place between the 5th corps and the enemy's entrenchments. The 2d corps drove the enemy from his first line of works. Our loss in these operations was 800, chiefly in Burnside's corps. Guiness station, on the Virginia railroad, was occupied by our scouts on the 19th.

On the 20th Grant began a successful movement to compel Lee to abandon his position. Longstreet's corps moved at one A.M. on the 21st, followed by Ewell, but Gen. Hancock had moved before him. Our troops occupied Guiness station, Milford station and the line south of the Mattapony.

BUTLER'S ARMY.

Gen. Butler has been compelled virtually to raise the siege of Fort Darling, and fall back to his entrenchments.

On the 14th Gen. Burnham's brigade carried the enemy's outerworks at Proctor's creek by storm and the rebels fell back to a heavy line of earth, works behind Kingman's creek, near the fort, scarcely answering the heavy cannonade which followed.

On Monday, the 16th, the enemy, in force, under cover of a thick fog, made an attack on the line of Gen. Smith, and forced it back in confusion, with heavy loss. When the fog cleared Smith succeeded in driving back the enemy. An attack was made on the right of Gen. Smith's line between two squadrons of colored cavalry, on the bank of the James, and Heckman's brigade, seizing the pickets and securing a splendid position, which had been left for their use. Heckman fought well, but was steadily driven back; he himself was killed or taken. Our loss was heavy, and two 22-pound Parrotts fell into the enemy's hand. Wistar, who received the attack after Heckman fall back, held his own for a time, but a grand rebel charge compelled the whole line to give way.

At eleven o'clock Gen. Smith advanced and recovered his former position, driving the enemy into his entrenchments. A force of 5,000, under Gen. Ransom, from Petersburg, at the same time attacked Butler's rear, but it was repulsed. Gen. Butler, however, deemed it prudent to retire to his former lines, as we have stated, and was all day on the 18th resisting the attacks of the enemy.

We hold, however, the railroad between Petersburg and Richmond, and Gen. Kantz has succeeded in cutting the Dauville road, destroying the iron bridge across the Appomattox.

WESTERN VIRGINIA.

On Sunday, the 15th, Gen. Sigel was defeated at Newmarket, by the forces of Echols and Imboden, under the command of Maj.-Gen. Breckenridge, ex-V.P. of the United States. Sigel lost five guns, 600 killed and wounded, and 50 prisoners. He succeeded in crossing the Shenandoah and reaching Strasburg with the remnant of his six regiments.

He has been removed from the command, and Maj.-Gen. Hunter assigned to the department.

Gen. Crook was more successful in his operations near Newberne, having fought three battles with the forces under Gens. Morgan, Jones and A. G. Jenkins, completely defeating them, killing, wounding and taking nearly 1,000. His loss was 400 killed and wounded.

Gen. Jenkins fell into our hands mortally wounded. Averill reached to within 15 miles of the Salt Works in Tazewell county on the 7th, where he encountered a force of the enemy under Morgan and Jones, driving them on to the main body near the Salt Works. On the 10th Gen. Averill reached a point within four miles of Wytheville, where he encountered the enemy, 4,000 strong, under Gen. Sam Jones. He fought them for four hours, driving them, and killing and wounding many, and capturing some prisoners. Under cover of darkness the enemy retreated. Our loss was 120 killed and wounded, none missing. Near Blacksburg, Gen. Averill commenced destroying the railroad, which was most effectually done to a point four miles east of Christiansburg. At the latter place a small force of the enemy hastily left, leaving two 3-inch guns, which fell into our hands. Gen. Averill has fully accomplished the work assigned him by Gen. Crook.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Almost all the rebel forces have been withdrawn from Eastern North Carolina. The army investing Newberne received orders on Saturday, the 14th, to march North, and withdrew the next day.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

An extensive salt establishment belonging to the rebels at Cane Pitch, near Murrell's inlet, has been destroyed.

FLORIDA.

An expedition up the St. John's under Gen. Birney brought in 1,000 head of cattle, besides horses and other property.

GEORGIA.

Sherman, after two days hard fighting, compelled Johnston to evacuate Resaca at midnight on Sunday, the 15th of May. He had lost 1,000 prisoners and 10 guns.

Our cavalry, under Stoneman, defeated Roddy, destroyed a train and took two guns. Our loss at Resaca was about 3,000.

On the 19th Sherman reached Kingston, between Rome and Atlanta, occupying the former with Davis's division of the 14th corps. On the same day Sherman advanced, the enemy retiring. He found supplies and valuable machinery works at Rome.

ARKANSAS.

Advices from Little Rock to the 10th report Gen. Price retreating to Camden. He lost—by the admission of the rebels—2,000 in his engagement with Steele on the Sabine river.

Gen. Kirby Smith is said to be threatening Little Rock in strong force.

LOUISIANA.

Banks was at Alexandria on the 4th, and efforts have been made to clear the river of guerillas, so as to get the gunboats down.

Gen. Canby is making his way to the army, to assume command.

NAVAL.

Another American ship, the Avon, from Boston, was destroyed on the 29th of March by the rebel privateer Florida. Her captain has arrived at Plymouth, England.

CONGRESS.

In the Senate, on the 16th May, the resolution of Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, condemning the President's proceedings in connection with the commissions bestowed on Gens. Blair and Schenck, was referred to the Judiciary Committee. Mr. Wilson has proposed, as a substitute for this resolution of Mr. Davis, a preamble and resolution which, after reciting all the circumstances of appointment and resignation, claim that Gen. Blair is not entitled to his present rank and position. Bills were passed for the relief of the widows of Gens. Edward D. Baker, E. P. Whipple and Hiram G. Berry. The bill for the establishment of a line of steamers between this country and Brazil was considered for some time, and then laid over. The bill to equalise the pay of soldiers was taken up, and some amendments to it were adopted, but the Senate adjourned without final action on it.

In the House, resolutions, introduced by an opposition member, declaring that offers of peace should be tendered to the rebels, and that the President be required to make a proclamation of amnesty to any State which should lay down its arms and withdraw from the rebellion, with a guarantee that such State should be left to reorganise and determine its own institutions without interference from the Government of the United States, were laid on the table—76 to 53. Resolutions calling for the proceedings on the trials of Robert Taylor, of Tennessee, and Com. Wilkes were agreed to. Also a resolution requesting the Secretary of War to inform the House by what authority Brig.-Gen. J. M. Hubbel, Military Commandant of the city of Natchez, issued an order which forbid contrabands remaining in the city of Natchez, unless employed by some responsible white person, and forbidding any contraband from hiring or occupying any house in that city, under which regulation hundreds of the wives and children of soldiers in the field had been turned out of their homes. A bill granting 50,000,000 acres of land, in aid of the construction of a railroad and telegraph by the northern route to the Pacific, was passed.

In the Senate, on the 17th, the report of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California was submitted, showing the cost of construction and equipment to have been $1,600,118. A resolution was adopted, making an appropriation to the State of California for the preservation of Mariposa Grove, as one of the wonders of the world, it being composed of trees of from 30 to 40 feet in diameter, and estimated to be 3,000 years old.

In the House, the memorial of the New York Chamber of Commerce was presented and referred to the Ways and Means Commitee. The House then took up the Conference Committee report on the disagreeing amendments to the Naval Appropriation bill, and agreed to those appropriating $75,000 for the completion of the hospital at Mare island, Cal.; $15,000 for the purchase of a cemetery for the Navy and Marine corps near Philadelphia; and providing that out of the appropriation of $750,000 dollars for a floating dry dock and navy yard, approved March 3, 1863, the Secretary of the Navy may construct two dry docks at New York and Philadelphia, $200,000 for each. A resolution was adopted calling on the Secretary of the Navy for copies of the proceedings of the Admiral Wilkes court-martial. The resolutions declaring that Messrs. Joseph Segar and Lucas H. Chandler were not entitled to seats as Representatives from Virginia were discussed for some time and adopted. The House then adjourned.

In the Senate, on the 18th, Mr. Wilson reported the House bill defining the pay of officers on the staff of the Lieutenant-General; passed. The bill to expedite the public printing was taken up. An amendment was adopted suspending the printing of the offers received and contracts made for carrying the mails; the bill passed.

In the House, on the consideration of the joint resolution heretofore reported from the Committee on Commerce, proposing such action as will insure more perfect reciprocity of trade between the United States and British North American Provinces, Mr. Elijah Ward addressed the House at length on the subject. Various amendments were made, but of no special importance, when the Committee rose, and the bill was reported to the House, but not finally acted upon.

In the Senate, on the 19th, a report recommending that the Senate insist on the amendments to the Army Appropriation bill, and ask for another committee of conference, was agreed to. The report of the Committee of Conference on the Territory of Montana was agreed to by the following vote: yeas, 26; nays, 13. The Pacific Railroad bill was debated at length on its minor amendments.

The House passed the Senate bill amendatory of the Act authorizing Nevada to form a State Government. The Indian Appropriation bill was passed as amended. Mr. Dawes rose to a personal explanation, and spoke very bitterly of remarks made with reference to him by Mr. Loan. Mr. Loan, in reply, said he believed his speech to have been a just and legitimate defence, from an attack made upon him in a most unprovoked manner. Mr. Mallory rose to make a personal explanation, and caused to be read a reported colloquy between Mr. Julian and himself from the Daily Globe. Some very strong remarks passed between Mr. Mallory, Mr. Julian and Mr. Wadsworth.

In the Senate, on the 20th, Mr. Collamer called up the bill to authorise the establishment of an Ocean Mail Steamship Service between the United States and Brazil, the question pending being on an amendment of Mr. Wilkinson to carry on the contract between the Government of Venezuela and certain citizens of New York for a semi-monthly line from that city to Laguayra and other Venezuelan ports, touching at St. Thomas, the United States to pay $40,000 per annum for mails, &c. The amendment was rejected, and, after some discussion on the general merits of the bill, it was laid over.

In the House, Mr. Washburne introduced Mr. E. C. Ingersoll as the successor of the late Owen Lovejoy. Mr. Ingersoll was qualified and took his seat. Mr. Webster, from the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing amendments to the bill establishing a Territorial Government in Montana, made a report thereon, which, he said, struck out the Senate's amendment giving the right of suffrage to colored persons, and consigned it to every free white male citizen of the United States, and those who have declared their intention to become such. The report was concurred in by a vote of 102 against 26. The Senate had already agreed to the report. Mr. Cox asked leave to denounce the suppression of the World and the Journal of Commerce, but objections were made. The House then adjourned until Monday.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Mr. Cyrus W. Field, who returned to this country from England by the Persia, reports most favorably of the Atlantic telegraph cable. The Great Eastern has been chartered to lay it. We may mention, as an instance of scientific progress, that Mr. Field received at Queenstown a telegraphic dispatch, dated at Irkutsk, Siberia, on Sunday, May 8, at 8.10 A.M., at 10.10 the same morning, although the distance from Irkutsk to Queenstown is over 6,500 miles.

The war feeling against Germany was rising rapidly in France and England, especially the latter, where the Queen's German proclivities were freely and severely condemned.

There was no new movement at the seat of war in Denmark. The Danish Government refused to raise the blockade of the German ports. Very little hope was entertained of any important result from the London Conference. The British Cabinet refused to give Parliament any information as to the progress made by the Plenipotentiaries.

Sir Leopold McClintock, R.N., had taken the British Channel fleet to the north, with the avowed object of preserving the Danes from being overpowered in the Baltic by the Austrian fleet.

There had been a naval engagement between the Danish and German fleets, which, although a drawn battle, had resulted in considerable loss of life to the Germans, their killed and wounded being 170, while the Danes only lost 56.

It was said that Russia had concentrated an army of 60,000 men at the mouth of the Danube, that Austria had sent 25,000 men to the frontier of Servia, and that the Turkish army in the Roumelia was to be increased to 150,000.

TOWN GOSSIP.

Last week we made mention of a ladies' meeting, to be held at the Cooper Institute, to create a league sworn against silks, satins, laces and articles of foreign luxury. The meeting did come off, and that rather democratic stronghold, the lecture-room of the Institute, was crowded to repletion with a host of ladies who rolled thither in gorgeous carriages, with livoried footmen, but themselves rather subdued in dress. We are sorry that, in telling the truth—though the reports in the daily press do not admit the fact—the meeting, from the very beginning, showed incongruous elements; and before it had really advanced to business showed a division that was fatal to its success, ending, finally, in what would have been termed, had it been a gathering of men, a breaking-up in a row, and a clearance of the room by the police! A terrible st ory to te ladies—but the truth—positively the truth.

A pledge was offered and a few hundreds signed it, bu the great majority stood aloof, and though the said pledge has remained at the rooms of the Sanitary Commission for signers ever since, it has been severely le alone by the mass of the lady population. As we said last week, the movement cannot be made practical. The desire for dress is so radical and deepseated, that nothing less than a convulsion of nature can affect it. Dress is with woman what drink is with men, and is equally productive of intemperance, shame, degradation and death. Heaven speed the time when a reform will come!

This has been somewhat a week of sensations in the dramatic line, instanced by the opening of a new theatre, made out of an old one, the production of a new play by Brougham, and various minor efforts and effects.

We will speak of the first, the inauguration of Mr. George Wood's Broadway Theatre, and the production of Fanny Kemble's play, "An English Tragedy." Of the theatre little need be said; it is already familiar to the world as Wallack's of ye olden time, and has, by th new manager, had its chronic dirt and seediness scrubbed away, and with a new dress of blue and gold breaks forth with all the splendor of the past. Of the play produced as a baptism, we must say little. It is simply the crudity of one who mistook her vocation, when she believed that, because she could act, she could also make plays for others to act. The story lacks all moral and is simply repulsive, while the actual construction could not have been more faulty or lacked originality more strikingly had it been written, not, as the authoress informs us, "twenty or thirty years ago, and the only production of the kind since my schooldays," but during that bread and butter period of her existence.

With "Bel Demonio" the first fault we have to find is its obscurity. The story is not clearly made out, a fault that seems the stranger in anything emanating from the pen of John Brougham, who is certainly one of the best dramatic constructionists in the world. The character of Angelo lacks force; whether this lacking exists in the original, or whether Mdlle. Vestvali fails to give what the author intended, it is impossible to say. One thing is certain, that Mr. Hazan, as the Cardinal Montalto, comes out more strongly than Angelo, and in many points acts him down. In the first two acts Vestvali has much strength, but seems to fail in her impression after the delivery of her beautiful song, "You are the Star," which certainly she gives with such execution and feeling as really to deserve the encore she always gets. She sings it to Lena, not to the audience, a mode of delivery that the dramatic profession would do well to study more, whether it be in musical or elocutionary effort. Mdlle. Vestvali certainly has stage act on, perhaps a little too much of it, and we would suggest would be improved by that study in which Miss Cushman so much excelled, the step and carriage of a man. We submit that no man ever walked as did Angelo, or stood on one leg, the other foot almost clear from the floor, as that youthful lover is made to appear.

Of the general getting-up of the piece, and the painting of scenery, too much cannot be said in praise. The opening scene, the ruins of the abbey, and the mountain torrent in the third act, where Mdlle. Vestvali makes the fearful leap down the rocks, were beautifully done, and show what may be achieved some day when a manager arises in our midst with the cash and ambition to rival London and Paris.

Last week Mrs. Wood made an attempt to transplant the Bowery to Broadway by producing "Satan in Paris," with Miss Henrietta Irving as her Satan. The piece is vapid and without sensational points, but to the idea of giving Broadway a taste of the Bowery we are a decided convert. What just now would create a greater furore than Mazeppa transplanted to the Olympic, with some one of the dashing, handsomely formed women who elicit the "Hi! hi's!" of the east side? Why not give us a touch of "Jack Sheppard," or "The Dog of Mortargis," that kid gloves and opera glasses may for once see upon what dramatic food the bone and sinew is fed and grows so strong?

Mrs. Wood also brought out a new play, "Paul's Return," now acted in London with decided success, and with it gives us Mr. Charles Barron, who made a favorable impression in "Judith."

The Florences have failed to revive the popularity of "The Ticket-of-Leave Man." One week of rather poor houses convinced them of their folly, and the last week was devoted to Byron's—not the poet—burlesque on "Fra Diavolo," and like pleasant things.

Mrs. Henry C. Watson, whose name has become familiar to people of taste, gave another of her charming vocal and recitative entertainments at Dodworth's Rooms, on Tuesday last, to a larger audience than is usually seen at an intellectual soirée. We will venture to say that "The Bells" were never chimed with more musical emphasis than by this lady, or "When Daisies Pied" more sweetly and unaffectedly sung.

Maretzek has started for Europe, to bring a new company as soon as possible, including chorus and orchestra —everything new but Bellini.

Barnum drops "Belphegor," though still retaining Mdlle. Ernestine, and produces "Janet Pride," Bourcicault's drama, which old theatregoers will remember as played at Burton's many years ago.

We shall drop the doings of the week with a short account of a Salamanderish individual, who made an appearance of a special kind at Jones's Wood during the week, and introduced certain novel and fiery effects worthy of chronicle.

Signor Christoforo Buono Core—so he calls himself, which, translated, looks like Christopher Goodheart, Esq.—made rather a successful attempt to show a crowd of savans, etc., that he could, unharmed, walk through blazes. Mr. C. G. had constructed for himself a species of iron cage, well piled about with inflammables, which were fired, and the signor, while the blaze was hot enough to make a long distance desirable, came forward, clothed in a somewhat diabolical suit of red, and deliberately walked into the midst of the flames, where he remained until the burning material was consumed!

The exhibition was interesting, not only in the light of an exhibition but as a scientific fact, something which we believe is to be demonstrated to the Fire Department, and used by them, the discoverer having offered, under certain restrictions, to impart the secret that will enable a fireman to walk unburned through a blazing building.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A band of English operatives from Lancashire—some 40 adults, male and female, with a fair proportion of little folks—arrived at Waterville, Maine, the other day, on their way to the mills at North Vassalboro. They are shorter by a head than the Maine Yankees.

—— A large and spirited meeting of influential ladies was lately held at a private house in Boston, at which it was resolved to retrench expenditures in dress, in the household, and all superfluous luxuries; to give the preference to the products of our own country, and thus be enabled to contribute more largely than ever to the strength of our armies and the relief of the suffering throughout our land.

—— A meeting of sewing women was recently held at Philadelphia, at which the low prices paid for the labor of that class was under consideration. It was stated that army drawers, that were formerly made for ten, were now made for four and five cents each. They formerly received 25 cents for making shelter tents, now only 16 cents were received and only three could be made in a day.

Military.—Spottsylvania Court House, mentioned in the dispatches from the seat of war in Virginia, is the county seat of Spottsylvania county. It is a village of less than 200 inhabitants, situated on the Po (or Ta) river, a branch of the Mattapony. It is 20 or 22 miles east of Orange Court House, about 14 miles south-east of Fredericksburg, and by the course of the roads 65 miles north-northwest of Richmond.

—— On the 2d day of May, Gen. Kilpatrick, who had penetrated to Tunnel Hill, Ga., with his command, left there a note for the rebel Gen. Wheeler, saying: "I came out to meet you on Friday with 450 men, which you declined; to-day I come with 1,000; next time I will come with my whole command and annihilate you and your minions. Your classmate, W. H. Kilpatrick, Brigadier-General U. S. A."

—— Gen. Sedgwick was killed while occupied in making out a plan of the fighting ground for his command. His staff were around him at the time, when a sharpshooter fired three shots at him. One of his aides remarked that they were making a target of him, when he replied that there was no danger of his being hit at that distance. A moment after the fatal bullet struck him in the face, killing him instantly.

—— Gen. Philip H. Sheridan, whose recent brilliant exploits have formed so important a part of Gen. Grant's movement on Richmond, is a native of the Old Bay State, as appears by the official Army Register. He was appointed a cadet at West Point from Ohio. All the sketches of Gen. Sheridan which have thus far appeared in Western papers claim Ohio as his birthplace.

Personal.—Mr. Charles Hale, one of the editors and proprietors of the Boston Daily Advertiser, has been appointed to succeed the late Mr. Thayer as Consul at Alexandria, Egypt. The post was first offered to Mr. George William Curtis, who declined it.

—— The venerable Charles King, LL. D., for so many years President of Columbia College, has resigned, and the Rev. Dr. Barnard, formerly of the Mississippi University, has been chosen to fill the vacancy. Dr. Barnard is an Episcopal clergyman, and was born in Sheffield, Mass.

Obituary.—Adjutant Henry W. Bond, of the 20th Mass. regiment, who was wounded in the Wilderness, and afterwards shot by guerillas while on his way to Washington, died in that city on the 14th. He was a son of George William Bond, Esq., of this city, and was formerly one of the firm of Walker, Wise & Co. Adjutant Bond was a young man of estimable character, and a large circle of friends will mourn his early death. He was a graduate of Harvard College in the class of 1859, and his name adds another to the list of the alumni of this institution who have freely given their lives to their country.

—— The gallant Col. Griswold, of the 56th Mass. Vol., fell in the fight on the 5th of May. His servant states that the color-bearer of the regiment was shot down, and the front recoiling, the Colonel seized the colors, and waving it, calling to the men to advance, received a fatal wound in his neck by a sharpshooter. He died almost instantly. His officers buried him near where he fell, in the midst of the Wilderness, and many miles from any house.

—— Mr. J. S. Edgar, who died recently in England, was a favorite writer of books for boys, not unlike Mayne Reid in style, and but little behind him in popularity. His best known works were "Crusades and Crusaders," "Wars of the Roses," and "Footsteps of Famous Men." Mr. Edgar was 37 years old at the time of his death.

—— Capt. Wm. White Dorr, son of Rev. Dr. Dorr, the rector of Christ Church, Philadelphia, was instantly killed in one of the recent battles near Spottsylvania. The Philadelphia Press says: "As an officer he was cool, energetic, and universally beloved by his command. Though junior in rank to some of his fellow officers, he was recently recommended by them for promotion to the vacant majority in his regiment (the 121st Penn.), and was in command when he was shot.

—— Lieut.-Col. Waldo P. Merriam, commander of the 16th Mass., is among the killed in one of the recent sanguinary battles in Virginia. Lieut.-Col. Merriam was the son of Charles Merriam, Esq., and was 25 years of age. Educated to the mercantile profession, and travelling in Europe for the purpose of completing his education, he resolved to return home at the breaking out of the war and enter the military service. He commenced his career as Adjutant of the 16th. This was in 1861. On the death of Col. Wyman he was made Major, and was soon after promoted to the Lieutenant-Colonelcy. He led the 16th as its commander at Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, in every engagement gaining fresh laurels, and in one of which he was severely wounded, and finally met his fate at the battle of the Wilderness, in a charge of Hancock's 2d corps, to which his regiment was attached.

Accidents and Offences.—The condition of the Malden (Mass.) murderer, Green, appears to be most pitiable. He is much depressed, and says little to any one.

—— A woman was killed in Newport, R. I., last week, while walking on the sidewalk, by a heavy carpet, which was thrown from a third story window. The coroner's jury rendered an extraordinary verdict, to the effect that they "are deserving of the severest censure who threw so heavy a carpet from so high a window!"

—— Several newspapers, our own among the number, lately fell into a mistake, which would be amusing did it not reflect upon a most estimable citizen, Mr. H. T. Machin, of Portland, who was reported as having "done" the Hon. A. T. Galt out of $2,000. The facts are that it was a clerk of Mr. Machin who defrauded his employer out of that sum. Mr. Galt has written to the editor of the New York Times to that effect, and speaking of Mr. Machin in the highest terms.

Foreign.—A London surgeon, it is said, lately put a dog to sleep with chloroform, and, taking out a piece of his skull, inserted a watch crystal, through which he can see the change in the brain produced by sleep.

—— The opinion appears to be gaining ground in England that submarine cables should be made of the lightest material. A copper wire, with a Manilla hemp insulator, is now recommended as the lightest and strongest, yet is heavy enough to sink. The Red Sea and Algiers cables are said to have been destroyed by their own weight.

—— M. Edmond About makes this odd calculation of the manner in which the taxes of a Frenchman who pays 1,750 francs a year (which he says are the taxes paid by the master of an income of 200,000f., $4,000, annually) go: The Emperor comes in for 25f.; the Imperial family, 1f. 50c.; every deputy, 3f. 4c.; the Legion of Honor, 8f. 55c.; the Imperial Library, 40c.; the Institute, 61c.; the 15th August, 20c.; scientific and literary subscriptions, 14c.; the improvement of the breed of horses, 3f. 87c.; the Conservatory and Imperial Theatres, 1f. 71c.; scientific missions, 5c.; the guillotine, 20c.; war (army, navy and Algeria), 528f. 29c.; public works, agriculture, industry and commerce, 72f. 8c.; cost of collecting taxes, 267f. 64c.; ministry of justice, 32f.; interior, 51f. 27c.; public instruction, 53f.; religious, 46f.; diplomacy, 12f. 62c.

—— The editor of the Berlin Volks Zeitung has received the honor of a public dinner, on the occasion of the last of a series of 5,000 leaders, which he has written for that journal on 5,000 successive days, a feat which appears considered at least equal to walking 1,000 miles in 1,000 hours.

—— At last accounts the cholera was prevailing in many places in India. In the city of Poona, near Bombay, 800 died in a week, and in a village, four miles from Melur, 100 died in about 15 days.

—— Abdul Azi, the present Sultan of Turkey, has but one wife, whom he loves, and the common people of Constantinople believe that he set fire to the palace in order to get rid of his harem—but the extra crinoline is adhesive.

—— A medal, commemorative of the French expedition into Mexico, has lately been struck in Lyons.

—— A new theatre, for comedy and opera, is to be built in Paris, with the appropriate name of Rue Scribe.

—— The Mayor of Liverpool, Eng., had all the theatres in his city free to the public on the evening of the Shakespeare tercentenary.

—— The London Court Journal says the published reports furnished by the commanders of Admiral Kuper's squadron of the behavior of the Armstrong guns during the bombardment of Kagosima must satisfy every one that, whatever excellence these guns may possess in other respects, they are not suitable for naval conflicts.

—— The heir of the Czar of Russia is about to propose for the hand of the Princess Marie Dagmar, sister of the Princess of Wales, and daughter of the present King of Denmark.

—— The Duke of Sutherland, one of the heaviest "swells" in England, belongs to the London fire brigade, never misses a fire, and is passionately fond of "contending with the devouring element."

—— Mr. Caleb Hodgson, Mayor of Carlisle, Eng., being asked for some aid to the tercentenary celebration, refused, saying: "Shakespeare was a clever man, but he might have turned his talents to better advantage!"

Odds and Ends.—A boy of eight years and remarkably retentive memory is making a sensation at Albany. He remembers everything he reads or hears, and is certainly deserving of pity and sympathy.

—— John Clancey, the editor of the Leader, was arrested on a warrant issued by District-Attorney Hall, at the suit of George Jones, and held to bail by Justice Dowling in the sum of $1,000, to answer the charge of libel. The Leader, of the 7th inst., contained an editorial article referring to the late testimonial given by Jones at the Academy of Music, calling him a "self-styled Count," and ridiculing the performance.

—— A Kentucky rebel cavalry soldier says he was much surprised when a woman in North Georgia put to him the following interrogatory: "Did you 'uns cum all the way from old Kaintuck on critter back to fight for we 'uns?"

—— English critics say that Miss Braddon is vastly improving in the style of her writing, and that her new story, "The Doctor's Wife," running in Temple Bar, is much superior to "Lady Audley's Secret."

—— On a tombstone in a churchyard in Ulster, Ireland, is the following epitaph: "Erected to the memory of John Phillips, accidentally shot as a mark of affection by his brother."

—— A Poughkeepsie (N. Y.) business man, it is said, posted the following notice in his house recently:

"Headquarters, House of——.

"General Order, No. 1.—Julia: Until the price falls no more butter will be used in our family.

"James."

He had hardly reached his counting-house when a special messenger handed him this:

"James: Until butter is reinstated no more tobacco will be used in this house. Julia, Chief of Staff."

It is said that butter won.

—— A pretty rebel spy, Emma Jones, who was sent North some time ago, has been banished, by Governor Andrew, to Barnstable, Massachusetts, to stay during the summer. She is a native of Massachusetts, but confesses her attachment to Southern institutions, although declaring she never was a spy.

—— An Ohio paper tells of one Capt. Stanton Sholes, who had been bald 50 years, but who at the age of 92, after a severe headache, had a new crop of hair, of rapid growth, which is now thick, silken, white and long—so long that it is combed back from the forehead, and tied with a ribbon at the neck.

—— T. Buchanan Read, the poet, painter and sculptor, has been drafted in the 22d Ward, in Cincinnati, and in the same regiment were drafted F. B. Plymton and E. Henderson, editors of the Commercial.

—— At a fancy dress ball in Paris, France, recently, a lady was seen in a very low-necked dress, while floating and waving an abundance of green gauze. She was politely asked by a gentleman what she personated. "The sea, monsieur." "At low tide, then, madame." The lady blushed and the gentleman smiled.

—— The London critics do not seem to relish Mdlle. Lagrua. They say she does not improve upon acquaintance. "Her Lenora in 'La Favorita' has scarcely a point in it which may be stamped as excellent—not any that is exquisite. Her acting in the first act is overstrained and unnatural. She flings herself about the stage and bends and contorts her body in a very exaggerated way, and it will certainly not make up for want of pathos of voice and finish of vocalization."

—— A gentleman, in speaking of somebody's wife, regretted she had no children. "Ah," said a medical man present on the occasion, "to have no children is a great misfortune, but I have remarked that it is hereditary in some families!"

CHIT-CHAT WITH THE LADIES.

Matters are coming to a climax. Soon all that will be left for us poor wearers of crinoline will be to return to the long-forgotten custom of sedan chairs, and, shut up in one of these, surrounded by a body-guard, proceed in state to Stewart's, Ball & Black's, or elsewhere, to do our shopping.

Time was when a lady might ride in a public conveyance without further inconvenience than the probability of being crushed between two stout neighbors, or pushed off the car by a surly conductor, or embraced by a gallant one under the pretence of polite assistance. But now the dangers thicken daily; armed policemen in every car; rowdies, half-intoxicated, who seem desirous of provoking their wrath; several soldiers with loaded muskets and glittering bayonets; an incipient riot at every other street corner, during which brickbats and cobble stones enter the car windows; and, to crown all, a collision with a Harlem or Hudson river freight car; or the discovery that some miscreant has placed an obstruction on the rails, throwing the cars off the track, laming the horses and forcing the passengers to descend in the mud and complete the journey on foot.

A New Amusement.

We see, from an extract from the Palmetto Herald, that some ladies, Mrs. Gibbens, Mrs. Dennis, Mrs. Dudley and Mrs. Hanford by name, have been working the guns, before which certain rebel scouts and pickets retreated, in the neighborhood of May river.

As there appears to have been no necessity for their so doing, and there were plenty of men and soldiers in the neighborhood, we presume the performance was merely a matter of amusement, submitted to as a lady's wish to "drive just a little way," or to "row a little," or to see if she "couldn't catch a fish," is gratified by a polite gentleman. It seems an odd sort of recreation, considering that, after all, rebels are men, and not birds or wild fowl. To fire, for fun, at pickets, and practise hitting scouts, is a novel method of passing time for a lady. But, we presume, it will become quite fashionable after this, and Gen. Bangemoff will take his lady, Mrs. Gen. Bangemoff, down to camp, and let her manage a gun a little, just to please her; and she will keep a little list of the rebels who have been shot by her, as she might of her New Year's Day callers or her partners at a ball. And when you inquire about Col. A——'s sister, you will hear for answer, "Oh, she's gone on a little pleasure trip with her brother to shoot at the rebels!" and will be asked, "Can you manage a gun?" as people now inquire, "Do you skate?"

A Dangerous Voyage.

Going to Brooklyn is, it appears, attended with nearly as much danger as an Arctic voyage or the rounding of the Cape. To cross from our city to Hamilton avenue is to dare the fire of all gunboats or vessels, full of armed men, lying at Governor's island, and run the risk of losing life or limb by a friendly Union musket ball. On Tuesday persons who had undertaken the perilous expedition were warned of their folly by the rattle of musketry and the fall of one of their number, shot through the leg, and will probably be deterred from again attempting the expedition until the possibility of being picked off like so many robins is at an end. We understand that this time the volley came from the steamtug Stevens.

The Children.

The children in the public schools in the 22d Ward gave their exhibition, in aid of the soldiers, at the Academy of Music, on Tuesday evening. It was a pretty sight to see, and strange enough it was to hear those piping baby voices where the clear tones of so many prima donnas have fallen upon the ear. On the stage, at least, the little creatures looked like dolls; and there was a tableau from Louis Lang's picture of "Mary Queen of Scots distributing her Jewels," which looked curiously like Minnie Warren dispensing toys and trinkets to the fairies. The larger boys, of course, were touched with the war mania, and gave us a Battle and "After the Battle," in two tableaux, which brought down the house, and drove the youth amongst the audience distracted with admiration.

Out of Town.

"When are you going out of town?" We begin to ask this question of each other as soon as the opposite shores begin to show a fringe of tender green, and Weehawken (through an opera-glass) looks like a glimpse of Paradise. As soon as Union Square grows verdant, and in our dusty city gardens the purple pansey and yellow crocus begin to blossom—Where are you going this summer, dear readers? Half of you will answer with a list of fashionable summer resorts, of course, and only one or two will say, "Ah, we shall find some cosy, quiet farmhouse, and enjoy freedom for a little while." To these we say, good—you are wise. But for the others, what a fate awaits them! Not only the customary smothering in small, close bedrooms, and all the miseries of continually dressing for inspection during sultry summer weather; those inconveniences our belles and their mamas are used to; but, oh, horror! this year, whoso goeth down unto the sea shore or elsewhere will be perpetually and irretrievably afflicted with Shoddy. Shoddy père, Shoddy mère and Mesdemoiselles Shoddy, the daughters, to say nothing of the worst of the lot, the youthful masculine scions of the House of Shoddy.

At Newport you will find them walking on the beach in hats like warmingpans of the olden time, and trailing robes and glittering bracelets, and all sorts of fluttering odds and ends, as though each had been dipped in some adhesive substance, and passed rapidly through a show window. At Saratoga you will see them opposite you at breakfast, and Mr. Shoddy will jingle his massive chain and seals, and roar to black John the waiter:

"Here, you smoky rascal, fetch me them there eggs, will you, and be quick about it? Who d'yer think I am, I wonder?"

And Mrs. Shoddy, in blue cap ribbons and diamond ear-rings, will exclaim:

"This here coffee ain't fit for nothin'; if my cook was to send it up I'd give her warning."

And Miss Shoddy, gorgeous to behold, will make a dead set at your young brother just from college, who will declare her "a fine girl for all," in his youthful susceptibility; and young Shoddy will stare you out of countenance by way of expressing his admiration; and having formed the acquaintance of young Tiptop—never very bright—over sherry cobblers in the mysterious places whither gentlemen retire to "smoke a cigar," that verdant youth will introduce him, and drive you to the verge of desperation.

You need not say you will not mix with such people; that the élite can frown them down and banish them from their old accustomed haunts. Nonsense! vulgar ostentation cannot be frowned down. Its quality is too hard and brazen, and having plenty of money, do you fancy Shoddy has not the key to the best rooms in the best hotels, the best places everywhere? Landlords and waiters are money-making people, and Shoddy will pay anything just now for admission into the haunts of Uppertendom.

If you desire to escape Shoddy (and who would not?) you must make up your mind to farmhouses and rustic hotels, and abjure, for this season at least, Saratoga, Newport, Trenton Falls, Lake George, &c.; and making a merit of necessity, enjoy the "real country" for once in your life. You will not lose by it.

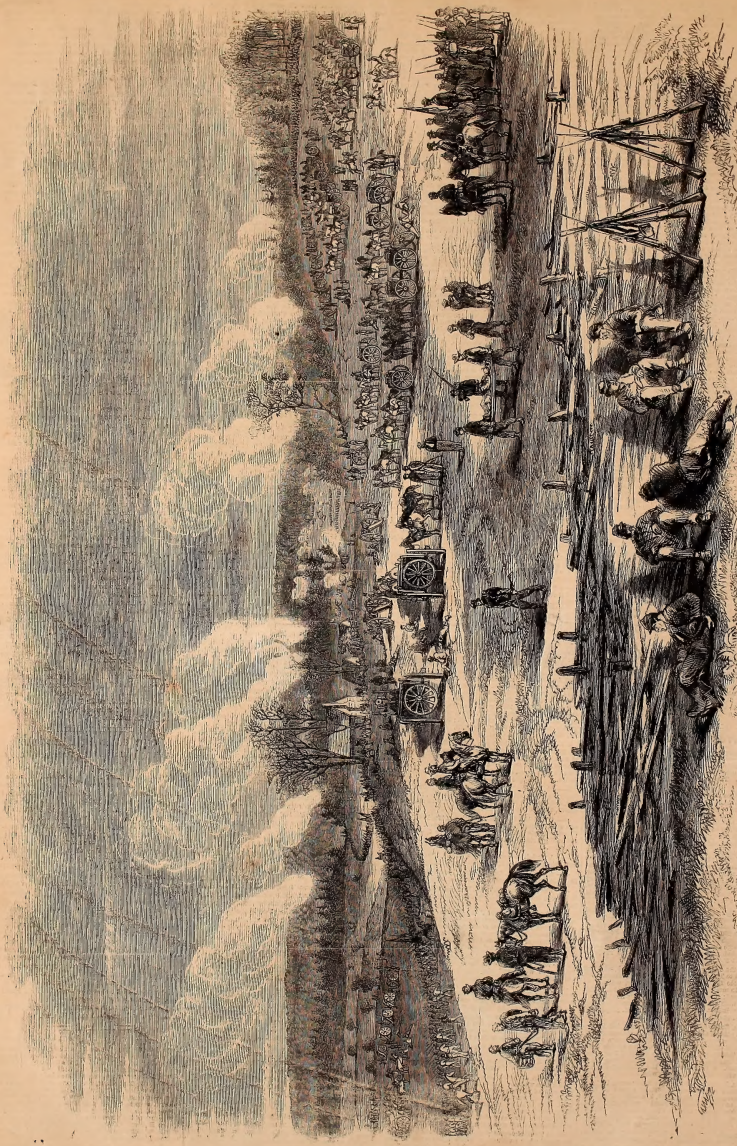
A Bee in the Bonnet.

They say, who know, that the insignia of the Ladies' Loyal League is to be a black bee worn in the bonnet or hair. Why, we wonder has it anything to do with the "little busy bee," spoken of by Dr. Watts? Does it signify industry or honeylike sweetness? Why is the emblem of the Loyal League economy to be a bee? Of one thing we are certain; namely, that the insect, which is to be made of India-rubber, comes off of its legs, or separates its wings from its back, or its head from its body, as easily as all the black pins and ornaments hitherto manufactured of the same material. The adoption of the emblem will not greatly aid economy, though it may home manufacture. We know of two or three ladies who intend joining the League shortly, who are purchasing silks, velvets, grenadines, &c., sufficient to last for several years, in order to have them on hand, as ladies of the League are not expected to throw away goods previously purchased. It is a "cute" idea, enabling the fair originators to be at once elegantly dressed and extremely patriotic; and, besides, they can enter heart and soul into a plan for checking the purchase of imported goods after their own wardrobe is amply supplied, for think of the joy which must be experienced by Miss Augusta when she knows that her dear friend, Seraphina, cannot purchase a facsimile of her pet dress, and that another cloak of Lyons velvet is not to be procured. The bee—let us see—you know bees lay in a store of honey for winter, and, as the Loyal League ladies accumulate garments for future need, this may be the meaning of the emblem.

OUR SUMMER RESORTS.

The Fairfield House, Fairfield, Conn.

Fairfield, with its fine sea air and its beautiful scenery, has long been celebrated, and is one of the few spots in America which poetry has embalmed in lengthened description, Greenfield Hill, sung by Dwight, being in its neighborhood. The village has a charming freshness, being all recently built, its destruction in 1779, by order of the English Governor Tryon, of New York, having swept away all relics of the past.



To this charming spot many of our citizens have already been in the habit of resorting during the sultry heats of summer, and they all attest the great advantages which it enjoys. We give among our illustrations to-day a view of the Fairfield House, a fine hotel, now under the direction of Mr. P. D. Carrique, a gentleman of great experience in catering to the public. The house is beautifully situated about a quarter of a mile from the beach, in the centre of one of the most agreeable villages in Connecticut, and will accommodate comfortably about 150 persons. That the house will be well kept, the table well supplied, and good wines and all attainable luxuries provided, we may, from the character of the proprietor, safely affirm. It is, too, within easy distance of New York, as it can be reached in two hours by the New Haven cars, and is but three quarters of an hour's ride from New Haven.

Amusements are not wanting; the sea gives its enjoyment of bathing and boating; while the drives in all directions, after passing through the wide street of the village, are of surpassing beauty.

Any undecided as to a locality for the warm weather should by all means give Fairfield a visit.

Singular Discovery.—A curious and interesting discovery of ancient church ornaments has been recently made at Douai, in France. According to the French papers, the students of the formerly celebrated college at that town secretly buried two coffers full of valuable church plate at the time of the great French Revolution. The secret, which was carefully kept for many years, has been divulged. A corps of engineers, who now occupy the buildings formerly used by the college, searched for the hidden treasures, and have succeeded in disinterring various silver vases bearing the names of the presidents of the college, and that of Philip Howard, of Norfolk, with the date 1744. The search is being prosecuted for other articles supposed to have been also buried.

"I love you," is all the secret most women have to tell. When that is said, they are like crackers on the 4th of July.

OUR SUMMER RESORTS—THE FAIRFIELD HOUSE, AT FAIRFIELD, CONNECTICUT.

THE CHRISTENING

BY AMANDA T. JONES.

THE moonlight silvered all the balmy air,
The wind sang in the woodbine by the door,
And the young mother, swaying in her chair,
Her tender lullaby crooned o'er and o'er:

"Sleep, my beautiful, sleep!
Evening shadows are deep;
Close in my arms I fold you,
Softly praying, with tears,
That the Father of souls may hold you
Through all life's dangerous years,
Lovingly fold and keep—
Sleep, my beautiful, sleep!

"Sleep, my beautiful, sleep!
None but a mother would weep
O'er a babe as yet unchristened,
O'er a bud as yet unblown;
Ere baptism rains have glistened,
Like pearl-showers over it thrown;
For the worm in the heart I weep—
Sleep, my beautiful, sleep!"

The moonlight darkened in the draperied night,
And through the woodbine wailed the wind's low cry;
While by a marble face, serene and white,
The mother sang her tremulous lullaby:

"Sleep, my beautiful, sleep!
The shadows of Death are deep.
Out of my arms they take you,
Gird you in linens clean,
And never disturb or awake you;
What can this slumber mean?
Terrors over me creep—
Sleep, my beautiful, sleep!

"Sleep, my beautiful, sleep!
Angels your christening keep,
And the worm can never harm you,
That lies in the budding heart.
But what to my arms can charm you,
When Death has drawn us apart?
They have opened the grave so steep—
Sleep, my beautiful, sleep!"

CHAPTER IV.

Cry, Trojans, cry! lend me ten thousand eyes,
And I will fill them with prophetic tears.
Let us pay betimes
A moiety of that mass of moan to come.
Our firebrand brother, Paris, burns us all.
Troilus and Cressida, Act II., Sc. 2.

BERTRAM HAPSWELL had a half-brother named Victor Kingsland, Lady Hapswell's son by her former husband. Victor was a handsome, daring fellow, restless, adventurous, mischievous and troublesome. He was always getting into or out of a difficulty, and at the time selected for his introduction to the reader was only in France because he had recently been engaged in an affair which hazarded his personal liberty in England. He was gifted, versatile, and could do almost anything—from the delivery of a sermon to robbery on the high seas—but keep quiet and out of trouble, or pursue a constant and consistent course in any undertaking. He had been almost everywhere; had attempted almost everything, but remained as cleverly foolish and as abortively capable as he had been when comparatively devoid of knowledge and experience.

The Wounded Lion.

Parisian Revolutionists.

He accompanied his brother on his second visit to the mad sculptor's studio, and quite won the artist's heart by his display of connoisseurship. He had seen almost every great work of art in the world, and flattered the old man with discriminating praise. While viewing the statue Elfstone called "Lost Love," Victor whispered to Bertram:

"'Tis the image of his deceased wife. I saw her often when a boy, and have ever since formed my ideas of an angel from her."

As the trio turned from the statue, the presence of Marina Nitouche was perceived. Accustomed as he was to her sudden and singular appearances, she now startled even Elfstone with the oddity of her costume. She was dressed in a short blue tunic or blouse, worn over a red petticoat, and confined at her waist with a black leather belt. She had a scarlet Phrygian or Liberty cap on her head, and carried a gilt staff, bearing a tricolor flag, in her hand.

"What does this mean?" demanded the sculptor.

"You will know to-morrow," she answered, significantly. "Do I not look dangerous now, Mr. Hapswell?"

"The sanguinary spirit of revolution could not be more beautifully personified. What do you represent?"

"A daughter of the people. Father I never knew, and mother I have none; who has more need or right to claim the relationship?"

At this moment her gaze fastened on Victor Kingsland.

"Ha! a son of the people! a brother!" she cried, almost throwing herself into his arms and half embracing him.

Bertram Hapswell's brow clouded as he gazed on the pair, and he said:

"I infer from this there's mischief brewing in Paris, and you, Vic., are, of course, in the thick o it."

"He's jealous—never mind him," said Marina, snarling her beautiful lip with disdain. "He has a terrible mistress, and his heart and hers beat together, like two millstones."

Elfstone was now gazing at Marina with a transcribe wildness. He needed to have forgotten, for the time, she was not what she represented. As his excitement increased, his tall form dilated, his eyes rolled and flashed with a strange fire, and his fingers twitched nervously. Suddenly, and with a motion quick as light, he snatched the cup of Marina's head, and the little flagstaff out of her hand. The profuse black hair which had clad the ugly fell in a sable torrent to her feet, her graceful arms dropped and hung listlessly, and her large black eyes were fastened upon the wonderful metamorphosis in mute amazement and awe. She had subsided in a moment into the mere luxuriant beauty, who had, from motives of vanity, been lending her voluptuous charms to grace a dangerous and subversive cause.

Elfstone held the cap in one hand and the flag in the other, at the full length of his long arms, gazing earnestly at them, and speaking with great rapidity and vehemence:

"Have they risen from the deep again, these emblems of liberty and blood? Imagina of rebellion and anarchy! regalia of the ideal sovereignty of the people! Ha, ha, ha! These baubles are more delusive than the crown and the sceptre—away with them!"

He threw the cap and banner across the room, and continued with enhanced energy:

"Vain was the struggle! vain the victory! France attempts to leap at once to heaven, only to fall as low as hell. She must have perfect liberty or none. She rushes forward to grasp the fruition of the infinite future, tumbles blindly into the chasm of anarchy, and stunned by the fall, is bound by her tyrants ere she recovers her senses. To-morrow another earthquake of liberty will begin to rage, to shake the thrones and convulse the nations of Europe. The people will roar like the stormy sea, exhaust their strength in tumult, and after awhile let their despots, old and new, plant, to their fancies, and rule the groaning millions with a rod of iron, sharp and heavy as ever."

Here the old man began to weep, and his tone, to soften and melt with emotion.

"After all," he said, "all the agonizing, battling, bleeding and dying for liberty, is such the miserable conclusion? Are tens of millions and hecatombs of lives squandered for a few days' saturnalia? Poor, beguiled, besotted humanity! Only strike encouraging thyself, only scale in suffering, only constant in complaining, and in worshipping fresh demagogues, thy worst and direst enemies! Thou wisely counsel that thou art! I should despise, did I not pity the—despair of thee, did I not hope for thee with all the strength of love. Yet, necessity for sacrificing is infinite, and thy liberty cannot be bought of thyself without more blood and agony than would ransom another universe."

The rage of sorrow sank back upon a seat, and gave way to an excess of morbid sentimentality. Marina threw herself down by his side, embraced him and kissed him tenderly. Suddenly she started up, exclaiming:

"Sit. Croix is coming! He must not find me thus. Weep not, father; France will be herself to-morrow. We shall meet in the streets of Paris again, brother. You will find me where the strife is fiercest. Au revoir! Adieu, Monsieur Timid. Take counsel of cold prudence, and hide in some cellar. Who would have so fair a face with a white heart? Bah!"

Marina caught up her red cap and flag and darted out of the room.

Julien St. Croix arrived soon after. He was much struck with Elfstone's appearance, and whispered to Bertram:

"The crisis has come. If he be carefully watched and tended now he may recover, but if not his reason is lost for ever. I devote myself to his cure."

Bertram promised his assistance, but his brother, under the plea of urgent business, left the apartment at once, followed out of the room by his relative.

"What are you about, Victor? Having just escaped one lion's mouth, are you about to thrust your head into another's? There was some excuse for your intermeddling with English politics, but there is none whatever for your entanglement in French conspiracies."

"I am your elder, Bertram, though not your father's heir, and object to your dictatorial tone. I can save you the trouble of interfering in my affairs by managing them myself."

Bertram Hapswell shrugged his shoulders.

"You might, I think, leave yourself one asylum in Europe. Your answer, Victor, is not what I deserve; but, I suppose, all I have any reason to expect."

He was returning to the studio, when Victor caught him by the hand, saying, in an altered and affectionate tone:

"I know I am an ungrateful dog, Bertram, and you are the best fellow in the world; but when I tell you there is no danger threatening me, and that I am in honor and coin bound to go, I trust you will be satisfied."

"Silenced, if not satisfied, Victor. All I ask of you is the exercise of caution and forbearance, for our mother's sake. She has sacrificed much for you, and owes a grateful and considerate return, which you can best make by keeping out of trouble."

As that the brothers parted, Bertram returning to Elfstone's studio, and Victor hastening after Marina.

CHAPTER V.

So sweet was she so fatal.—Othello, Act V., Sc. 2.

Who cares for nothing alone is free.—Wieter.

VICTOR HAPSELAND overtook Marina on the way to the railway station. She had altered her appearance so much that but for her glorious lightning eyes he would have failed to recognize her.

"Sister," he said, "may I not accompany you?"

"Have we not the same destination?" she replied; "and are you not a true Bohemian?"

"I have not seen you at the Court, and yet were our numbers complete."

"With an important exception."

"The Queen?"

"Yes."

"And you—"

I am the Queen of the true Bohemians."

"Accept my homage, beauteous sovereign."

"You are a new accession to our numbers, brother. A true Bohemian is a strange product for aristocratic England."

"My mother is French, and my father was as great a vagabond as Cain."

"And Mr. Bertram Hapsell—is he not your brother?"

"My mother's son, but not my father's. My father was Victor Hapsland, who died during my childhood, leaving a widow, who married Sir Edmund Hapswell, Bertram's father."

"Your brother is a Bohemian?"

"If you have any designs upon him forego them. You but waste your labor."

"Is he not a suicide of virtue?"

"Of indifference, rather. He worships only the ideal. He may adore this prima donna's voice, the poetic grace of that dancer, or some other woman's beauty; but he is pretty sure to despise her when she becomes real, and convert her into a statue."

"Yes; such a one as it would be to soften steel, and have a spoiled and stubborn material for your labors."

When Victor and Marina arrived in Paris they took a carriage, and instructed the coachman to drive to a certain house in the Latin Quarter, then the headquarters of the true Bohemians. As they were passing near the Morgue the driver stopped his horses at his own accord, and pointed to the "faces," asked them whether they would not like to see the corpse of the man who had thrown himself from the top of Notre Dame only the day previous. The expression on the driver's face was that of a man expecting a great treat, which he thought no mind not dead to curiosity could resist.

"Have you a taste for horrors?" inquired Victor of his companion.

"A most horrible one, I must confess," she replied, frankly.

"You have a famous opportunity to indulge it now, and I don't know but that it may be as well to harden one's heart against the probable casualties of to-morrow. Why could not the ride wait a day or two longer, and die in our glorious campaign for liberty?"

Victor and Marina entered the Morgue a few minutes after the widow of the deceased had registered his name, and the various, in spite of the brutal attempts made to silence her, lamenting wildly over the mutilated corpse, of which Marina no sooner caught a glimpse than she turned almost as pale as the dead, staggered, and would have fallen had not Victor caught her in his arms.

"Marina! be calmed, with some exertion, you will make a pretty soldier, if the sight of one dead man can thus overcome you."

Marina, after making a desperate effort to rally her spirits, replied faintly:

"You misjudge me altogether. I am no such baby. But I remember in the same room before me the corpse of a friend I parted with on Sunday last, after passing through a scene with him of the most painful nature. From the hour I first met him he continued to profess an absorbing love for me, and although I deprecated his manifestations, he met with the coolest gibe that could procure. Discovering accidentally that he was not only comparatively poor but had a wife and children dependent on him, I returned his presents, and insisted upon the discontinuance of his idle suit. Instead of being glad to rid of him, my determination excited him to frenzy. He trampled on his own gifts, and raged till I was compelled to leave him from the very assuming a violence greater than his own. He left me vowing self-destruction. I regarded his threat merely as the ebullition of disappointed vanity, and was glad to be rid of him in any way. Little did I dream of so awful a fulfilment of his words."

"I do not see that you are at all to blame in the matter."

"Would I could think with you. But as it was, I, who idly entangled his affections in the first place, am, I fear, accountable for the consequences."

"Do you enjoy this sort of thing?"

"God forbid! I wish I could banish it from my memory for ever, but I fear I never shall."

"Your remorse is vain, for it is too late. It is idle to indulge it now. What is one man's life to the many that may be lost to-morrow? Let us go."

As they were quitting the dead-house they crossed the bereaved woman.

"Are you left poor, madame?" asked Marina, with a half-choked utterance.

"Without means to bury the dead."

How comes that?"

"My husband spent all he had upon a wicked, artful, heartless woman, who no sooner found that he had no more than she drove him from her, and he committed suicide in despair."

"Do you know this woman?"

"No; and hope I never shall. If I saw her I feel that I should kill her. She shows no pity, deserves none, and ought to die. They say she has caused the death of some of the best men in France, and that she has deceived many more. Young Monsieur Déravure drowned himself in the Seine for her sake; Eugene Bâche was driven mad by her cruelty, and is now in the maison de santé; old Pierre Ragot poisoned himself because she discarded him, and yet left all his property to her; miles Cahron hung—"

"Enough, good woman! Spare your enumeration, for I am satisfied you are speaking of no human creature, but a demon. You must not believe such monstrous stories. The devil is not so black as he is painted, and the unfortunate you accuse so bitterly may be no worse than I am. Here is a purse for you. It contains enough to pay your funeral expenses and something over. Good-day. You are welcome to it all, only don't thank me."

Marina rushed out of the Morgue to avoid the woman's blessings, which, fervently have hurt her like stabs, leaped into the carriage, followed by Victor, and was driven off rapidly to her destination.

"For all your fine talk, sister Victor, as soon as he was seated, "I little dreamed you were such a beauteous monster."

"Nor I. Nor did I had my share in the death of this woman's husband, I admit; but young Déravure was drowned simply because he could not swim, and would have seen me tortured to death ere he would have committed suicide on my account; old Ragot dabbled in chemistry and poisoned himself accidentally, and moreover never left me a sou; Bâche was always insane, and never would have been cured by the medhouse; and the other party she mentions I never saw or even heard of before. I shall soon be held responsible for every suicide committed in Paris, and they are not a few."

"You have a dreadful character, Marina; but I interrupted you when you said you that it would not become me to take you to bed."

"I have different characters with different clothes on, and you must be aware of none that estimate me truly—if indeed I can do as much myself. I sometimes wonder whether I am worse or better than others, but am, of course, apt to decide in my own favor."

"I suppose you have many such adventures as that we have just encountered."

"Too many, but few of so painful a character. I must see this widow again, and do what I can for her."

"Are you not afraid she will find you out and kill you?"

"Not I. I am afraid of no man or woman, and I can easily control a spirit like hers. No, we shall be the best of friends in time."

Upon the arrival of Marina and Victor among the Bohemians, they were hailed with a shout of delight from all, and immediately surrounded, and gazed round upon her subjects with pride. They were not gipsies or natives of geographical Bohemia, but the representatives of every nature and clime, who had either acquired or assumed the appellation of Bohemians from their love of an easy, vagrant, and irresponsible life. Some of them were rich, some poor, but they were, almost without exception, intelligent, intellectual, and subversive of all kinds of art and nature. They were in the habit of making themselves at home in all places and with all kinds of people, and of setting conventionality to every condition with the pleasure of air and water. In Paris they associated for the purposes of mutual enjoyment and self-concealment, and were formed into order and action, but without any binding organization; and as every true Bohemian is witty, most of them possessed of talent, and not a few of them were gifted with a spark of true Promethean fire, the society was one of the most brilliant and agreeable that ever enjoyed either a durable or a transitory existence.

Queen Marina and Victor threw themselves at once into the war of wit and sparkling exchange of thought, and the vivacity and merriment of their assembly was one of the highest pitch. Signor Scoda, Prime Minister to Marina, was in his glory. His remarkable visage, so ugly in repose, grew into handsomeness as he indulged in the wildest and brightest sallies that ever sprang from the human fancy. His example proved contagious, and the Bohemian repartee was sustained, as replete with bonmots as the best even with stars on a clear and moonless midnight. Little Count Rodolphel looke-on have divined that beneath this buoyant and glittering surface lurked imminent danger and fierce menace to the queen. Many present, indeed, were members of a terrible conspiracy against the Government, and the appearance at the door of the last of ten Commissaries turned a score of faces pale and quenched the gaiety of the evening as suddenly as if a pall to himself had stalked into the midst of the company.

One of the officers guarded the door, while the other advanced with papers and deeds, and invited them to a consultation with the Prefect of Police. The prisoners seemed to take their arrest in good part, and Marina smiled on Victor with dreadful meaning, as she left the scene of recent hilarity under the escort of her stern captors.

"Their eyes are not worth a sou," muttered Pierre Masure to Jacques Renvi, as both rose to follow the municipal guards.

"Whose?" inquired Renvi. "Not our Queen's and Scoda's?"

"Sacrebleu! no—the bloodhounds!" said Masure, as he and his fellow started out of the room.

BERTRAM HAPSWELL watched all night with Julien St. Croix at the bedside of the old sculptor, who had grown so much worse that his death seemed imminent. He improved towards the morning, but seemed to be excessively weak. On the ensuing day startling news came from Paris. The projected reform banquet, which the Government had forbidden, was relinquished, but the disappointed populace had begun to play at revolution, and needed but some fatal signal to commence the business in earnest. The people were erecting barricades for amusement, and to get their hands in, but the troops were allowed to remain inactive. The rattle of musketry was, however, heard from time to time, and even the roar of cannon. St. Antoine and the Marais, towards midnight, began to bite as well as bark, and at the Barriers several of the bureaux of the Octroi were illuminated by the incendiary's torch. On the morrow, Wednesday, the sun rose in the sky, and the heavens seemed to be taking part with the Government; but between nine and ten o'clock the clouds were rolled out of sight beyond the horizon, and the sun flooded Paris with gold, as if smiling on the misfortunes of its citizens.

Elfstone was so much better during the day that Bertram, impelled by the anxiety of his brother-in-law, the metropolis late in the afternoon, and found the public comparatively quiet and pacific. He supposed the emeute had blown over, and was now only anxious to ascertain how far Victor had committed himself against the government. He had not shown himself in his apartments since Bertram and he left them on Monday, and his brother could ascertain nothing of his whereabouts from any other quarter. Bertram's anxiety and nervousness grew almost quite unbearable, and he wandered about Paris with a vague and ardent hope of fortunately encountering the object of his search. He saw no people running in every direction in a state of the wildest excitement, crying:

"The troops are assassinating the citizens! to arms! to arms!"

He heard a turning out of Rue Lepelletier into the Boulevard des Capucines when he had left a dismal procession approaching him, consisting of a hearse of three horses, followers, dragging a cart, and singing Mourir pour la Patrie! In fact were ravaged, so that the full glare of the torches fell upon them, and Bertram beheld the mutilated corpses, victims of the rash and dastardly provocative which had just been perpetrated opposite Frascati's hotel. Bertram thought he recognized in one of them the body of his brother Victor, and he rushed with him with the frenzy to which, in spite of his habitual calmness, he was occasionally subject. He clove his way through the dense crowd to the hearse and cart, threw himself upon one of the corpses, embraced and kissed it wildly, and then standing erect in the vehicle, with a voice of terrible grief and passion, in his mother's native tongue, cried out:

"Is ont tué mon frère! Vengeance, vengeance!"

The effect was never surpassed by the most magnificent oratory ever uttered. It went to every heart in the crowd, and with the thrill which nature's sinlessest tone alone can produce, raised their most dangerous passions to sudden, full and flaming fire. The cry of "Vengeance!" was taken up on every side, and roared from a thousand throats. Nothing else was thought of now, all ideas of reconciliation with the government had suddenly become "too late;" vengeance alone was taken, and a hated and murderous rule be broken and abolished for ever. That night the streets of Paris were plunged in darkness, and the sun rose upon a city of barricades.

Bertram Hapswell witnessed the fatal mistake he had made (the resemblance of the corpse to his brother was surprising, and deceived him for several minutes) with a blank and dumb-like prostration, ashamed of the mischief he had done. It was too late to attempt to mend it, and he felt that on he had, without intending it, done more in one moment for the revolutionary cause than his radical brother would probably be able to effect in his lifetime. The recollection was a painful one to him, for the consequences of a French revolution were to his mind so terrible and incalculable calamity. He relinquished his ill-conceived zeal for his brother, got back, after encountering many difficulties and dangers, to his own house, and remained there all night, unable to sleep or find any source of comfort or composure to his distracted mind.

The long night and dreadful morning came at last. Bertram's temperament was such that it was impossible for him to remain within doors, and he brought the news of the conflict, in the streets of hope of meeting his brother there, and of dragging him away from the death-perils that were flying so thick about the Palais Royal and the Chateau d'Eau. He found Paris in the wildest commotion, its excitable populace borne along by the torrent of revolution, and the hunting down and butchering of government with the vindictiveness of long-harbored hate and revenge. Among the fiercest of the armed rabble was Pierre Masure, the left regiment of the line he saw Marina, her diluted black eyes flashing madness from under her red cap, her long, bold figure, bosom and shoulders almost their boldest to renewed exertion and redoubled audacity.

Bertram remained a few minutes a fascinated spectator of the scene. Suddenly a troop of cuirassiers appeared charging upon the people, who gave way and fled in every direction. Bertram was surrounded for a moment by the retreating throng, and was so suddenly left almost alone, facing the military. The cuirassiers, whose complepiment it afterwards was to escort the King to Neuilly, galloped on, heedless of the people, and were speedily out of sight. No sooner had they dashed by than Bertram beheld Marina lying in the street where they had just passed, and ran to her assistance. She was in the act of raising herself from the pavement when a Municipal Guard, who upon the flight of the populace suddenly became visible, rushed forward, and would have bayoneted her to the heart, had not Bertram sprung upon him, wrested his musket from his grasp, and felled him to the earth with the butt end of his weapon. The close, cracking report of musketry, the white of bullets past Bertram's head, the rally, return and fierce charge of the mob quickly followed and Bertram and Marina were carried along with the torrent. The handsome Amazon and her preserver were placed in front of the fight, both weaponless, for he had dropped his musket, and were precipitated upon a platoon of weather-beaten soldiers of the line. They could only grapple with them for the possession of their firearms, which were resigned by the veterans with little affectation of resistance, and the people, who were but half-armed, delighted with their complaisance, at once supplied themselves with weapons by disarming their sham enemies. Elated with this achievement and eager for more decisive business, the mob hurried away in the direction of the Tuileries, in the sacking of which the coarsest carnivora soon revelled with like madness at a carnival.

Marina, who was as mad as the worst, was borne away by the distracted multitude, but Bertram extricated himself from such ungenial company, threw down his musket and returned to his rooms. Here he waited till midnight in a state of agitation. Wearied at last with long watching and mental perturbation, he had just thrown himself upon a couch and composed himself to slumber, when he was aroused by a knocking at his door.

"Who are you?" he demanded.

"Marina," answered a low, sweet voice, outside.

Bertram started, a shudder swept through his frame, and he turned the key and opened the door with a trembling hand, and a heart chilled with prophetic horror.

There stood Marina, pale and wearied, her large eyes dim and red, but not alone. With his arm thrown round her shoulder, and held up by her clasp, stood, or rather drooped, Victor Kingland, ghastly and bloody.

Bertram sprang towards him, caught him tenderly in his arms, bore him to his bed, laid him gently down, and proceeded at once to examine his wounds.

"Where is he hurt?"

"In the left side, dangerously. He has also a flesh wound in the right arm, and his temple, you see, has been grazed by a ball."

"Dreadful for one day's work. I see his wounds have been already cared for; what says the surgeon?"

"He has had no surgeon but myself. I found him lying on a barricade, carried him to my lodging, dressed his wounds, and have been specially careful for him in my own room, but he insisted upon being brought hither, and hither have I brought him."

"You are a noble girl, Marina, after all, and I thank you with all my heart."

Tears started to the eyes of the fair Scrpent, but her heart was too full for speech. She kissed Bertram's hand and walked to the further extremity of the room, stood by the open window, and seemed to be gazing into the dark street; but she was only looking into her own agitated soul, the tumult of which prevented her from seeing anything distinctly even there.

Bertram carefully divested his brother of his bloody garments, disposed him as comfortably as possible in the bed, and sat down by his side. Victor pressed his hand, and murmured, feebly:

"Thanks, brother, thanks. If I live I shall be better worthy of it. If die tell mother I loved her and you to the last, and had her name and yours last on my lips."

Victor remained tranquil, his hand clasped in his brother's, and after awhile sank into the sleep his exhausted nature needed so much. Bertram stole quietly to Marina, who was now sitting in a languid attitude, her eyes downcast, and her hand lost in thought.

"Are you sad, or wounded, Marina?"

"I?" said Marina, starting from her reverie. "No, I am not hurt. I did not know enough to run when the troopers shewed themselves, knowing that the people would stand their charge, and fell at the instant they were upon us. I was as much taunting to get out of their way. My ear was struck from my head by a horse's hoof, and the only one I had. I was not brought to death, as I should, however, have been butchered ruthlessly enough but for your bravaud unexpected rescue, which even now appears supernatural to me. At the moment the glittering bayonet was almost at my heart, thinking for my life, that you, of all men, would so suddenly stand between me and death, seems to me a miracle almost as great as the raising of the dead. What magnanimous paymonts was that for the words I had scorned a thing as to Monday! Even my thanks, my gratitude, burning in my heart of hearts, seems worse than idle, for what can I do in return for you?"

"You have done enough already in your service to my brother."

He is a brother Bohemian, and I did no more for him than I was bound to do for any of the fraternity."

"You think too much of an act any man worthy of the name would have performed for one of your sex. If, however, you persist in considering yourself so much in debt to me, after upon it I shall exact payment in full."

"Ask what you will, even to my life, it shall be paid."

"There are some things more hard to give than life."

"Whatever they be I will give them—whatever you bid me do I will do it—so live my hopes of heaven."

"I shall put you to the proof some day, but now will only entreat you to wrap this cloak about you, and seek sleep on this lounge awhile, for you look pale and exhausted."

"May I not shave your watch?"

"Not now, for I presume you have had little sleep of late."

"Hardly any since Monday."

"Sleep, then, and when my wakefulness begins to fall I will arouse you, and you shall watch in my stead."

Marina was compelled to assent to this arrangement, and slept till long past midnight, when she awoke from dreaming that the soldier had his bayonet again at her heart. She sprang to her feet with a cry, roused Bertram from Victor, whose place she now insisted upon supplying. He had held out as long as he was able, and now, in his turn, resigned himself to the overpowering oblivion of slumber. The Serpent looked from one to the other of the unconscious brothers, with feelings strange as her predicament.

"I have known these brothers but a few days," said she to herself, "yet within that brief space they have become—one of them at least—more than all the world besides to me. This Victor is wild and heedless as myself, and I love him as though he were indeed my brother; but Bertram—there is music in his name, his voice, his looks, and I think that his soul, if it were visible, would outshine the sun. I love him with all the passion of my heart, but he will never love me; for he is not like other men, whose love is rawness, and he knows that my soul is dark and foul with crime. How came it so? I always loved the child's beauty more than the boy's. This I can say I have, and that have lost; but not for ever—no, not for ever. God surely can purify it and make it even as Bertram's is pure."

At this moment the slightest of audible sounds was heard, but low as it was it turned Marina very pale. She rose in an instant and crossed the door, facing two tall, gigantic men, whose countenances were expressive of the most sinister and dangerous purposes.

"Are they asleep?" whispered one.

"If soundest rest," she replied, in a tone of strong repulsion. "I guess your purpose, but the deed cannot be done. These men fought rester for their brother, and I am here to watch over the foremost of her sons; one lies here helpless, and perhaps dying from wounds received in her cause, and you shall not, through me, be guilty of the sleep brought on by the fatigue of their heroic struggles."

"What's this? have you gone mad with the rest of the fools?"

"Fools! 'tis promoting you to fall you such you are more heroic than fools."

"Stand aside, then, and let us do our brutal work."

"Stand back! or I'll wake Bertram Hapswell, whose pistols will send you into a sleep from which you shall only awake in eternity!"

"What's that? awake my ay for this."

"I will pay for it, and will pay you, and if you don't get the instant hence I will wake him now!"

"Marina, it is of no use. These Englishmen have twenty thousand francs in their trunks, and we could have the money."

"I tell you once for all, Jacques and Pierre, that Bertram Hapswell saved my life more than once between the barricades, and that I will not have the troopers, and if you advance one step, my body or yours shall lie dead across the threshold."

"Oh, he's dead, then, and you've found the gendarme for you. There's some sense in that, and I like you the better for it. I would do the same by myself. Life for life is fair play. Where and when will you meet me to-morrow?"

"At the Bois de Ville, at sunrise."

The ruffians disappeared, grumbling:

"Life for life is fair play, either way you put it."

FEARFUL PERFORMANCE BY A FEMALE.

THE most curious exhibition at the great Exhibition is the performance of a female in a state of dislocation." The journalists try to imitate it by twisting the French language into all sorts of complicated fancy shapes in describing it.

"Imagine," says one of them, "a slender female, a brunette, with flashing eyes, hollow cheeks, black tresses streaked with bluish tints, of that exotic sallowness which is found everywhere, for example, in the tent or in the pagoda. She comes standing or floating in a loose robe with red stripes. She throws herself backwards, and her head touches the floor of the circus, and lo! she begins her chimerical exercises. Her arms are twisted, her shoulders dislocated, she passes her legs, like a shoulder-belt, over her neck—she undoes, like hooks, the collar bone of her shoulders, and her head appears to be fixed upon her back reversed. The strangest of all is the beggar-look inspired—almost supernatural, with which she accompanies her fearful pantomime. It is not a mountebank at work; it is the convulsive devotee of some extravagant religion celebrating the rites of some mad worship. Above all seeing his worshippers suffer. Her eyes supplicate, her arms implore. Her face, now in front, now behind the left and in the centre was seen enveloped by their long black hair. The audience held their breath until the 9th drove the Prussians back, but both were at last overpowered by the 10th and 11th corps, killed.

The works on the right were defended as long as they could be by the Danish cavalry, who were then driven under cover of the Rolfkenke, falling back into Alsen by Sonderburg. The annexed is the foreground of the picture are the Danish troops marching into Sonderburg. Above them is the Danish battery which commands over the water. The castle and church are on the left, and the battery on the right. On the face of the hill the Prussians and Dunes are seen engaged.

MAY MOONLIGHT.

BY HENRY C. WATSON.

HASTE, sister, haste!
The moon is shining bright,
And by its mystic light
We'll take our pleasant way;
The night is warm and calm,
The air is breathing balm,
Fresh perfumes of the May.

Haste, sister, haste!
Companions young and fair,
With Maybuds in their hair,
Are dancing on the green;
Let's join the happy group,
The merry, laughing troop,
And swell the festive scene.

Dance, dance, dance!
Let's trod a merry round,
On green ensamelled ground,
To music's gleesome tune;
We'll have no more such nights,
Such moonlight deep delights,
Till the leafy month of June.

Hark, sister, hark!
Along the quiet dell,
The solemn, tolling bell
Proclaims 'tis deep midnight;
To rest let's hasten all
Good-night to every one,
Good-night! good-night! good-night!

GRANT'S BATTLES IN VIRGINIA.

WE continue in our present issue our series of views of the long continued battles beyond the Rapidan, which, in their sanguinary character, are almost unprecedented. The engagements are severe and long, and, to all appearance, unavailing effusion of human blood. For months past the mighty armies have buried at each other almost without intermission the deadliest missiles which modern ingenuity and science supply, and the end and importance is guess-work—neither army defeated.

Our sketches show a fine view of the battle of the Wilderness on Friday, May 6th, sketched from the headquarters of Gen. Grant. On the left the action may be seen Gen. Grant and his staff, the signal corps near at hand, preparing to send a message to the rear. To the right in Parker's store, around which some of the fiercest fighting took place. To the left are ruined farm buildings of the Widowers farm, torn by shot and shell during the previous days. Another view (page 164), shows the battle on the 8th as viewed by another correspondent from General's headquarters, and that on page 172 is a sketch on the line of the 2d corps on the 10th, when the Confederates had at that time begun swelling the enemy's attack.

Our engravings show the striking incident on our first page of negro cavalry carrying two rebel Generals to the rear, are made on the ground from the most faithful data and provisions. One of our artists lost everything on the rapid advance of the army in which he was attached, including a portfolio full of sketches—the second serious loss of the kind he has met with during the past twelve months. Still, enough reach us to give our readers at all times prompt authentic sketches of the war.

THE WAR IN DENMARK.

Battle around Duppel, April 18, 1864.

THE war waged on the petty kingdom of Denmark by Prussia and Austria has excited the utmost sympathy for the brave Danes, who, under the lead of gallant King, has steadily battled against the investing host with its petty army, contesting almost madly each line of defence.

The Dannewerk was lost, and the allies then laid siege to Duppel, at Fridrich. Strong as the place was, it could not hold out against overwhelming numbers. Duppel was carried after a desperate struggle on the 18th of April, after a fierce conflict. The Danes evacuated the position and removed to the island of Alsen. The Danish report shows that their army lost 420 officers, 10,000 men killed, wounded and missing. The enemy's loss amounted to two Generals, 69 officers and 600 privates killed and wounded. The German troops were ordered to occupy the whole province of Jutland and to lay siege to Fredericia and Kolding.

A conference called previously may save the Danish Monarchy, and the heroic Frederick King, to an address to his people, assures them that their sacrifices have not been in vain.

The view of the decisive action which we give was from the heights on the left of Alsen, just behind the flush battery, looking over the narrow belt of water to Sonderburg and the charter of the Prussian siege batteries. The Prussians made their grand assault after a heavy cannonade from the siege guns. The works to the left and in the centre were soon enveloped by their columns. The Danish battery flank was left exposed, and the 9th drove the Prussians back, but both were at last overpowered by the 10th and 11th corps, killed.

The works on the right were defended as long as they could be by the Danish cavalry, who were then driven under cover of the Rolfkenke, falling back into Alsen by Sonderburg. The annexed is the foreground of the picture are the Danish troops marching into Sonderburg. Above them is the Danish battery which commands over the water. The castle and church are on the left, and the battery on the right. On the face of the hill the Prussians and Dunes are seen engaged.

AN HOUR WITH A SNAKE CHARMER

"SEEING is believing," so says the proverb, and if any one is anxious to have doubts removed on any subject, no process will be found so effectual as that of actual ocular demonstration, more especially when that evidence is sceptically examined before its reception. Such was my intention when I set out for the first time in my life, I was lately introduced to an Indian snake charmer.

During a professional ride through the station in which I am quartered I felt somewhat fatigued with the heat of the day, and therefore determined upon my return to call on a friend for a short shelter, despite the full conviction that I should find him indulging in that mid-day siesta, a custom common to the Europeans living in the climate, and yet so fearfully productive of liver complaints, pleurisy and other diseases.

I was not mistaken. "Never mind me! come in, old boy, you must be dead-beat," which I answered in person by entering his bedroom, darkened and cooled by artificial means. Making my way to his bedside, I was surprised at seeing two very bright objects glistening in the corner of the room. Inclined towards them, but more quickly retired on being assailed by a loud and unmistakable hiss. Involuntarily a scream in dust was performed by my friend and myself, and the native servants were somewhat startled by alarm at—

"A snake! a snake! Get a gun!"

A consultation was held, of course outside the room, and, I need not say, some distance from the door. Various results were arrived at. Some suggested shooting, others smoking, one, apparently more courageous than the rest, proposed that the snake should be caught and then destroyed.

However, as the originator of this bright idea did not seem in haste to carry his suggestion into practice, and as none of us wished to deprive him of the honor, it was agreed to send to the native bazaar for an Indian snake-charmer. In the meantime we kept a respectful look could do no harm. Carefully and slowly was that door opened. Nervously and tremblingly we peered in, gradually advanced, looking everywhere, jumped at the least rustle or sound, and were soon the laughing-stock of her Majesty's British soldiers. But soldiers don't like snakes. Why should they?

"Why, he's gone!"

"Take care!"

"Look in the bed, cupboard, drawers, nooks and corners!"

No snake! Then for the first time we laughed.

"Halloa! What's this piece of stick near the wall?"

"By Jove, it's his tail!"

"Fire!"

"Don't speak, we shall lose him!"

"Here's the charmer!"

He came, a tall muscular native, a slip of cloth round his waist, his hair long and matted, hanging on the centre of his head, which was shaved close in a circle, and a turban covering all beneath. He carried a couple of baskets and his musical instrument, made out of a gourd with a single bamboo pipe coming from the upper end, and two smaller from the lower, which, being pierced with holes, gave the sounds of a flute, while the gourd, blown through the upper pipe, played on the drone.

Before he entered the room he was searched, and his baskets and instrument taken from him. Nothing could have been concealed, for his clothing was so scanty as to be minimum, and he only carried a short iron rod.

He went down the hole in which we supposed the snake to be, for now the reptile's tail had disappeared. He sat quietly on the floor, and, placing his face close to the hole, exclaimed: "Burra sap: sahul bahur hawa."

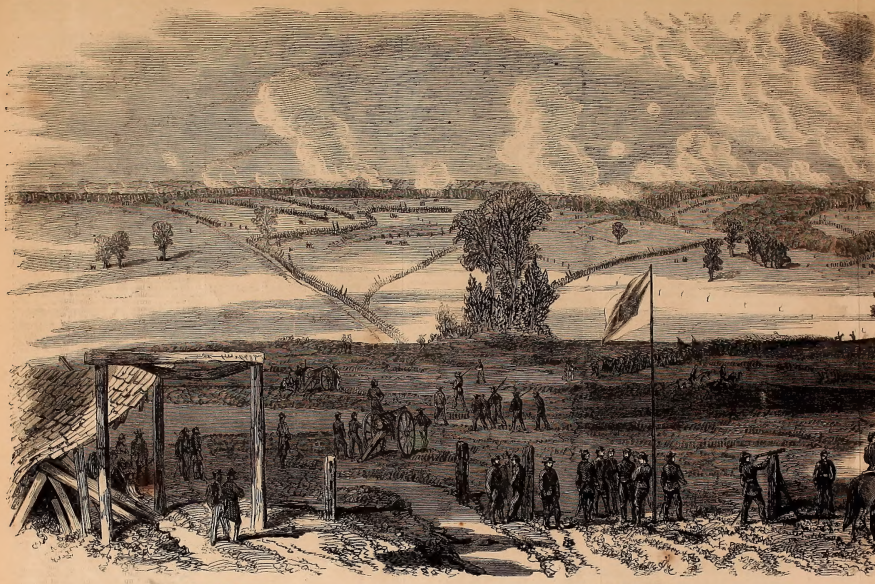
Then he played a few very low tunes, and my worst preparations he commenced digging round the hole, and presently put in his hand, and, in a few seconds, he showed us the tail of the reptile, and with gentle force he drew out the whole of the cobra, about three feet of his body, seized hold of the tail, and gradually drew him out of the hole. It appeared to be specially fond of cobras—a black, shining, wriggling, hissing deadly cobra, about three feet long. The thickest part of the body he then raised, with a head measuring, when extended, five inches round. The reptile he handled with perfect ease, it was hissing and darting its tongue out every second. Taking a bit like a skewer, he compressed the head. The brute wriggled towards him, and when within a foot of his face he put up, apparently to kiss the snake's hood, and prepared itself to strike at its captor. But the snake was fated to be wounded. He seized his primitive musical instrument, and commenced very slowly to perform a tune, which was very pleasing—but unconnected. The snake seemed astonished; his head gradually lowered, his hood and about a foot of his body that was raised from the ground commenced to sway about in time to the music. Gradually the music, slower and quicker as the time was decreased or increased, the native man played himself into a state of excitement, and his rapid and unusual movements had their effect upon the snake also.

Again the charmer seized it, and quick as lightning put his hand to its head, holding it firmly by the throat. By pressing on its neck, the cobra's mouth opened, and the fangs appeared. Then he put up and apparatus complete; thus proving beyond a doubt it was not a trained or tamed reptile he had been playing like a plaything.

Another visit arose in my mind, however, about the genuineness of the performance, for I could not bring myself to believe that a man would willingly place himself in such close proximity to cobra's fangs.

A few days after I visited the native, and got from the reptile, which was again not to be found, the information I required—that a man would willingly place himself in such close proximity to cobra's fangs.

A few days after I visited the native, and got from the reptile, which was again not to be found, the information I required—that a man would willingly place himself in such close proximity to cobra's fangs.



The fact of deception could have been practised in this instance, I was most anxious to see the reptile killed; but the native declined to kill a man who lived on him. But if it were injured the power he had over snakes would be destroyed, and he would not be able to find no snakes to kill him. He accounted for his easy capture by saying that the snake was tired, and that he had found they had been emptying themselves. "This one," said he, "has been out all night, and is now tired and cannot run, hence visiting, and has lost his way. On this account I can put my hand into his hole, and I am enabled to pull him out. Nasty neighbors and abominable visitors, they are always in the way, and should be put to death and make him tame."

The native, satisfied upon seeing him made harmless, or comparatively so, and directed the man to remove the reptile's fangs, which he did, and performed it in this manner—a piece of wood was cut an inch and a half long, and placed in the charmer's hand of the snake. The reptile seized it as he had done the fowl, and with the same level of a man who had undergone privative performance of dentistry was accomplished. The snake was then taken away, and was released to say by roots and given to me. I have them now, and look upon them as curiosities, and sometimes as a source of hysteric acid or a cask of white arsenic.

Before the snake was brought and attacked by the snake as before, but without any effect; it shook itself, and then, as if ashamed of its cowardice, disappeared. It is alive still, unless some enterprising culinary agent has converted it into a curry or devil.

So it was proved beyond any doubt that an Indian snake-charmer is not the fool of the first order, as many suppose, but a strong-minded, quicke-eyed, active, and courageous man. The cold deliberation and keenness of the charmer in the present instance was rewarded by a present of a few rupees, for he was not satisfied even with an extra smile in his basket, thankful to the preserver of his life, as he styled me, and he also, and he asked, he said, he owed his life and his existence.

BANQUET TO THE 79TH HIGHLANDERS.—THE New York Caledonian Club gave a banquet at the City Assembly Rooms, May 20th, to the 79th Highlanders, Lieut.-Col. Stuart of the Caledonian Club, presided, with Col. Lord Lindsay and Lieut.-Col. Cameron, late 5th Reg.-Gren. Evans, Col. Morrison was unable to be present, owing to severe indisposition. The toasts received in the battle of Spottsylvania Court House. Mrs. Lieut.-Col. Mason Cameron, was not down in the programme, and was expected to reply to the toast to the 79th Regiment of the United States Volunteers Court House. In the absence of Col. Morrison, Lieut.-Col. Mason made a short speech, in which he stated the interesting facts that the 79th was the first regiment to plant the Union flag on the soil of South Carolina, and that in all the battles the regiment has never took flag. All the speeches were characterized by the warmest patriotism; and the hearty welcome extended to the 79th showed that New York public at last inclined to be ungrateful to its brave sons who have gone forth to do battle for its existence.

WISHING.

Or all amusements for the mind,
From logic down to fishing,
There isn't one that you can find
So very cheap as "wishing!"
A very choice diversion, too,
If we but rightly use it,
And not, as we are apt to do,
Pervert it and abuse it.

I wish—a common wish, indeed—
My purse was something fatter,
That I might cheer the child of need,
And not my pride to flatter;
That I might make oppression reel,
As only gold can make it,
And break the tyrant's rod of steel,
As only gold can break it!

I wish—that Sympathy and Love,
And every human passion
That has its origin above,
Would come and keep in fashion;
That Scorn, and Jealousy, and Hate,
And every base emotion,
Were buried fifty fathoms deep
Beneath the waves of Ocean!

I wish—that friends were always true,
And motives always pure;
I wish the good were not so few,
I wish the bad were fewer;
I wish that persons ne'er forgot
To lend their pious teaching;
I wish that practising was not
So different from preaching!

I wish—that modest worth might be
Appreciate with truth and candor;
I wish that innocence were free
From treachery and slander;
I wish that each their vows would mind,
That women ne'er were rovers;
I wish that wives were always kind,
And husbands always lovers!

I wish—in fine—that joy and mirth,
And every good ideal,
May come, erewhile, throughout the earth
To be the glorious real;
Till God shall every creature bless
With His supremest blessing,
And hope be lost in happiness,
And wishing be possessing!

The Gulf Between Them.

BY MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

CHAPTER XXXII.

When Elizabeth Mellen quitted the graveyard she was for the moment insane. He had left her alone with the dead that had wrenged him most bitterly. He had forsaken her there in that cold, desolate night, regardless that she had ever been his wife, unless to remember her even as a woman. This thought stung her proud soul through all its anguish. She would not return home; not a single hour would she rest under the roof which loomed up so gray and ghostly behind those weird trees. But where could she go? In all the headlands that spread away from the coast there was no shelter for her. Degraded, broken-hearted, abandoned to her fate, like a wild animal, she stood alone among the graves of those who had been happy enough to die. This terrible blow, heavy as it had been dreaded, came upon her suddenly at last. At the bottom of her heart there had been all the while a desperate hope of escape. But it was over now. The worst had come, and that was almost annihilation. She looked up to the sky. The stars were all out. The soft gray clouds which had floated over them only a little while before were turning leaden and heavy, so heavy that the ocean was one mass of blackness, as if the mighty deep had welled itself with mourning, while the throes of a coming tempest heaved its under depths.

Never in this world had a human being been cast forth to such utter desolation. She looked down at the cold earth at her feet, and her poor heart ached to lie down with that other woman, who had found her rest so early, and be at peace. She thought of that woman with strange envy, remembering that the ocean had cast her forth when it moaned and heaved as she could hear it now. The grand, the tempestuous ocean, that could give death to a poor soul that pined for it as she did. She bent her head and listened to that far-off voice that held her in such a sort of fascination.

"I will go," she said, "I will go. It calls me with ten thousand voices, it calls me."

She started away from the tombstone against which she had leaned, and swiftly threading a passage through the graves, forced her way out by the broken gate. The moment Mellen stood in the cedar grove and saw her pass. Had he come forth all might have been well, but force pride rushed in and checked the noble impulse that had brought him back so far. She weeps swiftly by him and was lost in the fog. Some strange impulse of love broke up through the insane fascination which drove her towards the ocean, and in spite of herself she drifted backwards. Once or a break in the clouds sent down wild gleams of light, throwing up black vistas of gloom through every break in the woods, and revealing dense gray masses of vapor frowning over the waters. Then came darkness again, and she wandered on. Without knowing how, Elizabeth found herself on the lawn before her old home. The odor of dead leaves and late autumn blossoms rose up from the soil, and enveloped her with sickening remembrances. All at once the woman recognised the place. That huge pile with its cabins and towers had been her home only a few short hours before. Why had she turned that way? What mocking fiend had driven her back against her will? Th thought maddened her, but she could not move. The passionate love in her heart anchored those weary feet. She flung up her arms towards a window through which a light shone dimly, the window of his room, and an agonizing cry of farewell broke from her. It was his name that fled from her lips like a living arrow, and reached her husband in the gloomy stillness of his chamber. The window opened. She tore her feet from the earth and fled. Her husband, of all others, should not know that she had been drawing about the home from which he had driven her. That cry of agony coming from her lips frightened back her pride. She darted away across the flowerbeds, through thickets and over the lawn, which lay moist and heavy under the fog. Her wet feet got entangled in the coarse grass of dead heliotrope and cryanthemums, still blooming in defiance of storm and frost. The shawl which loose from her hands, which unconsciously huddled it close to her bosom, and was torn by the thorny rosebushes. Fragments of her dress were left behind. She plunged into a swampy hollow where clusters of tall catteail, sweet flag and sedgy rushes grew above the cattle pond, swarming with trout and gold fish. Her feet sank into the marsh till the water gurgled over her gaiters. She stood a moment, looking out upon the black pool, tempted to throw herself in; but some water-rat or frog, frightened by her approach, made a great leap, and plunged into the dark depths, giving it once a horrible idea of reptile life.

Not there, not there; no one should find her after she had rested in the water. The great bawling ocean had called her; why was she lingering by that miserable pool of black water, full of living things? Again she pressed forward, broke through the tangled sedges, and trampled down the spicy peppermint, till she reached the open land again. Right on—on—all she stood under the bustling cliff which frowned over the shore tavern.

It was the last house which seems just before daylight. The gleam of a candle shone through one of the tavern windows, and this faint idea of comfort drew her forward. She crept up close to the building, and through the little panes of glass saw Benson with his daughter and her children at breakfast together. When the days grew short it had always been the old man's habit to eat his breakfast by candlelight. It was a pleasant, homely scene that the wretched woman looked upon. Her haggard eyes grew wild at the sight of so much warmth, while her teeth chattered with cold, and terrible chills shook her from head to foot. A noble wood fire blazed on the hearth, filling the small white-washed room with its glow and cheer. The soft steam from the teakettle curled up the chimney, broiled fish and hot Indian cakes sent a savory odor through the ill-fitted sash.

Elizabeth had eaten nothing for the past two days, and with the sight of this comfortable breakfast a aching desire for food seemed on her. Food and warmth; let her have them and she was ready to die. That animal instinct of life came to the surface. A child at the table saw that white face with its wild burning eyes, and pointed the finger, uttering frightened shrieks.

Elizabeth darted away, crying out to the storm. "They will not have me; even his menials drive me from them."

The beach was not far off, and from it rose a sound of lashing waves, hoarse with the thunder of mustering storms. She turned her face to the deep bad sounded like an entreaty, but now it came full and strong, commanding her to approach. She obeyed it. These voices have life in little child; all her powers of reasoning were gone; all consciousness of pain or danger benumbed everything but her rejected love, but the great ocean was strong, boundless. With one heave of its mighty bosom it would sweep her away for ever.

She walked steadily on to the beach, forcing her way to the sands; through drifts of seaweed and slippery stones, on, on, still on, with love, but with horrible firmness, through great feathery of foam that curled upon the sands; on and on through whirlpools of spray, till a great wave seized her in its black undertow and she was gone.

CHAPTER XL.

All that day Elsie remained in bed, sleeping a good deal, but so nervous and shaken that she would not permit Bessie to leave her alone for a single instant. Her brother's presence seemed to fill her with dread, and she shrank with a strange sort of terror from the recital he continually made of the love he had believed rooted suddenly from his heart, as a strong tree is torn up by a tempest.

Yes, he regretted her! It was the only bitter in his life must be a desolate blank, he so pined for her presence that he imagined though he could have rushed out in search of her, and taken her back to his heart, sweeping aside all memory of her sin.

He roused himself from what appeared to him such degrading weakness by one thought; that night the partner in her guilt would visit the house secretly, as he had vowed in the note. Once more he and his old enemy would stand face to face, one of them only to quit the scene of meeting alive. She could not reach the villain in time to warn him, even if she had left in the night for that purpose.

That thought brought all the hardness back to his face, all the insane passion to his soul, but it centered now upon the man.

Alone in his library, Grantley Mellen wrote several letters; it was impossible to tell how that meeting would end, and he must make preparations for the worst. When all was done he rose to go upstairs again; a sudden resolution made him pause. He sat down at his desk once more, and wrote these lines:

"Elizabeth—I said that even in your dying hour I would never forgive you; I retract. If my pardon can console your last moments, remember that it is yours. I have made no alteration in my will; if you can accept the benefits which may accrue to you by my death, take them; but so surely as you ever attempt to approach the innocent girl my fate has been embittered by your companionship my curse shall follow you, even from the grave to which you will have consigned me."

He put the note in an envelope, sealed it carefully, and addressed it—"For Elizabeth."

He laid it aside for others he had written Elsie, put the papers all away in the desk, and left the room.

Elsie were only necessary precautions to make; Grantley Mellen's mind was so fiercely wrought upon that only his death or that of the man who had twice wronged him could end the fever.

He found Elsie sitting up in bed. She shrank away among the pillows when he entered; he saw the movement, and it added to her heart with a new pang. This artful woman had drawn the spell of her fascination around the child that your girl as she had around him. Elsie shrank from the brother who had deprived her of the love on which her soul existed. Elizabeth had left him nothing but bitterness.

"Are you feeling better?" he asked, sitting down by the bed-side.

"Oh, I never shall be any better," she murmured; "I shall die, and then, perhaps, you will be happy."

He could not be angry with her; it only wounded and stung him to hear her speak thus, but he answered gently:

"When you are able to reflect, Elsie, you will see that I could not have acted differently. Few men would have shown such leniency as I have done; regardless of the consequences to themselves, they would have made that woman's conduct public, and wrenched from her the last hope."

"She wasn't bad," cried Elsie; "you are crazy to think so. She was the best woman in the world."

"Have you forgotten what I told you this morning—what I was forced to tell you or submit to your hatred? From you window you could look out on the spot where they had parted—"

"Be still!" interrupted Elsie, with a shriek. "I won't stay in the house if you go on so—be still, I say!"

It required all his efforts to soothe the excited girl. He forgot to question her, to know if she had left Elizabeth much alone during his absence.

Elsie lay back among her pillows, refusing to be comforted, and crying:

"If you want to cure me send for Bessie—no dear, dear Bessie! Search for her—send the people out!"

Elsie, she has gone to him; I cannot follow her there."

"No, no; she is wandering about in the cold. Go, search for her!"

"Anything but that, Elsie—ask anything else in the world."

"I don't want anything else."

"As soon as you are better we will go away from here," he continued. "Anywhere, if you like."

"But how will she live?" persisted Elsie. "What will become of her? No money—no friends. Oh, Bessie, Bessie!"

"She has enough to live on," he replied. "There are stocks enough deposited in her name to give her a comfortable income."

"But they are gone," cried Elsie. Then, remembering the danger to herself in that avowal, she stopped suddenly.

"Gone!" he repeated. "How do you know? Elsie, do you know more than you owned?"

"Stop, stop!" she screamed. "You have driven Bessie away, and now you want to kill me! I don't know about anything, only I know I do. Just the other day Bessie spoke something about the stocks; I thought from what she said that you had taken them back from Elizabeth."

He was perfectly satisfied with her explanation, but the distress and fright into which she had fallen nearly brought on a convulsive crisis. Great drops of perspiration stood on her forehead, and the slender fingers he held worked nervously in his grasp.

"Don't talk any more, dear child," he said. "Try to go to sleep again."

"I can't sleep. I never shall rest again—never! I feel so wicked—I hate myself!"

"Child, what do you mean?"

"Nothing, nothing; only no danger must come near her. Even her sorrow for Elizabeth, her stinging remorse could not make her unselfish enough to run the slightest risk of his displeasure.

"I don't know what I mean—nothing at all! But it drives me wild to think of Bessie. Where can she be—where could she go? Suppose she has killed herself. Oh, she may be drowned in the bay—drowned—drowned!"

She went nearly mad with the ideas which her fancy conjured up, and was perfectly in keeping with her character that in the very extremity of her suffering no word for Elizabeth should be spoken that would implicate herself. Mellen must not guess at her knowledge of his wife's faults.

"You will have her searched for," she cried; "promise me that, if you don't want to kill me outright, promise me that."

"It could do no good, Elsie, none whatever. She has chosen her own destiny."

"It might, it would! If she has no money what will become of her?"

"I will inquire to-morrow," he replied. "I will write to Hudson. If she has disposed of the stocks I will see that she has means to live upon; I promise you that. After this night she will need it."

"Really, truly?"

"Did I ever break my word, Elsie?"

"No, no; but you are so hard and stern."

"Never with you, darling—never with you."

She groaned aloud, but hastened to speak:

"I am not going to change my mind."

"My poor little Elsie, my sister, my treasure!"

"Do you love me so much, Grant?"

"Better than ever; you are all I have now! Oh, Elsie, don't shut your heart against me, I can't bear that. Do you believe that I have acted unjustly as a man could. To the world what I can be stern and silent, but let me tell you the truth. I loved that woman so, my heart is breaking under this grief. Bear patiently with me, child."

"Oh, if you suffer so send for her back," cried Elsie. "Let her explain; you gave her no time—"

"Hush, hush! Have I not said all those things to myself?"

This man's pride was so utterly crushed that he was revealing the inmost secrets of his soul to this frail girl, scarcely caring to conceal from her how keenly he suffered.

"But try," pleaded Elsie; "only try."

"It is useless, Elsie; you must see that plainly as I do. Don't you see what a sin I should commit in taking a false, dishonored woman back to my heart; what a wrong to society at large in forcing her to the society of a creature so lost and fallen?"

"She is good!" cried Elsie. "Bessie was an angel! Oh, I wish I was dead—dead! I can't bear this; it is too much—too much!"

Elsie rubbed her hands and sobbed piteously; she had wept so much she had no tears left, and that choked anguish was more painful to witness than the most violent outburst of tears.

"She never will die," muttered Mellen; "she was twined round that girl's heart as she entwined mine, and has broken both."

"What are you saying, Grant?"

"Nothing, dear; I only pitied you and myself for loving her so."

"I will always love her," cried Elsie; "you never shall change me; nothing shall do that. She is innocent; I believe it; I would say so before the whole world."

Mellen was seized with a sudden fear.

"Elsie," he said, "if anything should happen to me; if I should die—"

She caught his hands and began to tremble.

"What do you mean? Die—die—"

"Nothing, dear; don't be frightened. But life is uncertain; what I mean is this—if you should receive any message from the sea that woman; never to let her come near you."

"I can't promise that; I can't be so wicked."

"You must, Elsie."

"I can't; I won't! No, no; I'll never be bad enough for that!"

"If you make me this, Elsie, you will sink a gulf between us which can never be filled up."

"Don't talk so; remember how sick I am."

"I do; I won't speak to you, you must have an end of this subject. If I should die—"

"I won't hear you talk about dying," she broke in. "You frighten me; you'll kill me."

But he went on resolutely:

"Promise never to see or hear from her."

"Not this; it is too wicked—too horrible."

"Elsie," he cried in stern passion, "promise, or I will go out of this room, and though we live under the same roof we shall meet no more."

He rose as if to fulfil his threat; she sprung up in bed; her cowardice, her selfishness mastered her completely.

"I promise. Come back, Grant, come back; oh, do!"

He seated himself again, soothed and caressed her.

We won't talk any more," he said, kindly, though beneath let every passage with this subject be dead between us; that woman's name must never be mentioned here; her very memory must be buried in the grave she filled; she has dishonored. You and I will bury the past, Elsie, and place a new inscription over the tomb; will you remember that, child?"

"Yes, yes; anything! Do what you please; I shall not be angry any longer; I is to be sick."

"Indeed no, darling! You are tender and forgiving as an angel! Oh, Elsie, in all the world there is no one like you to me but Bessie."

She lay there and allowed him to speak those words; she suffered terribly, but she could not force her soul to the monstrous crime even then. Let her volatile nature would turn determinedly from that dark tragedy; she would convince herself that she was utterly powerless; that, since it could do no good to grieve over Elizabeth and her mournful fate, it was better that she should dismiss all remembrance of her from her mind, and, drown her regrets, enjoy such pleasures as presented themselves, and build up a new world between her and the past.

But as yet she could not do that; she was completely unnerved and incapable of such resolution. So she writhed there in her pitiable pain and caught at every straw for comfort.

"You won't forget your promise, Grant?"

"What, dear?"

"To send money—that she may live, you know."

"I will not forget your kindness. I will attend to it this very day; don't think about that any more."

"How can I help thinking? You might as well tell me not to breathe; I must think!"

"The end has come; it can do no good to look back!"

Almost the very words Elizabeth had so many times repeated during those bad terrible days; the recollection was like a dagger to Elsie's very soul.

NIGHT AND DEATH.

BY JOS. BLANCO WHITE.

MYSTERIOUS Night! when our first parent knew
Thee, from report divine, and heard thy name,
Did he not tremble for this lovely frame,
This glorious canopy of light and blue?
Yet seeth a curtain of translucent dew,
Bathed in the rays of the great setting flame,
Hesperus, with the host of Heaven came,
And, lo! Creation widens in man's view.
Who could have thought such darkness lay concealed
Within thy beams, O Sun! or who could find,
Whilst flower, and leaf, and insect stood revealed,
That to such countless orbs thou mad'st us blind!
Why do we then shun Death with anxious strife?
If Light can thus deceive, wherefore not Life?

Circumstantial Evidence.

AN INCIDENT FROM REAL LIFE.

BY F. E. BROCK.

How often I've been led to reflect on the probable number of innocent persons who are hung or otherwise punished. Connected as I have been with one of the criminal courts of England, I have had many opportunities of witnessing on how slight an evidence a man has been condemned.

At that court (cited in my country's history when death by hanging was the penalty for forgery sheepstealing and other minor offences, many cases must have been decided by chance through a curious chain of circumstances, through their own imprudence, or, sometimes, I am sorry to say, through the malice, or the folly, of their friends.

When I was a young man—for now I am fast hurrying to an old man's grave—a case came under my own observation, where I could not help but can vouch, and which will show how easy it is for mankind to be misled, prone as they are to jump at conclusions.

In the western part of England lived a family of large fortune and landed property, which was entailed, that is, it was not to be sold, except to heirs. The present heir to the property at the time of which I write was a young man of about twenty-two years of age. I shall not give his correct name, but will call him Edward Langdon. He had a cousin, Arthur Langdon, who, in the event of the decease of Edward, without issue, would succeed to the property. These two young men were extremely fond of each other, and had been constant companions since their childhood. They had always been as brothers to each other, and were never contented when apart.

Arthur had of late contracted debts of which he was ashamed to tell his father, and which Edward paid, with his usual generosity, liquidated. The latter was extremely fond of rambling over the country, with his cousin as his only companion, and at the time of the occurrence of which I am about to relate had started on one of these excursions, and were intending to stop awhile on the banks of the river Severn in Somersetshire.

While wandering through the woods on horseback Edward was attacked by a sudden dizziness and violent headache, for which a thorough blood-letting would be the only remedy. He, therefore, called upon Arthur to perform that service for him, who demurred, fearing that, in his ignorance, he might do more harm than good. But his cousin was resolute, and as last he consented, and after opening the vein in the arm, stood allowing the blood to run for a few seconds, bound up the wound with an extra handkerchief of his own. Edward then feeling better, they rode on till they came to an inn on the bank of the river. Here they stopped, avowing their intention of remaining for a week or two.

When night came they retired to the same chamber, and Arthur, tired and sleepy, was soon in bed, and quickly dropped off into a sound slumber. He did not awake until after daylight, and then perceived by his self during one of the bed covered with blood. Almost at the same moment that he made this discovery, and while he was trying to collect his scattered ideas, the door opened and a servant thrust in his head. He gave one glance at the bloodstained couch with its military counterpane and then rushed down and returned with the landlord and a gaping crowd, who immediately made Arthur their prisoner. Search was made, and a large quantities of paper was found in his portmanteau to the requirements of the present day. Cleanliness is a virtue which he would then have perceived, and the time now occupied in passing and distributing the rollers obviated.

THE ITANDALA.—This fish, which contends for the dominion of the Brazilian waters and South America, is one of terrible voracity. Its enormously sensual lips project into the water like pipes from its stomach. The victim of the piranha is generally surrounded by a whole shoal or swarm of them; but it may be justly compared to a nest of water hornets. Horses and cattle do not venture to drink of the water below the surface, lest their snouts should be bitten off—an accident which sometimes befalls them. The negro boy himself is forced to fly before this terrible enemy, and turns his unprotected back towards the top of the water; the other alone, whose hairy skin deadens the force of the bite, is proof against this attack.

CURIOUS SUPERSTITION.—A recent traveller says: "If a house abuts upon or stands before the end of a lane or street, the side looking towards that passage almost invariably has a small tile or slab of stone let into it, with an inscription which varies with the fancy of the owner, the opinion of the fortune-telling sage, or the locality from whence the tablet may have been procured. An inscription of this kind, on a large slab of blue slate, neatly cut and painted, as if it demanded care and attention, I saw in the wing of a brick building, at the foot of a by-lane, not far from the banks of the Peiho; and, curious to know its meaning, I obtained a translation of it. It was simply to the effect that 'this stone was brought from the province of Shansitung, and placed here to prevent the evil influences of the lane coming near this house.'"

FUN OR THE FAMILY.

WITTY MR. GRUMPER.—The Duke of Grammont was the most finished and witty courtier of his day. He entered one day the closet of the Cardinal Mazarin, without being announced. His Eminence was amusing himself by joining square to the wall. To surprise Prime Minister in so boyish an occupation was dangerous. A close saloon-courtier might have thumped his cane and retired. But the Duke entered briskly and cried:

"I'll bet you ten crowns that I jump higher than your Excellence."

And the Duke and Cardinal began to jump for their lives. Grammont took care to jump a few inches lower than the Cardinal, and six months afterwards was Marshal of France.

A CERTAIN editor gives his opinion in a recent number of his journal in the following terms:

"A bachelor's home is one of the most graceful compliances in the world—the very soul of society. We like to pass a night at a bachelor's room as the last and most comfy that you cannot get in a word edgeways. It frees you from the restraint, prepares you sociability, and gives you heart to sip in a soft saying or two, whatever such a thing is worth, whereas single is a term by which to be endured, breeding awkward embarrassments and unspeakables. Our advice to young men is—Go to bed."

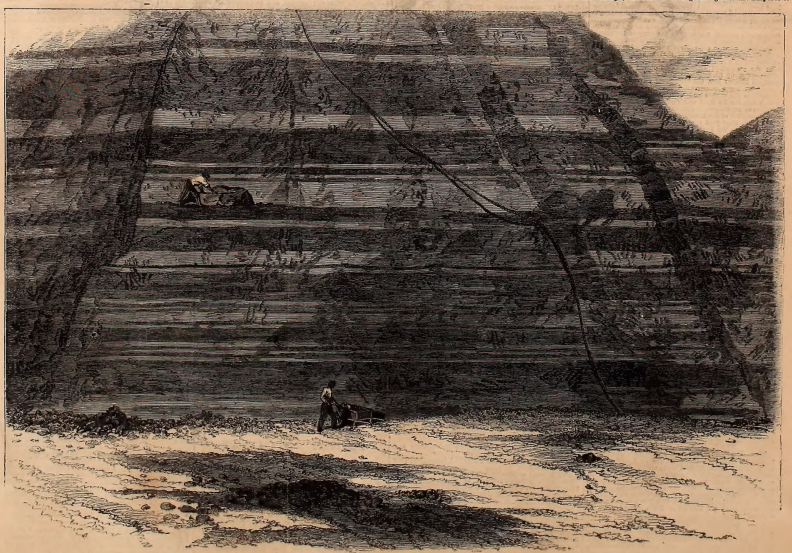
THE WAR IN VIRGINIA—SKETCH ON THE LINE OF 2ND CORPS AT THE BATTLE OF THE WILDERNESS, MAY 10—WAITING FOR THE ENEMY.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, E. FORBES.—SEE PAGE 167.

EUROPEAN AGGRESSIONS IN AMERICA—SEIZURE OF THE CHINCHA OR GUANO ISLANDS BY A SPANISH FLEET, UNDER ADMIRAL PINZON.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.

SPANISH OUTRAGE IN PERU.



The Chincha Islands.

THE United States alone, by its power and its access as a republic, held in check the monarchies of the Old World, who have ever looked with an evil eye on the republics of the Western world, and a longing one on their vast regions, rich in vegetable and mineral wealth. The temporary paralyzation of American power ad extra by a great civil war seemed the moment when their bandit propensities could not be suppressed.

The spirit of monarchy, sprung from tyranny and rapine,

Forgetting that God wields the storm,
Would make all earth assume its form,
As Alexander did Mount Athos.

None can fail to have remarked, since the outbreak of the rebellion, a series of aggressive acts committed by European Governments against the States of the American Continent. Among these the Mexican Expedition and the subsequent proclamation of the Mexican Empire; the subjugation by Spain of the Republic of San Domingo; the conduct of England against the Emperor of

THE CHINCHA ISLANDS—FORMATION OF THE GUANO, SHOWING THE VARIOUS STRATA.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.

Brazil. We have now to add to these acts another, hardly inferior to any of those already named—the conduct of the Spaniards towards Peru.

A special Ambassador of Spain to Peru not having been able to settle a difficulty between the two Governments to his own satisfaction, the Admiral of the Spanish fleet off Peru at once, without any previous declaration of war, seized the Chincha islands, made prisoners of the Governor and the officers of the islands, and captured a Peruvian transport with its officers. He then made an attempt to surprise and capture the Peruvian squadron in the port of Callao, but this was fortunately frustrated.

Still more strange than these seizures is the declaration by which the Admiral tries to justify his course. Among the considerations which he says have led him to occupy the islands, he mentions that the independence of Peru had never been recognised by Spain, and that the Government of Peru has recently borrowed $70,000,000, a sum greatly in excess of the requirements of the treasury!

Mr. Robinson, our present Minister in Peru, may be an accomplished gentleman, but in our ignorance of his qualities, we may be permitted to express our regret that Mr. Squier, who so thoroughly understands the character, genius, language of the Hispano-Americans, and the diplomatic arts of their enemies, is not at this moment our Minister to Peru. In his hands we would feel certain that all that could be done would be done, and well done, for the interests of American liberty.

The pretext of the war thus summarily begun by Spain to revive in the Western Continent her iniquitous power was an affair at Talambo, in which a Spaniard lost his life.

It would be a parallel case were the United States to seize Nassau for the murder, by English subjects, of the engineer on the Chesapeake.

The Spanish Commissioner, Signor Mazarredo, took his departure from the harbor of Callao on the 13th April, in the Spanish steam gunboat Cavadonga, to seek and join the Admiral. On the 16th the Spanish squadron, consisting of the screw steam frigates Resolucion and Triunfo, together with the steamer Cavadonga, made their appearance off the harbor of Callao, and entered it at full speed, evidently with no friendly intentions. Only the day before they had forcibly taken possession of the Chincha islands, made prisoners of the Governor and all the other Peruvian authorities there, and captured the transport Iquique, which vessel happened to be there at the time.

After this exploit the steamed at all speed to Callao, in the hope of being able to surprise and capture with but small resistance the Peruvian squadron there assembled; but their manner of entering the harbor being manifestly so hostile, the Peruvian officers had time to get up steam and move their vessels close under the guns of the castle, where Pinzon and his three vessels did not care to venture.

The course of the Spanish Commissioner and Admiral drew out not only a firm and manly protest from Don Juan Antonio Peget, the President of Peru, but strong expressions of censure from the foreign residents.

The Hon. E. George Squier, who had already in diplomatic service been so able in thwarting European aggression in America, was then in Lima, and was called upon to preside at a meeting of American citizens, Mr. E. W. Sartori being Secretary.

On motion, a committee of five was appointed to draw up resolutions, as follows: Messrs. Moore, Cashier, Thorn, Wendell and Colville.

The committee then withdrew.

During their absence remarks relative to the questions before the meeting were made by Messrs. Ross, Reeden and others.

The Committee on Resolutions reported the following, which were unanimously adopted seriatim:

Whereas the naval forces of Spain, in time of peace, without notice or previous declaration of hostilities, in a clandestine manner, and under false and fraudulent pretexts, have seized on an important portion of the territory of Peru, thereby, and without warrant, disturbing the commerce of the world, and seriously impairing the interests of citizens of all nations resident in this country; therefore,

Resolved, That the seizure of the islands, vessels and citizens of Peru by the naval forces of Spain is a flagrant act of perfidy, a grievous outrage on the rights and sovereignty of Peru, and a gross violation of the rules of international law observed by civilized nations.

Resolved, That we regard the guano islands as a trust held by Peru, to be administered in the general interest of mankind, and that their possession by any strong maritime Power involves the danger of an oppressive and uncontrollable monopoly, injurious to the agricultural world, against which it is the duty of industrial nations to protest, and, if necessary, interfere.

Resolved, That we see in this new act of aggression only another development of that unholy conspiracy against popular freedom which, not content with repressing the peoples of Europe, has fostered civil war at home, given up St. Domingo to the cruelties of Spain, plunged Mexico into the horrors of war, and seeks to impose on her a monarchical form of government, in hostility to the wishes and welfare of her people, and which has, for its final and cherished object, the destruction of republican institutions and the subversion and absorption of the American republics.

Resolved, That past agressions and impending dangers impose on the American republics the duty of immediately combining in an effective union for mutual defence and protection, and for the preservation of the institutions bequeathed to them by a Washington and a Bolivar.

Resolved, That we deeply sympathise with the people of Peru in this the hour of their trial, and that, while we commend to them the glorious example of the patriots of St. Domingo, we cordially extend to them all the aid and assistance in our power compatible with our international obligations.

Resolved, That in the recognition of the Monroe doctrine consists the safeguard and only defence of the sister republics of this continent; and that, whilst the true policy of each of them is to throw open its ports to foreign emigration, he who casts his future in a foreign land should be content to be governed by the same laws, and should, in times of public danger, hold himself liable to the same sacrifices as those who by birth or their own free election have become citizens.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be signed by the officers thereof, and a copy sent to the Presidents of Peru and the United States, and that they be published in the newspapers of Lima and Washington.

E. GEO. SQUIER, Chairman.

EDM. W. SARTORI, Secretary.

Lima, April 27, 1864.

We give in this paper a fine view of the seizure of the islands from a photograph, and also a view of one of the great guano deposits which make these islands an object of importance.

Guano (from the Peruvian huano, dung), is the manure of seafowl, deposited here for thousands of years, and in this rainless climate accumulating day by day unwasted and undeprived of the chemical substances it contains. While similar deposits in other climates are washed away or rendered useless, this has become of immense value, and the view gives some idea of the immense trade already carried on there.

The other sketch shows a side of one of these deposits with its various strata, the lower hardened almost to rock, the upper easily pierced by the guano and other birds, which burrow into it, filling it with chambers.

We shall give further illustrations, showing the manner of working and transporting the guano.

THE Paris Monde says: "The Duke of Luynes is exploring the Dead Sea on board a small steamer, the Cigar, 35 feet long, which was built for him at Toulon, sent to Jaffa in pieces, and thence carried to the Dead Sea on camels. The Arabs in the neighborhood, struck with amazement at the sight of this tiny vessel moving over the water in a way inexplicable to them, firmly believe that it is a demon which has risen from the bottom of the accursed Lake of Sodom."

THE commerce of the world requires 3,600,000 of able-bodied men to be constantly traversing the sea; of this number, probably 7,500 die every year. The amount of property annually moved on the water is from £300,000,000 to £400,000,000; and the amount lost by the casualties of the sea averages £5,000,000.

Literary Agency, Established in 1842. The subscriber has, for more than 20 years past, been in the habit of reading and preparing manuscripts for the Press. At first this labor was one of kindness, and performed gratuitously. But it became so burdensome, and absorbed so much time, that a small charge in the nature of a preliminary fee became necessary. This fee, not exceeding $25, and generally less, compensated both for a careful and critical perusal of a work in manuscript, and the offering of it, if approved, to publishers.

The subscriber continues to receive and read manuscripts in the same manner, giving his candid opinion concerning them, and arranging for their printing and publication, when desired to do so. He makes his charges as small as possible, since his chief object is to aid and benefit authors.

In all cases letters of advice should be forwarded by mail, while manuscripts are sent, prepaid, either through the Post Office or by express, legibly addressed,

Have now been before the public for nearly a year. They are universally pronounced the neatest and best fitting collars extant.

The upper edge presents a perfect curve, free from the angles noticed in all other collars.

The overall center lay packers on the inside of the Curv-down collar—they are AS SMOOTH INSIDE AS OUTSIDE, and therefore perfectly flat and easy to the neck.

The Garotte collar has a smooth and evenly finished edge on both sides.

These collars are not simply flat pieces of paper cut in the form of a collar, but are MOLDED AND SHAPED TO FIT THE NECK.

They are made in "Novelty" (or turn-down style), in every half size from 13½ to 17 inches; and in "Standard" (or Garotte), from 13 to 17 inches; and packed in "solid sizes" in neat blue cartons.

In smaller sizes of 10 to 13 inches, for every family package for Travellers, Army and Navy Officers.

"On to Richmond"—Gen. Grant and his Flanking Operations.

THE successful battles and flanking operations which have carried the Army of the Potomac, under Gen. Grant, from Culpeper Court-house down into Richmond peninsula, will, in the future historian's form the most interesting and important chapter of all the records of this gigantic civil war. We believe, however, that to the old routine, orthodox, and consequent, but erroneous calculations of Gen. Lee, in reference to Gen. Grant's base of supplies, all these late successful movements of our army in his hands may be fairly attributed.

First, over the utterly exhausted country of 70 miles, between Washington and the Rapidan river, our army, say, of 100,000 men with its thousands of horses, could be supplied with its subsistence only by the Orange and Alexandria railroad. This was evidently Lee's estimate of Gen. Grant's situation when he moved forward to the Rapidan—Gen. Grant would still need his railroad; but to secure it, the strongly fortified position of Gen. Lee at Mine run would first have to be carried. That this calculation was a mistake was proved by Gen. Grant's abandonment of the Orange road in the act of crossing the river. "Never mind," said Gen. Lee, "we will entangle this rash intruder in the Wilderness; and then by working round we can thrusten his rear, we will drive him back over the river to secure his base of supplies." The experiment was tried, the right wing of Gen. Grant in that "wilderness" of pines was partially turned; but instead of repairing the break by falling back, Gen. Grant withdrew an entire army corps from his right under cover of the darkness, and moved it round to his left, which was equivalent to saying, "Gen. Lee desires to pass in between me and Washington. The way is open. Let him pass on." But with the morning's dawn, Lee discovered that in this accommodating movement our army was getting in between himself and Richmond, and so he lost no time in falling back to Spottsylvania Court-house, though compelled to fight over every foot of the ground.

What next? Gen. Grant had moved the line of his offensive operations from the Orange to the Fredericksburg and Richmond railroad, and in anticipation of this possible change of base, Gen. Lee had provided himself a strongly intrenched position, which, according to the old orthodox system of warfare, his adversary would be compelled to carry before he could advance another mile. This fortified position was so far tried by Gen. Grant as to satisfy him that it was not an improvised, but an elaborate and carefully constructed system of defences, which would require too great an expenditure of men and time to carry from the front. To abandon the roads behind him to Fredericksburg he must abandon that point as his base of supplies. It was done, and simultaneously his army, by a flank movement on our left, turned Lee's formidable defences at Spottsylvania, and compelled him to vacate them precipitately, and to push forward, night and day, with his whole army, to escape the danger of being cut off from Richmond.

And what then? Gen. Lee had provided another strongly fortified intrenched defensive position commanding the junction of the Fredericksburg and Richmond railroads, between and near the confluence of the North and South Anna rivers, which form the Pamunky. At this point he no doubt was satisfied that Gen. Grant would have no alternative but a destructive effort to the Federal army to clear away these new obstructions. How clue Gen. Grant he manifests his consciousness even with his new base of supplies on the Rappahannock?

The problem was solved by another flank movement, which carried the Army of the Potomac around again to the left, and over the Pamunky river, to a point within 15 miles of Richmond, and connecting with the White House water base of supplies, which, by way of the broad navigable York river or estuary, gives Gen. Grant all the facilities of the best possible communications with the ports of Norfolk, Washington, the James river and Gen. Butler.

Thus, the old orthodox military idea that, in moving a great army overland to Richmond, Gen. Grant would find his difficulties increasing with his advance increase as he progressed, from the increasing embarrassments in his rear, is proved a fallacy. The strategic of Vicksburg has shown that, for months of two or three days, a base of supplies may be dispensed with, even in traversing an exhausted country, by simply resolving that a certain point will be reached in a given time. This is the "Little Corporal's" idea of a forward movement revived; and we see that with a General who has thoroughly studied the strategy of Napoleon, and who has thus proved his own superior strength, the dangers of a flank movement on his part are purely imaginary, and that its advantages at every step are equal to a great victory.

Having established himself in front of Richmond, with a secure base of supplies at the James river having brought his main army into close rapport with the powerful co-operating army column of Gen. Butler and our heavy squadron of gunboats, and secured a strong base on the James river, and having the additional advantage over the enemy of an immensely superior body of cavalry, the reduction of Richmond, and the expulsion of the armed forces of the rebellion from Virginia assume the palpable shape of inevitable events. That Richmond and Virginia are now untenable to the rebellion will soon be made manifest; and, we still believe, without imposing upon Gen. Grant the labors and tedious delays of a regular siege. The days of Sir Guy's delivery drawn near, and the knell of the rebellion will soon be sounded.

Summary of the Week.

VIRGINIA—GRANT'S ARMY.

The advance of Gen. Grant's army, led by the second corps, under Gen. Hancock, drove the enemy before it to a point seven miles south of Bowling Green, where he was at 10 o'clock P.M. on Gen. 224 May, and occupied the bridge over the Mattapony. Hancock moved upon Bowling Green on Saturday by a forced march. The rebel cavalry and a battery of artillery opposed the passage at Guinea station, but they were dispersed and pursued by our cavalry. On Sunday, the 22d, Hancock made clear headway through the town of Milford and some distance beyond. An attack upon our headquarters train, near Guinea station, was made by Fitz Lee (5th Virginia cavalry), but they were gallantly repulsed by the 114th and 98th Pennsylvania volunteers.

The 5th and 6th corps marched by way of Hartsburg to Jerichoford, and the 5th corps succeeded in effecting a crossing of the North Anna and getting a position without much opposition. Shortly after they were violently attacked, but handsomely repulsed the assault without much loss. We captured in all about 1,000 prisoners, in great part North Carolinians. Lee then took up a strong position between the North and South Anna.

During the night of the 26th Grant recrossed the North Anna, and marching with unexampled celerity, crossed the Pamunky at Hanovertown. Sheridan took possession of the town on Friday morning. The 1st division, 6th corps, arrived at DUNKIRK, followed during the day by the other corps. Lee, thus outflanked, has fallen back again on Richmond, as the rebel papers say—in pursuit of Grant!

Our wounded have been removed from Fredericksburg.

Mosby is, as usual, prowling in the rear, and has been destroying the bridges and blockhouses from Union mills to the Rapidan.

BUTLER'S ARMY.

On the night of the 23d the rebels made an assault on Gen. Ames's line, driving in the pickets. The fight lasted about 15 minutes, and as soon as it was over our men proceeded to bury the rebel killed left on the field; 283 were interred by our forces. Our loss will not be more than about 10 killed and 60 wounded, as we had all the advantage on our side—constantly on the defensive and the enemy marching boldly up to our breastworks.

The gunboats on the James and Appomattox rivers aided by shelling the woods and dispersing the rebel reserves.

An attack on Fort Powhatan the same evening was also repulsed with loss.

On the 24th, a reconnoissance, with a brisk fight of an hour and a half, defeated them, with very slight loss on our side. The rebels made nine successful attacks on our outreconnoissance, and were each time repulsed.

On the 25th Fitzhugh Lee made, with cavalry, infantry and artillery, a vigorous sally on our post at Wilson's wharf, north side of James river, below Fort Powhatan, garrisoned by two regiments of negro troops, and after a stubborn and obstinate fight was handsomely repulsed.

WESTERN VIRGINIA.

Maj.-Gen. Hunter took command of this department, May 25, relieving Gen. Sigel.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The rebels in Washington, N. C., set fire to the town on the 11th of May, destroying all but about 20 houses. Provisions are plentiful and cheap in the place.

Gen. Harland has been assigned to the command of the sub-district of Newberne.

The poor Union refugees from Plymouth and Washington, North Carolina, were burned over their heads, are at Newberne in great numbers, in a very destitute condition.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

A constant bombardment of Charleston and of Fort Sumter is kept up, but no other movement is taking place.

GEORGIA.

Gen. Sherman flanked Gen. Johnston's position at Altoona, on the Etowah river. On the 24th Johnston advanced to meet him at Dallas, and the armies met near Pumpkin Vine Creek. Johnston was driven back to the forks of the Allatoona and Marietta roads, where he is throwing up defensive works.

LOUISIANA.

Our gunboats have escaped from their position above the Falls at Alexandria. Admiral Porter, in a dispatch to Secretary Welles, gives great credit to Col. Bailey, of the 19th army corps, who built a dam of 600 feet in length across at the lower falls, thus enabling the boats to float over the shoals and obstructions.

Admiral Porter had arrived with his fleet of gunboats and army transports at Simmsport, near the mouth of the Red river, and the army had reached Morgan's Ferry on the 16th May. The army marched by the old road, and reached its present position simultaneously with the navy's arrival at Simmsport.

Gen. Canby had arrived at Simmsport, and assumed the direction of affairs at that place.

No opposition was made to the exodus of either the army or navy from the Red river country by the Atchafalaya.

The route pursued by the army from Alexandria was down the river to the mouth of the Bayou, some 15 or 16 miles, and thence to Simmsport. It was delayed by the rising of the Atchafalaya, but crossed the Mississippi on the 21st.

MISSOURI.

The rebel steamer Florida was at Bermuda on the 14th, and had burned a New York ship from Calhoo three weeks previously.

The U. S. gunboat Seminole City and Wave have been captured by the rebels near Sabine Pass.

CONGRESS.

In the Senate, on the 23d May, there was but routine business of general character—the subjects discussed being entirely local.

In the House, the subject of debate was the suppression of the Journal of Commerce and the World, by order of Government. The illegal act was fiercely denounced by one side of the House, by the other, on the plea that the public exigencies must overrule all legal technicalities.

In the Senate, on the 24th, the Brazil Mail Steamship bill was passed, by Yeas, 21; Nays, 14. The House bill to appoint a Commissioner of Agriculture, and two Inspectors of steamboats for collection in the District of East Tennessee was passed. The Internal Revenue bill was discussed mainly on the clauses regulating the duties and salaries of officers to be appointed under the act. The amendments of the Finance Committee, which were verbal, were generally agreed to.

In the House, the Reciprocity Treaty was debated, but without any result. Mr. Davis opposed terminating it.

In the Senate, on the 26th, Mr. Meyan reported a bill to prevent the discharge of drafted persons by the payment of commutation, with an amendment which insures that the provisions of the bill shall not prevent the actual furnishing of substitutes. Boards of enrollment must also report the names of persons and the date of each in addition. The Tax bill was taken up. An amendment to the Senate Finance Committee's amendment to the bill, making the tax on a barrel of lager beer, ale, beer or other fermented liquors, $1 32 instead of $1 50, was adopted. The other amendments of the Finance Committee were agreed to, so far as the reading of the bill had progressed in the Committee of the Whole. Mr. Hale introduced a bill to promote the efficiency of the navy, which was referred.

In the House, the Speaker laid the reply of President Lincoln to the resolution adopted yesterday inclosing the correspondence between Secretary Seward and Mr. Dayton relative to the resolution adopted by the House against the invasion of Mexico by France. Mr. Seward says that it is practically an Executive question; that it does not belong to Congress to take action in the premises, and that while the President receives the unanimous declaration of the House with the profound respect to which it is entitled, he deems Mr. Dayton to inform the French Government that he does not intend to depart from the unbroken unanimous public concurring the French occupation of Mexico. A report to the Committee on the Army of Pensions, Bounties, and a later debate followed on the equalization on the pay of soldiers. The bill was finally laid on the table. Yeas, 58; Nays, 21, and asked for a new Committee. [The fact that the bill as that the House insists upon action that there shall be no distinction in pay in consequence of color.]

In the Senate, on the 26th, Mr. Johnson offered a resolution that whereas the President by information as to the delivery of Sr. Arguelles to the Spanish authorities by Mr. Seward's order, and thereby characterizing the act of the Administration in suppressing the publication of the New York Herald and the Journal of Commerce as a violation of the Constitution. Mr. Fessenden reported back the Internal Revenue bill, with many amendments. The bill was discussed by the Senate and the House, and accepted to a Committee of Conference, to be appointed by the Chair, which was agreed to. The Tax bill was considered and the amendments of the Senate Finance Committee, so far as they extended, the bill progressed, were generally concurred in by the Senate acting in Committee of the Whole.

In the House, the consideration of the Reciprocity Question was resumed. The House also voted on the amendment of Mr. Arnold of Illinois, authorizing the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint three Commissioners to confer with a like number of Commissioners duly authorized by the British Government to negotiate a new treaty based on the principles of reciprocity between the two Governments, with a view of enlarging the basis of the present treaty, and for the removal of the existing difficulties, provided, that in case one shall not be agreed to by both Governments, that the President shall give the notice for the termination according to the provisions of the existing treaty. The vote was disagreed to—Yeas 57; The House then voted on Mr. Morrill's substitute, authorizing and requiring the President to give the stipulated notice for the termination of the treaty. This was rejected—Yeas 71. The original resolution was reported from the Committee on Commerce was next read. Mr. Stevens moved to lay it on the table. Disagreed to—Yeas against 76. The House agreed to the preamble to the resolution, which contains a reason for a cancellation of the treaty. The question recurring on the passage of the resolution, Mr. Stevens moved the previous question—declaration be postponed till the second Tuesday of December—Yeas, 76; Nays, 78: So the motion was lost.

The House, on the 27th, there was no business of general interest transacted.

In the House, the Senate bill was passed, providing that documents and letters may be sent to Government officers without the payment of postage. Several bills are called up the report of the Reconstruction Committee. Mr. McKeary, the celebrated, said that certificates of the sitting member was obtained by depositing many thousand votes fraudulently. Much debate, mild vindication, violence and bloodshed. He characterized the resolutions of the Democrats as vague and unmeaning. A long discussion followed, Mr. Smith strongly upholding Gen. Fremont's proclamation. Mr. Cox replied. The House adjourned without further action in the case.

In the Senate, on the 28th, the joint resolution to amend the charter of the City of Washington was taken up, and the amendment allowing persons to be registered as voters who have heretofore resided there, without distinction of color, was rejected by 29 against 18. The joint resolution was then passed, and returned to the House. Mr. Doolittle introduced a joint resolution giving the thanks of Congress to Zachary of the 19th army corps, and directing that a gold medal be prepared for presentation to him at the direction of the President of the United States, as a recognition of the "eminent personal gallantry and ability displayed in leading and executing with success which enabled Admiral Porter's fleet to ascend the Red river." Passed. The consideration of the Internal Revenue bill was resumed. Mr. Sherman offered a substitute which he had discussed. Finally the clause was stricken out by a vote of 8 against 31. An evening session was held on the Tax bill, when among other appointments received from the President, was that of Col. Geo. Gregg Dayler of Red river engineering fame, for brevet-brigadier-general.

TOWN COSSIP.

ONCE upon a time the annual showing of the works of artists constituting the National Academy of Design was an event of the year. Days—and not so many years ago either—used to be unpromised necessary by the people and the press, that they should "do" the Academy Exhibition, as it was a few weeks ago to "do" the Sanitary Fair. Alas! how have the mighty fallen! Now, the doors are opened, and hardly hung upon their wall, but the cry is not, "still they come."

We grieve to say it, but the truth is that the annual exhibition of the National Academy of Design has become almost a nuisance. In some measure this is attributable to outside causes, such as the fact that the public can look at better pictures without paying for the sight, but chiefly the fault lies with the artists themselves. They are behind the age. The food they have to put on their canvas is not the food necessary personally as well as a body, has so affected the institution, that it chooses to sneer at public taste, and force its genius upon a community almost dead to art. Year by year the show of pictures has been growing worse in quality and smaller in quantity, and now in this blessed year of our Lord, 1864, the mass is little better than trash—absolute trash.

In a year when dress and to end of a limited space we look in vain for a great picture, or for an idea. The artist seems to be quite content with a meaningless and literary newspapers. A little twaddling story of some forlorn looking girl, and sighing about nothing, or a picture of a youth rode by on a black charger, and with a flash of mingled love and surprise, born of the instant, he recognizes in the lady he has scarcely met before, and eloped to the South Pacific in a tumult of contending emotions, are the staple of the contributions from the screw of Anna Mottle, who is violently suffering under a cold and for the want of a new idea, and under her head a frosted and blistered heart, and the whole body of her frame, as one of 17, that the world is all a blank, and that her coffin is ordered. Of this school are the pictures—and there are many of them—of the exhibition of 1864. We will endeavor to name some, if not all, of these exceptions.

The most prominent of these is Mr's picture of "Columbus making his egg to stand." It has become a fashion to make light of Columbus there is strength artistically and physically. In giving this picture to the world Mr. Mount should never have consented to be made the supposing accidental to be genius. Mr. Mount has a departure for the beaten track betokens a high order of talent. Was there no other incident in the life of Columbus, but that of making his will, and what excuse was attached to the act beyond that of Messrs. Smith, Jones or Robinson?

The next is "Faithful unto Death," by Thomas Nast. In Mr. Nast's picture there is something of an idea. We have noticed pictures of this artist before, one we especially recall, "Our Flag Victorious," a water-color drawing which has been for the past few weeks exhibited in Schenes' window. There is a strength of handling and ambition, and time will bring some of the decision that is now wanting. Nast's shortcoming is color, when study has given him improvement in this point he will become an artist of a high order.

Among the landscapes are several, by Cropsey, taken at Greenwood Lake, a beautiful spot in Orange county, N. Y., little known, but destined to be under such penciling. "The South Mountain," Catskills, by Gifford ; 259, a landscape ; a bunch of brook trout, No. 129, by Mount, after which comes a cloud of land views and sea views until the sight sickens with the flat insensate pieces of canvas.

Edwin Forbes has a clever picture, somewhat crude, of "The Rear of the Column," a scene in the Army of the Potomac, while on the march. It has life and truth in it, that show at a glance they are the results of the artist's study from the reality.

As we predicted some weeks since, the woman's league against extravagance in dress is proving an utter failure. It started with a splash of something that looked like enthusiasm, but soon showed the cloven foot, as a movement savoring somewhat of interest, when it was seen that the strongest advocates of the cause were those who would be most benefitted, could such a movement be made fashionable. These interested parties were the manufacturers of domestic goods, who would, of course, find their reward in increased sales. There is something supremely ridiculous in the idea of the committee of ladies sitting in solemn conclave at their rooms, in Great Jones street, to receive deputations of manufacturers and approve of their goods. We fancy we hear the sleeve-laugh of the very drummers who are engaged in the harmless attempt to reach the sympathies and purses of the warmhearted ladies engaged in the absurd work. There is a touch of royalty about it—Queen Victoria doing something for the Spitalfields weavers by setting the pattern of a ribbon, or promising a deputation of lacemakers to wear their handywork at the next drawing-room.

To our innocent mind there is something fearfully like opposition—a deep political female move—to Shoddyism in this league. Its originators have found, for the last year or two, that they have been met upon their own ground by Shoddy, and if not defeated, have at least had a hard battle to fight. Shoddy has come into the market with a hungry grasp and snatched from under the very eyes of fashion the richest dress, the finest equipages, the most brown stoney of brown stone fronts, the rarest of jewels, and the most reckless of all extravagance. What refuge is there left for fashion but the old fabulous idea of the grapes that hung too high for Master Fox. They could not contend, and they could not vacate the field without some resistence, and what better than to throw, by a fashionable movement, Shoddy back upon its original ground, stripping it for the nonce of a large share of the benefits conferred by a plethora of cash? If this was the thought—mind we say "if"—it was a brilliant one, but, alas! we fear a hopeless; for Shoddy rebels, and headed by a fierce and well-fed army of tinkers and tailors, milliners, mantuamakers and drygoods traders, will in the end prove too much for fashion.

And now for the amusements of the people. Blessed is he in these days who was born or has become a theatrical manager, for in such a vocation shall he prosper. Go where we will, crowds are before us. Shake but the semblance of a novelty at the public, and straightway a beggarly account of empty boxes becomes an impossibility. Sensation, or heavy melodrama, rich old comedy, or creamy new burlesque, all is fish that comes to the public net, and all are devoured with equal avidity.

The first upon the list with a novelty was the Winter Garden, with the Florences and their new burlesque of "Fra Diavalo." The management have not gone to any wonderful outlay in putting the piece on the stage, but the doing of it makes up for any shortcomings on that head. Florence, as the heavy villain, who breakfasts, dines and sups on blood, is comic in the highest degree; while Mr. Vining Bowers, who does Lorenzo, the policeman, does it up irresistibly droll, ending off with the song of "Let me kiss him, Yankee Doodle!" in a style that brings the house down in a genuine way. Mrs. Chanfrau, as Zerlina, was charming; she is, without discount, the prettiest woman at this moment on the New York stage, and we are not sure but the cleverest actress in her line, always doing her work quietly and artistically, and leaving, upon her exit, a host of admirers.

Attached to "Fra Diavalo," they have been doing one of those monstrosities of the stage, a protean piece, entitled "Thrice Married," which is about as good as such pieces can be.

Mrs. John Wood has also been trying her hand at a novelty, with the ominous title of "Paul's Return," which turns out a capital cold weather piece, but is rather too exercising for the warm nights of this season. Nevertheless Paul returned every night for the past week, and topped off with "Easy Shaving," by the pretty barber of Islington, as we top off our juleps with a bit of pineapple, a slice of orange, or a strawberry: it seems to go down as smoothly.

Wallack, in a steady, conservative way, like some banker that trades legitimately on his bullion, goes on giving us English comedy, always a sterling dish, and "Rosedale" for the one hundred and twenty something time, as in the olden days when we were all children, as it will undoubtedly continue to do when we become old and grayheaded.

Niblo's is still demoniac with "Bel Demonio," and still the grand Vestvali treads the boards with manly perseverance, and jumps from that fearful mountain night after night, to the intense delight of the multitude who expect nightly to see her broken into bits.

Heller fills his comfortable little salon nightly to an uncomfortable degree, and startles the public from its propriety every other day by the most fearfully sensational advertisements.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The bogus proclamation has already travelled as far as Illinois. The Quincy Herald, of the 19th May, introduces it as follows : "The World is the only paper which appears to have the following," and then publishes the proclamation in full.

—— A bill has just passed the Connecticut Legislature, providing for a fine of $25 upon railroad companies that neglect to carry a certain quantity of good drinking water in passenger cars.

—— The entire receipts of the Camden and Atlantic railroad on Saturday, the 28th May, were given for the benefit of the great Sanitary Fair.

—— The Japanese gunboat Puseyami was launched on Saturday from Westervelt's shipyard. She was built under the supervision of Capt. Joseph Comstock.

—— The Express says that the will of John Butler, brother to Major-Gen. Butler, has been offered for probate in the Surrogate's office in this city. He leaves an estate valued at $2,000,000, of which one-half is bequeathed to the Major-General. The particulars of the will cannot be made public till the latter part of the month, which is the first return day.

—— The Semi-Centennial Anniversary of the American Tract Society was held in the Tremont Temple, Boston, on the 25th of May, and gathered an immense audience. The annual report shows the cash receipts for the last year to be $124,500, being $17,500 in excess of the previous year. The entire amount expended for the army since the commencement of the war is $76,302. The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, the Rev. Mr. Savage, of Chicago, and other clergymen, addressed the meeting. Notwithstanding the weather, which was decidedly anniversary weather, all the meetings have been well attended, and the interest appears to be greater than in any previous year.

—— An order has been issued from the War Department forbidding the exhumation of soldiers' bodies until 1st of October next.

—— There are now only 22 Union officers confined in the Libby Prison, Richmond.

—— The solemn festival of Corpus Christi, which in the Catholic countries is always celebrated with a great display of civic, military and ecclesiastical ceremonies, was observed on the 26th May in New York with quiet solemnity Our Canadian friends, on the following Sunday, gave it more of European pomp. The procession at Montreal is, to an American, a sight such as he would not dream of beholding within two days travel from Wall street.

—— A disgraceful fight occurred in Washington, on the 25th of May, between Senator Chandler and Representative D. W. Voorhees. Chandler and Voorhees, it appears, met at the National Hotel, when Chandler called Voorhees "a Copperhead," upon which Voorhees struck him. The fight then became more general, and a friend of Voorhees broke a pitcher over Mr. Chandler's head.

—— The Fifth Annual Commencement of the Cooper Union for the Advancement of Science and Art took place on the 27th of May, before a large audience of ladies and gentlemen. The founder, Mr. Peter Cooper, presided, and Mr. Harvey Dodworth conducted the instrumental music for the occasion. Four hundred and five pupils, male and female, received certificates for regular attendance and devotion to their studies, and the following young gentlemen graduated with distinction : Messrs. Eugene Corbitt, Robert Scott, William L. Taylor, George Haitzen and William Forbes. The annual report was read by Mr. Abraham Hewitt, and from the financial statement which was given by Mr. Wilson G. Hunt it appears that the Institute is not only self-sustaining, but the funds have accumulated in the hands of the Treasurer. The exercises were very interesting, the singing by the female class being particularly excellent.

Military.—We are glad to see that the Government has resolved to purify the army, and has thus commenced. Major-Gen. Wallace announces the result of the court-martial recently convened in Baltimore for the trial of Major George Thistleton, of the 1st Maryland cavalry, that he was found guilty of the charge of "being in the habit of associating intimately and publicly with infamous women and prostitutes during the past winter and this spring, so as to bring disgrace upon himself and the service, and to subject his encampment to scenes disgusting and disreputable to his regiment," and that the sentence of the court is that he be "dismissed the service."

—— Great consternation has been created among a certain class of officers by the resolution of Gen. Grant to degrade to the ranks every officer, however high his rank, who leaves the field of battle without a satisfactory reason. It is said that after the seven days fights on the Rapidan, more than 300 officers left their posts and found their way to Washington, spreading the most alarming reports. Gen. Butler dismissed from the service on the spot a captain, who withdrew his company from a position he was told to hold.

—— The 9th New Jersey regiment suffered severely in the recent battles near Fort Darling. Among the most lamented is Col. Abraham Zabriskie, who was mortally wounded while leading on his men. Capt. Harris was also severely wounded, and is now a prisoner in Richmond.

—— A dispatch from Washington announces that the Court-martial on Surgeon-General Hammond has resulted in his conviction. Surgeon-General Hammond was arraigned on the following charges : Corruptly, fraudulently and unlawfully purchasing medical hospital stores and supplies, and falsehood.

—— Adjutant-Gen. Sprague has issued an order requesting officers of volunteer regiments from this State, who have left the service by resignation, expiration of term of service, or for other causes, to send to his headquarters their Post-office address, designating their rank and the regiments in which they served.

—— Brig.-Gens. Gibbon and Dodge have been nominated Major-Generals of Volunteers. Major-Gen. Oglesby has resigned, and Major-Gen. Buell has been mustered out. Gen. Oglesby has tendered his resignation three times, and it is accepted now for the purpose of making a vacancy for Gen. Dodge. Gen. Buell was mustered out for refusing to accept a command under Gen. Canby.

—— Lieut.-Col. Bayley, who saved the gunboat fleet by constructing a dam across the Red river, is a Wisconsin man. He entered the service as captain of company D, 4th Wisconsin regiment, July 2, 1861, was promoted to Major, May 30, 1863, to Lieut.-Col. June 15, 1863. For meritorious conduct in the field, and for highly distinguished services before Port Hudson, he was mustered in Lieut.-Col. of the 4th Wisconsin after the death of the gallant Col. Bean, who was killed in action before Port Hudson. Col. Boardman, who succeeded Col. Bean, having recently been killed in a skirmish, Col. Bayley will succeed to its command. Col. Bayley has been on the staff of Gen. Franklin since March 2, 1864, and is now Acting Engineer of the 19th army corps. His engineering qualities were obtained in the lumber regions of Wisconsin, where he learned how to navigate shallow creeks and rivers.

Obituary.—Some years ago there appeared in the Springfield Republican a series of letters from Europe, signed by "Dunn Browne," which were widely copied and much admired for their sprightly vivacity. They were from the pen of Mr. Samuel Fiske, a graduate of Amherst College, in the class of 1848, and the author of a well-known college text-book, a translation of Eschenberg's Manual of Greek and Roman Antiquities. Mr. Fiske was a clergyman, settled at Madison, Conn., when the war broke out ; but he left the pulpit for the field, and dropped the "reverend" for a lieutenant's title. After fighting bravely in the several battles, he was taken prisoner by the rebels and detained for some time in Richmond. During the battle of th e Wilderness, captain —for he was promoted from a lieutenancy—Fiske was mortally wounded. He was conveyed to Fredericksburg, where, in a private house, he received the attention of personal friends, and of his wife and other members of his family. His death has taken from the Union ranks a brave, intelligent officer ; from literary circles a lively, versatile writer, and from the newspaper world, an admirable war correspondent.

—— Col. Geo. B. Hall, of the 71st New York Vols., died on the 24th of May, in Brooklyn. He was the son of ex-Mayor Geo. Hall, of Brooklyn, and was born in New York. He entered the United States service during the war with Mexico, and was a 1st lieutenant in the 2d regiment of New York Vols., under Col. Ward Burnett. He was also chosen quartermaster, retaining that rank until Oct., 1847, when he was promoted to the captaincy of Co. A. During the Nicaraguan expedition of Gen. Walker, the deceased held the position of chief commissary, and performed his duties with credit. At the commencement of the rebellion he was chosen captain of a volunteer company from this city, and was shortly after selected as the Colonel of the 2d regiment of Gen. Sickles' Excelsior brigade. In Gen. Hooker's division he took part in nearly all the battles on the Peninsula, and has since participated in the operations of the Army of the Potomac with his brigade, until sickness disabled him from active service. His military career during the present war has been a creditable one, and he has given up his life for his country.

—— Samuel S. Maffit, late Comptroller of the Treasury of Maryland, died at his residence in Elkton on the 24th of May, aged 45 years.

—— Giacomo Meyerbeer, who died in Paris, France, on the 2d of May, was born on the 5th of Sept., 1794. As a child he was extremely precocious, and his musical talent came to him so early that when only seven years old he was celebrated ; and at nine a German critic spoke of him as one of the best pianists of Berlin. Under less favorable circumstances the lad would doubtless have been prematurely brought before the public as a prodigy, to contradict, perhaps, in manhood, the promises of his youth. But his father, James Beer, a Jew banker, was very wealthy, and Giacomo Meyerbeer, as the composer afterward called himself, Italianizing his name, only appeared occasionally, principally at amateur concerts, and had plenty of opportunities afforded him for study. With what result he availed himself of them is known throughout the world. Meyerbeer did not, however, at once obtain a high position in music. His first opera, "Jeptha's Daughter," was represented at Munich, in 1812, with but indifferent success, but the numerous works he afterwards produced, and which extended over nearly the whole range of musical composition, secured for him a wide reputation, and proved that his talents were of no common order. Of these productions the "Crociato in Egitto," produced in Venice, in 1825, may be said to have laid the foundation of his European fame. In 1831 he produced his grand work, "Robert the Devil," and henceforth Meyerbeer was recognised as a master. The "Huguenots" followed in 1836, and the "Prophète" in 1849, both operas at once taking that commanding position on the lyric stage which they have ever since maintained. "L'Etoile du Nord," a work in a different style, but distinguished by the same charm of genius, followed in 1854, and the "Pardon de Ploermel" still more recently. It has long been known that the deceased composer had finished another work, "l'Africaine," and that his scrupulous and perhaps fastidious anxiety to secure for it a satisfactory interpretation has alone kept it from the public. Its production may now, it is to be presumed, be looked for at no distant date.

—— Hon. Joshua R. Giddings, Consul-General of the United States at Montreal, died suddenly in that city on the evening of the 27th of May. He was born at Athens, Oct. 6, 1795, but removed to Ohio in 1805. He served in the war of 1812. After the close of the war he studied law with the Hon. Elisha Whittlesey, and was admitted to the bar in 1820. He was a member of the Legislature of the State of Ohio in 1826, and in 1838 was elected to Congress as the successor of Mr. Whittlesey; here he was distinguished for his steady and determined opposition to slavery and the slave trade. In 1841 an American vessel, the Creole, sailed from Virginia for New Orleans with a cargo of 136 slaves ; during the passage a revolt occurred, in which the slaves killed one man, took possession of the vessel, and entered the British port of Nassau. On the 21st of March, 1843, Mr. Giddings offered in Congress a series of resolutions, declaring that slavery was an abridgment of natural rights that the slaves in the Creole had violated no law of the United States in regaining their personal liberty, and that they were not legally liable to punishment. These resolutions brought down upon him the displeasure of the House, who, by a vote, severely condemned his conduct. Mr. Giddings then instantly resigned his seat, but was immediately reelected, and resumed his seat, after an absence of only six weeks. His whole period of service in Congress was 21 years. He was a strong supporter of Gen. Harrison and Henry Clay, but on anti-slavery grounds refused to support Gen. Taylor. In 1850 he was conspicuous for his opposition to the enactment of the "compromise measures," especially the Fugitive Slave Law. In 1843 he wrote a series of political essays, signed "Pacificus," and in 1858 he compiled The Exiles of Florida. A volume of his speeches in Congress has also been published.

Accidents and Offences.—A fire was discovered about four o'clock on the morning of the 23d May, in the basement of the Maison Dorée, in 14th street. The damage to the building is about $1,000; furniture and fixtures, $1,500. It is fully insured.

—— On Saturday night, the 21st May, the 7½ o'clock through train to Washington, ran over three horses, five miles from Trenton, killed the fireman, and injured the assistant fireman and one passenger.

—— On Saturday afternoon, the 21st May, a Jew, name unknown, attended the funeral of his sister, Mrs. Rachel Lazarus, who was buried in the burial ground in 88th street, between 4th and 5th avenues; while standing over the grave he became very much excited, and, drawing a revolver, shot himself with such effect as to produce death almost immediately.

—— The express train going North, on the Cleveland, Columbus and Cincinnati railroad, was thrown off the track, near Crestline, on the 21st May. Mr. De Witt, of the firm of Younglove & De Witt, of Cleveland, was killed, and a number of others injured—none seriously.

—— The Kohnstamm case, which had occupied the attention of the court since Tuesday, the 17th, was concluded on Saturday, the 21st May, and resulted in the conviction of the accused of the crime of which he was charged, and for which he was indicted. There are 46 indictments against him which remain undisposed of, and it is understood that the case will go up on appeal.

Art, Science and Literature.—A letter from Rome says: "Miss Hosmer is engaged on a group of a Sleeping Fawn, whom a faunetto (young faun) is tying to a stump of a tree. It is a charming composition, full of spirit and character, and will greatly increase her reputation. The attack upon Miss Hosmer in the Art Journal and the Queen was infamous, but she will live it down.

"Tilton is painting some beautiful landscapes, and is, I am most happy to find, laden with orders.

"Story has remodelled his Cleopatra, making many changes and improvements. Keeping to the same general conception, he has worked it out to a more elaborate and artistic completeness, embodying, as I think, all his artistic growth of the five years which have elapsed since the production of the first Cleopatra. He has also modelled a bust of Mrs. Browning, from memory, for her brother, which he has succeeded in rendering pleasing, without losing the characteristic likeness. This artist's Saul is going on rapidly, and is to go to London with Judith this week. His Bacchus and Venus follow shortly to the same destination."

Foreign.—London swindlers have a new method of thieving. They send a parcel of books addressed to any rich person who died the day before, and carefully selected according to his or her supposed tastes, with an invoice as from a respectable publisher. Messenger waits for the money, which the relatives pay without inquiry, under the circumstances always connected with a recent death. The invoice always contains trifling mistakes, such as charging four times the price of the books, and making the total come out rather larger than a good arithmetician would make it.

—— Fifty-two persons are to play a game of cards at the French Imperial Court, each one to represent a card. They should be selected for their activity in cutting and shuffling, or else there will be a difficulty in manipulating such an army. The anomaly will be, they will be all court cards, as the representatives of the fifty-two cards will be all court personages. The four aces and four queens will be represented by ladies ; hearts and clubs by young ladies ; spades and diamonds by matrons, though wherefore we know not ; the four kings elderly gents ; and the four knaves by juveniles, whose age vouches for their innocence.

—— The work of restoring the great cathedral of Notre Dame at Paris has resulted in some interesting historical discoveries. In lowering the soil around it remains of Roman houses were found, and the outline of the foundations of an old church which centuries ago stood here, dedicated to St. Christopher, as well as the plan of another church near by, dedicated to St. Stephen. Several marble columns, with fine Corinthian capitals, have also been unearthed.

—— In Prussia, not long since, there occurred an interesting case of detection of crime by scientific means. A quantity of gold, packed in boxes, was dispatched by a railway train. On arriving at its destination it was discovered that the gold had been stolen from some of the boxes, which were refilled with sand to make up for the deficient weight. Measures were at once taken for the discovery of the thief, and that no chance might be lost Professor Ehrenberg was requested to make a microscopic examination of the sand. The professor—who is a member of the Academy of Sciences at Berlin, well known for his researches into minute objects, and his comparison of volcanic dust from all parts of the world—asked that a quantity of sand from every station by which the train had passed should be sent to him. Examining these, one after another, he at last came to a sand which was identical with that found in the gold boxes. The name of the station whence this sand had been collected was known, inquiries were set on foot at that station, and among the persons there employed the thief was detected. The incident is one which an expert novel writer might make use of with effect.

Odds and Ends.—In Secessia they give a man liable to do military duty so many days' furlough for every recruit he brings in. One conscript went to work and procured enough men to entitle him to a furlough from Gen. Lee of 8,210 days, which is over 22 years.

—— Dr. Read reports to the Sanitary Commission from Nashville that preparations are making to build army hospitals on Lookout mountain, and that Gen. Thomas recommends the planting of a garden on the top of the mountain.

—— At the very moment when Gen. Wadsworth fell on the field of battle, extensive preparations were being made in Troy to celebrate the marriage of his only son with one of the most accomplished and beautiful ladies of that city.

—— Four military posts in the North-West, by general orders of the War Department, have been named in honor of Gens. Wadsworth, Hays, Stevenson and Rice, slain in the recent battles in Virginia. Thirty-six have been killed in battle during the rebellion, and 15 died of diseases contracted in the service.

—— The Washington Republican gets off the following: "The rebel capital is in a carpetbag, is in Jeff Davis's hand, and Jeff Davis is usually, during active operations, in a special car on a railroad. Wherever Jeff and the carpetbag are, there is the rebel capital."

—— The Buffalo Express has the following watchword and prayer for these momentous days: "God—Grant—Victory."

—— The arrival of Com. Maury, of the Confederate privateer Georgia, at Richmond, is noted, after an absence of 16 months.

FOREIGN NEWS.

In England the chief topic was the ultra-liberal speech of Mr. Gladstone, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had, in a recent debate on Parliamentary Reform, advocated Manhood Suffrage. Some supposed this to be an ingenious method of escaping from the popular odium, under which he now labors, for his surreptitious behavior in the Garibaldi imbroglio, which had so deeply roused public indignation as to compel him to give an explanation to a deputation from the Working Men's Association. The interview was chiefly remarkable for the stride it evidences in Ministerial dependency upon the people, which necessitated such a step, and from the Jesuitical nature of Mr. Gladstone's explanation. The Danish Conference was in a state of feeble progress, the only good it having achieved being an armistice for one month, from the 12th of May, between the belligerents. The naval engagement between the Germans and the Danes, o the 9th May, proved to be more humiliating for the former than was supposed, since the Austrian ships had to take shelter under the guns of the British fortress of Heligoland, to escape either capture or destruction. The fact that, when the victory was announced in the House of Commons, both sides should receive the news with loud cheers is very significant, and shows that Palmerston must adopt a more vigorous policy.

In France the feeling was also very strongly in favor of the Danes, but this results more from the national craving to create an opportunity to seize the Rhine than from any other wish to assist a weaker Power.

The Russian official paper states that England and Russia are decided and identical on their policy in the Danish question—the integrity of that kingdom will be preserved. There is considerable ill-feeling between the French and Russian Courts, on account of the very ostentatious manner in which the occupation of Paris by the allies in 1814 was recently celebrated at St. Petersburg.

Maximilian had touched at Madeira on his route to Mexico. The Mexican Loan had turned out to be a great failure, as the British press discouraged it. It was generally conceded that the Mexican Empire would tax the abilities of Napoleon and Maximilian to sustain it. The French journals are very jubilant over the alleged condemnation by Mr. Seward of the Congressional declaration touching Louis Napoleon's invasion of Mexico. They pretend it means a recognition of the Empire, when it only says that, while the vote represents the national feeling, it cannot take effect without the Executive, which at present will do nothing.

BOOK NOTICES.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN. By JAMES PARTON. Two vols., 8vo. New York : Mason, Brothers, 1864.

Literary men have long been aware that Mr. Parton, the most thorough and accomplished writer in the field o biography in our day, was conscientiously laboring on a life of Franklin. A real biography of one who occupied so prominent a position has long been needed, the autobiography of Franklin himself having in a manner prevented by its popularity all attempts to write his life.

Mr. Parton has a wonderful talent for the field which he has chosen. He takes his character up with sufficient enthusiasm to give his narrative interest, yet not to warp his judgment. He is essentially impartial, and handling his theme with a masterly hand, has given us a work that must take place in almost every household in the country.

THE LITTLE REBEL. Boston : Tilton.

All our new juveniles, juveniles that seem to catch the public taste, must savor of the war. This aroma seems necessary. The Little Rebel, has, however, only the title. It is a good story of the trials of a step-son, which with the amusing confusion of the two Dromios—David Vane and David Crane—make the story a very interesting one to the young.

THE WOMAN IN BLACK. By the Author of the "Man in Gray." Philadelphia : T. B. Peterson and Bro., 1864.

This is a popular novel, highly endorsed. The plot is well conceived, and the chief character very well drawn. There are defects in style and treatment, but it will be read and liked. The story is that of a sharp, handsome, unscrupulous dependent cousin, who has determined to obtain the hand of her noble relative, and shrinks at no crime to accomplish it. The interest is very well sustained, the pictures of life well drawn.

THE PORTRAIT MONTHLY, containing Sketches of Departed Heroes and Prominent Personages of the Present Time, Interesting Stories, &c. Vol. I., 4to., 188 pp. New York : T. B. Leggett and Co., 1864.

Biography always interests, and this work, while not pretending to be elaborate or exhaustive, is a cheap and attractive work, giving more than 200 portraits of prominent men of the time, in civil and military life, with biographical sketches prepared with care.

It contains also other interesting and entertaining matter, and cannot fail to please the public. As a book of reference for sketches of the men daily spoken of, it is valuable to all who have not made a biographical dictionary for themselves, and who has?

AFFECTION IN A BADGER.—As two persons passed through a hollow way, in company with a dog, the animal started and killed a badger. Being only a little way from a village, they agreed to drag him there, as the authorities of the district gave a reward for every badger destroyed. They twisted some twigs, and drew him along the road by turns. They had not proceeded far when they heard the cry of an animal in seeming distress, and stopping to see whence it proceeded, observed another badger approaching. They endeavored to drive it away with stones, but it would not be repulsed; it came close to the dead animal and began to lick it, continuing its mournful cry. The men had it not in their hearts any longer to repulse him, but still drew the dead one along. The other laid himself down upon his companion's body, clasping it closely, and was thus drawn into the village, where, to the shame of its inhabitants, it was speedily destroyed.

THE WATER OF THE DEAD SEA.—A French gentleman publishes a paper on the composition of the water of the Dead Sea, showing that it contains about 9½ per cent. of the choloride of magnesia, 6 per cent. of chloride of sodium, 3 per cent. of chloride of calcium, 1½ per cent. of chloride of potassium, and traces of bromide of magnesium, sulphate of lime, hydrochlorate of ammonia, carbonate of lime, oxide of iron, alumina, and 79½ per cent. of pure water.

A LAD, ten years old, ran away from home and went to a tavern, where he was found by a friend with a cigar in his mouth.

"What made you leave home?" inquired his friend.

"Oh," said he, "father and mother were so saucy, I couldn't stand it; so I quit them."

TWIN VISIONS.

BY A. F. BANKS.

THE YOUNG WIFE'S DREAM.

A rosy, girl-woman, a flower of the West,
Had a rapt, blissful vision of one fair away,
(She dreamt it from midnight till dawn of the day),
And it all was about the young soldier she'd blest.

She dreamt he was near her, his dark eye beamed o'er her,
She felt his warm breath 'mid her tresses of gold;
The spell of her slumbers alone seemed to thrall her
From clasping her first, only love, as of old.

THE POSTMAN'S SOLUTION.

And her dream was a true one; with cheek Joy aglow,
She read how her dear one, on that very night
(While on Death-dealing picket till morn's graying light),
Had a sweet Waking Dream—not of fierce prowling foe,
No of deadly assault, not of mangled and slain—
'Twas his Mary's neat chamber the Patriot Dream-trod,
His Foe was the Slumber he would not profane,
And he guarded the Heart he loved next to his God.

CHAPTER I.

IT was a wild, wet, dreary and altogether disagreeable November morning that I rose from the breakfast table, and turning to the window, looked forth rather anxiously to see if the weather showed any signs of improvement. The appearance of the dripping eaves and leaden-hued sky was not encouraging. Mother Earth was taking her annual autumnal showerbath, and all her pleasant colors had been pretty much washed out under the operation. I turned away and commenced making preparations for my long walk in the rain—for a schoolteacher's duties must be performed whether the sky smiles or frowns.

"Is it absolutely necessary that you should go to the village this morning, Lillian?" inquired my mother. "Surely Mr. Myers might dispense with your services while this storm continues."

"Quite impossible, mamma. He has his hands full as it is, for the school is large, and to be absent from my post were to insure my instant dismissal. But don't fret about me, ma chere mère. I don't mind about the walk at all, and with my overshoes, waterproof cloak and an umbrella I shall be quite dry and comfortable."

"You always look at the bright side, Lillian," said my mother, with a sigh, as she passed her hand caressingly over the thick braids of my blonde hair. "What would your poor father have said could he have foreseen the life of hardship and privation that his darling must endure?"

He would have said, mama, that he was glad his daughter had sufficient pride and energy to earn her own living, and not be dependent on others."

"Ah, child, had you possessed less pride, and more ambition, you might now have been placed far above the necessity of such drudgery." I colored deeply as my mother's remark, but pretended to be too busy clasping my cloak to notice it. "You are very like your father, Lillian," she continued, "and you inherit all his beauty; the pure Saxon type for which the whole family of Moores are distinguished. You have the dazzlingly fair complexion, the violet-blue eyes and the lustrous hair, wavering betwixt gold and brown—"

"Oh, mama!" I interrupted, "modesty won't allow me to listen to any more; you will make me insufferably vain at this rate;" and kissing her cheek and bidding her good-bye, I ran off gaily, exchanging the inner warmth and comfort for the damp atmosphere of the outer world.

There were no repining thoughts in my heart as I wended my way through the mist and mire to the distant schoolhouse. I never shared my mother's regrets at our altered fortunes, or thought it hard that, like the great mass of my fellow-beings, I was condemned to earn my daily bread by my daily toil. I had youth, health and energy, and gloried in my power to help myself and others. After the bankruptcy and sudden death of my father some years before, his brother, my uncle John Moore, offered to provide for me so far as giving me an education was concerned.

My mother gladly accepted this offer, and for three years I attended the best seminary that the country afforded, at my wealthy uncle's expense. When I graduated he offered to receive me into his family as his daughter, but I promptly, though gratefully, declined a home that my mother could not share, and returning to Millbank, obtained a situation as assistant teacher in the high school of the village.

The Freshet.

I liked the profession I had chosen, for it insured me independence, was attached to my pupils, and, as I said before, indulged in no vain regrets for the loss of the luxurious home of my childhood.

I reached the foot of the long lane, where a gate opened on a nicely gravelled path leading through private grounds to the high road of the village. Here I paused and hesitated. All summer I had been in the habit of using this byway, but for the past three or four weeks I had avoided it. Should I avail myself of it now, and thus cut short my two miles walk by nearly one-half? I would gladly do so were I sure that I should not encounter the proprietor of the place. Not that the owner of Ellerslie (so the estate was called) objected to the use of this private road as a thoroughfare; he was liberal in the extreme, and the right of way through his grounds was open to all in the neighborhood who chose to avail themselves of the privilege. But I had my own private reasons for wishing to avoid a collision with him. A glance at the heavy-folded clouds, threatening a deluge of rain, decided me to run the risk, and pushing open the gate I entered the enclosure and took the well-known path. I had advanced but a few rods when the sound of hoofstrokes in the distance warned me that I was probably about to meet the very personage I had been anxious to avoid. I bit my lips with vexation, but it was too late to retreat. The next moment the steed and his rider were in sight.

The animal was as splendid a specimen of the genus horse as ever gladdened the heart of a lover of the equine race. Coalblack in hue, with a white star blazing in the centre of his forehead; his glossy coat shone like satin, and his flowing mane almost swept the ground, which he trod daintily, arching his graceful neck as though proud of the burden that he bore. Of the rider I will only say that he was worthy of his steed, of whom he seemed part and parcel, so perfect was his seat in the saddle.

I had caressed Black Ralph, the horse, a hundred times, and he knew the touch of my hand and the tone of my voice, as well as he did those of his master, but I felt no inclination to gratify him by my notice at that time. As they neared me I stepped aside to let them pass, and in doing so involuntarily lifted my eyes.

The rider doffed his cap and bowed low; but no smile lighted up his dark, haughty, handsome face, or softened the smouldering fire in the dark eyes, that were fixed full on me with a stern, repellent look that roused all the resentful pride in my nature. I inclined my head slightly, in answer to his salutation, and passed on at a quickened pace, my cheeks burning so hotly that not even the chill, scalding mist, beating full in my face, could cool their feverish glow.

A turn in the path gave to view the mansion-house of Ellerslie, crowning the summit of a gentle entrance, a quarter of a mile distant. I could see the broad, sweeping carriage drives that led away to the stables, the stately elm-bordered avenue, and the parklike expanse of ground, dotted here and there with forest trees, that swept away on either hand.

The house itself was of stone, many-gabled, with quaint chimneys, and bay windows, and shooting-in porticoes and piazzas. I am no student of art, and know not to what order of architecture it belongs, Gothic, Ionic or Composite; but it was an imposing pile of masonry, and accorded well with the grand and picturesque character of the scenery by which it was surrounded.

Save beneath a summer sky, with the golden sunlight flickering through those dense masses of foliage, with such wondrous effects of light and shade; or when September had flung out her gorgeous, many-hued banner from the forest trees, and crimsoned the vines that draped her front and side of the building, till their long tendrils looked like blood-red streamers waving in the breeze, the whole place bore an aspect of sternness that reminded one of fairyland. But now, with a leaden sky overhead, a brown and barren earth below, and the leafless boughs of giant trees, looking so like the gaunt arms of mighty skeletons flung up in terror or supplication towards the heavens, the sombre and desolate character of the scene affected my imagination painfully. Something, it might have been conscience, whispered to my ear, a living type of its owner's fate, as it sat and a pang of self-reproach smote my heart and chased the angry color from my cheeks.

CHAPTER II.

OLD Squire MacAlpine, the former owner of Ellerslie, had died suddenly, while his nephew and heir, MacAlpine, was abroad, making the tour of Europe. After the old man's decease the mansion, in which "free-hearted hospitality" used to preside, was closed up and left in silence and solitude for two years. At the end of that time the young heir returned from foreign parts, bringing home with him his beautiful Italian bride. The bridal party accompanied the newly-wedded pair, and once more the halls of Ellerslie rang to the music of song and joyous voices. A succession of fêtes followed. There were picnics in the grand old woods that bordered the estate, boating parties on the beautiful mountain lake, and equestrian excursions to the many charming and picturesque localities in the vicinity of Millbank. So passed the summer months in mirth and festivity, and with the first frosts of autumn the visitors departed. But ere the mellow and rich-hued leaf, or the beech doffed its golden coronet, sin, and shame, and sorrow had taken up their abode at Ellerslie.

The fair but frail wife of Hugh MacAlpine fled, in the silence and darkness of night, from the home she had deserted and the husband she had dishonored. The companion of her flight was a young naval officer who had been a summer guest at Ellerslie. The outraged husband pursued the guilty pair, but he reached the distant city whither they had fled only to learn that they had escaped his vengeance by embarking the previous day for Europe. But the ill-fated steamer in which they took passage never reached her destined port. She was the victim of one of those fearful collisions at sea which chill the hearer's blood with horror, going down with her helpless freight of human beings amid the thick darkness of midnight, while the fearful howling of the storm drowned the shrieks of despair that rose from their decks. A few floating fragments of the wreck, a boat overturned, with the word "Albion" painted on her stern, were all that was left when morning broke to tell the melancholy tale.

Hugh MacAlpine returned to his desolate home, and for two years lived almost the life of a hermit, avoiding as much as possible the society of his fellow-men, and leaving his retirement only when the transaction of business connected with his estate rendered it absolutely necessary for him to do so. But the second year of his sojourn there a fatal epidemic broke out in the village of Millbank, sweeping off scores of its inhabitants. So many were prostrated by disease, that there were not enough left in health to tend the sick and bury the dead. Then the master of Ellerslie came forth once more, and forgot his own sorrows in his efforts to alleviate the sufferings of others. Day and night he watched by the bedside of the sick and dying, ministering to their wants and relieving the necessities of their families. Time, money and personal effort were lavished freely, and he well earned the title of "Good Samaritan" which was bestowed upon him. When the pestilence abated and men breathed freely once more he did not return to his former solitary life, but more of the gloom that had so long oppressed him, and once more mingled freely with his fellows.

He was universally beloved and esteemed, though sometimes, in allusion to the stately courtesy of his manners—the MacAlpines were always a proud race—he was jestingly entitled "Sir Hugh" or the "the Lord of Ellerslie" by his more democratic neighbors.

The most of these events occurred during my three years absence from home, and were related to me by my mother after my return, some four or five months previous to the commencement of my tale.

I had been at home scarcely a week when we were surprised by a call from Mr. MacAlpine. He was our landlord, the pretty, vine-covered cottage in which we lived being his property, and he called to speak to my mother about some needed repairs on the outbuildings. I was present at the interview, but did not open my lips after the first few words of greeting; for I felt something like awe in the presence of that grave, stately, aristocratic-looking man, whose searching glances seemed to penetrate the very thoughts of those with whom he conversed. More than once, on looking up from my sewing, I encountered those dark, unfathomable eyes fixed full on my face, and felt my color rise beneath that earnest gaze.

My mother noticed his glances and my confusion, and after his departure expatiated warmly on his many noble and generous qualities, with some guarded allusions to his great wealth. I think she had already begun to form a château en Espagne in my behalf. Somehow our landlord found it necessary to call on us a great many times in the course of the summer. At first some little matter of business served as an excuse for these visits, but at length he ceased to offer any pretext but his own inclination, and came and went, a pleasure.

Having discovered my fondness for flowers, he rarely dropped without a choice bouquet from the gardens or conservatory of Ellerslie reaching our cottage. Then he began to join me in my rambles around the village after school-hours were over. Dismounting from his horse, he would walk by my side, with the bridle thrown over his arm, spending the distance by pleasant talk, stopping occasionally to gather wild flowers, which I would playfully twine with the glossy raven mane. Shy and reserved at first in his society, I found it impossible long to withstand the fascination of the many accomplishments and talents he possessed and unrestrained in his presence. My heart had already learned to beat quicker at his approach, and I felt that such a state of affairs was keeping altogether had not an unfortunate misunderstanding occurred between us, which resulted in our estrangement forever.

It happened at a nutting-party, held one sunny October afternoon, in those glorious old woods which I have before mentioned. Many of the more youthful portion of Millbank were present on the occasion, and the hours sped by with song and laughter, and unrestrained merriment. It so chanced, in the course of the day, that the Lord of Ellerslie chose to take offence at the way in which I conducted myself. Frank Wollaston, a gay, gallant Frank Wollaston, the pet and plaque of all the ladies of his acquaintance, the dearest good-for-nothing that ever lived, was a second cousin, and had been like brother and sister to each other from childhood. But of course my lord was not aware of this.

On this particular occasion, Frank, actuated, I think, by a spirit of mirthful malice towards my quondam admirer, had chosen to make me the object of his most devoted attentions, all of which I received in the most quiet, matter-of-course way, thinking it quite natural that they were raising in the breast of Sir Hugh, until, on lifting my head, which had been bent over my basket of chestnuts, Frank had insisted on fastening in my hair, I encountered a pair of flashing, dark eyes fixed on my face with a stern, reproachful look, and was, by the lowering brow and compressed lips, what a storm was gathering in that quarter. There was something so absurd in the idea of my mother's cousin Frank, that I felt even more amused than annoyed at his unguarded display of the passion which evidently took no part in our amusement, the subject. To cap the climax of his audacity, Frank raised my hand to his lips with an exaggerated expression of devotion as he released me and left carriage which was to convey me home. I bore this infliction with equanimity, and did not box his ears for his pains, as I might under other circumstances, for I saw that the action had been observed by a pair of eyes that were watching my every movement.

Mr. MacAlpine called that evening, and rather a stormy scene ensued between us. He commenced by demanding an explanation of my conduct that day in so haughty and offensive a tone that my pride was up in arms at once. I was a mere child, not generally resent the assumption of a proper amount of authority on the part of a lover. In fact, it is felt to be rather a flattering proof they wish; our sex are submissive by nature, and prefer being ruled to ruling; but was to him who, in his arrogance, shall presume to assume control in the first verge of tyranny. On this occasion I coolly but emphatically denied Sir Hugh's right to call me to account for my actions, and told him plainly that he asked for. His anger blazed out then in fierce, sarcastic words. He accused me of the most heinous crimes, and declared that from the moment I was neither better nor worse than the rest of my sex; they were all alike heartless, and he was a heinous fool and deceived one, but that after having been once so fatally deceived he could have been led a second time to place faith in a woman; he would not have deemed it worthy, as a just punishment for such stupendous folly.

I knew it was the memory of the bitter wrong he had endured at the hands of one woman that made him so unjust to all others, and I heard his accusation in silence, attempting no defence of myself or my sex, confident that, in a moment more, that conscience would present the truth before him more effectually than I could do it. He ignored my silence for sullenness, and left me in a state haughty and bitter mood. He did not come near me for three days, during which time I experienced all our gaie while his master lingered within, and I had no companion now in my homeward walks but my village.

People said that Squire MacAlpine was growing gloomy and unsocial once more, and appeared like as he did in those two years following his wife's desertion. My mother mourned over our estrangement. I believe she had set her heart on seeing me the mistress of Ellerslie, but its master avoided me, as I did him, until our accidental meeting that November morning.

CHAPTER III.

I REACHED school in due season, but my engagement with the Lord of Ellerslie had not tended to tranquillize my feelings, and I was far from being in a comfortable frame of mind through the day. I did not love Hugh MacAlpine, at least I was not conscious of entertaining such a sentiment for him, but I was by no means satisfied either with myself or my treatment of him. I might, had I chosen, have accepted and softened that haughty but noble nature; I might have drawn the poisoned arrow of jealousy from the heart in which it had so long rankled, and taught him anew the lesson of faith in woman's constancy and purity; but I might have known that the task would be one of infinite difficulty, and I was far from being equal to the heroism of self-sacrifice. I had confidence in myself, and was conscious of my power, but I was not prepared to undertake so much as that. I had no desire to sacrifice myself on the altar of another's selfishness, and I hurried on my way, hoping to reach my home unobserved by my haughty lover again. The storm had been of several days duration, and great quantities of rain had fallen. I found the roads and pathways of fresh-water in different places, and expressing apprehensions of a similar visitation. As I neared the river on my homeward path with a vague dread that their fears were realised. The swollen stream had burst its bounds, and just below the bridge it had overflowed a large tract of land, forming for the time a miniature lake. Through the centre of this flowed the turbid torrent, bearing off on its broom great quantities of wood, the dead boughs of trees, floating islands of sawdust and all manner of debris. I paused and gazed on the scene for a few moments with a vague sense of alarm, for there is something in an exhibition of the untamed forces of nature that always awakens a kindred thrill in my own breast.

A cotton factory and two or three sawmills were situated on the stream at some distance above the bridge. As I looked in that direction, I perceived that the water was rushing over the dam with a force and volume that I had never seen equalled. A crowd of men and boys were gathered on the bank, near the mills, running to and fro, seemingly much excited, while, from their loud tones and eager gestures as they pointed down the river, I concluded that something was wrong in that direction. After watching them a few moments I turned to cross the bridge, when I saw that it shook and trembled in every timber, and seemed to bend and sway to the rushing current that threatened to overwhelm it every moment. It was a slight ornamental structure, intended only for foot passengers, and had been built by the owner of Ellerslie for the accommodation of himself and such of his neighbors as chose to avail themselves of a nearer route to the village than by the public road. I contemplated a moment whether I should trust myself to this frail causeway or turn back and take the longer and more circuitous route. But to do the last I must go half a mile out of my way, and I decided to risk crossing where I was. Smiling a little at my unnecessary cowardice, I stepped boldly on to the bridge, which seemed actually to rock beneath my feet. I had nearly gained the centre when I was startled by the cry of a human in the village, and looking up in the vicinity of the mills I drew my eyes in that direction, and I saw that which blanched my cheek and chained me to the spot, while I was paralyzed by terror that I could neither advance nor recede.

The dam had given way, and the whole body of water, with a deafening noise, was bearing down towards the bridge with such tremendous force that the great logs and beams of the dam carried along with it were shivered and shattered, tossed and whirled about like so many nutshells. There was no time for action, scarcely even for thought, for it had been caught in the grasp of death, the roar like that of a wild beast darting on its prey, the vast volume of water and the struggling mass of timber and debris against the bridge, which shrank and quivered like a live creature beneath the blow.

There came a terrific crash; the beams and girders of the bridge snapped like dried twigs; the structure parted midway, swayed to and fro for a moment, and then was nearly round into the current, and floated off, a mass of ruins. Instinctively tearing off my cloak from my limbs, at the first moment of peril, I grasped the railing of the bridge and clung to it for life. Blinded by the spray, deafened by the roar, gasping for breath, submerged almost to the waist in the icecold water, I was borne along in the swirling flood, only half conscious for some minutes, of the full terror of my situation. When I could see and breathe a little more freely, I looked eagerly around me, but there was nothing within my reach prospect. I was in the midst of a wild, surging waste of waters, thickly strewn by the spoils and wreckage of the bridge and in its way. Heavy piles of boards, huge logs and beams, young trees, torn up by the roots, fences swept away, and I myself was the only living.

I glanced anxiously towards the shore to see if there was hope of rescue in that quarter, but I could discern no one. I tried to cry out, but my feeble voice was drowned in the mingled roar of wind and wave. I snatched the scarf from my neck, and waved it above my head as a signal of distress. Apparently it attracted attention, for I heard answering shouts, and presently saw several men running along the bank. They waved their hands and gesticulated to me, but the distance was too great for me to catch their words, and I was borne along with a velocity that soon swept me from their sight.

The wreck to which I clung rolled and pitched so badly that every moment threatened to bury me beneath the waves. Occasionally a log would plunge against its sides with such violence that it seemed impossible to escape going down at once, and I held my breath with terror until the danger was past. Still on and on I floated. How long could this continue? Every wave lifted my feet from the planks beneath them, and my desperate grasp on the railing never relaxed. But my hands were growing benumbed, and I doubted my power to retain my hold much longer.

Suddenly a terrible thought flashed through my brain. The Rapids! I was nearing them fast; only a mile or two more, in a bend of the river, and was this fate of speed a few minutes would place me within their vortex. I shuddered with horror as thought how my lifeless form would be torn and mangled on those cruel rocks, and then I prayed. That fervent, agonizing supplication that the human soul sends up in extremity, when the frail barriers that divide it from the unseen world are about to be broken down for ever, burst from my lips, "Be merciful to me, O God!" I was calmer after that, and tried to accept my fate with resignation. It was useless to fight with the flood, and felt in that fearful hour. The sufferings of a lifetime may be crowded into a few moments, but the human tongue was given can depict them fully.

My straining gaze could already discern in the distance the long white line of foam that marked the Rapids. I closed my eyes with a last shudder, and awaited passively the coming doom. I opened them again the next moment, for the wreck of which I clung had struck with violence full against some opposing obstacle, and after careering for a minute or two in a frightful manner it became stationary. The sudden stop of the part took away my breath, and almost wrenched me from my hold, but on recovering a little I found that the barrier that opposed my progress was a gigantic basswood tree. It had stood on the bank of the river, and the trunk, undermined by it, had borne along with it this lord of the forest. The great size of the tree and the mass of earth that clung to its roots had formed a dam to the water swept off by the current. One end of my raft had caught between its thick branches, and was thus held fast. Thanking God again for my escape postponed for a little while at least, and my eyes once more turned shoreward for the hoped-for help. Alas! alas! it seemed that it was not to be before the crowd that had followed along the bank appeared again in sight. They shouted when they saw my signals, but appeared quite unable of doing anything to assist me. From their eager gestures I concluded that they were convinced that they were at a loss what to do, and did not feel myself capable of giving directions. I felt an emotion of despair creeping over my whole frame, and then I guessed its cause. The boats had been swept away, and there was no means of reaching me. Again I looked along the bank, and saw that I had abandoned myself to the fate which, for a few moments, I had hoped to escape.

The men were standing itself loose again; the tide swung it back and forth, and it was evident that it would soon break from its bonds.

One by one the logs and my frail dam was sealed. Hark! what sound is that? Had my peril sharpened my senses, or did I hear with the inward ear? Yes, I heard it outward ear! I knew well, but above all the roar and rush of waters, above the groaning and grinding of the timbers, above the shouts of men on the bank, clear and distinct to my ear came the sharp click of a horse's hoof dashing over the gravelled path that wound around the base of the hill.

Ere horse or horseman were in sight my heart told me that it was the rider would prove, and oh, never yet came music to my ear so sweet as the rhyme of Black Ralph's hoofs!

Nearer and nearer they came, and I saw Hugh MacAlpine rein in his steed on the bank, and fling up his hand in token of encouragement. The men gathered around him, but he waved them off impatiently, while his eagle eye seemed to take in every detail of the scene at a single glance. There was no time to be lost. Every log, every uprooted by the merciless force of the waves, was crushing and tearing its way through the stout limbs of the tree. Its branches—comparatively slender—would set it free, and once more in the power of that bold rider there would no human soul could avail.

He evidently comprehended all this instinctively, but what would he do to aid me? Could he plunge into the water under the current? I saw him rise in his stirrups and fling off his coat, then he caressed Black Ralph, and, bending over, whispered in his ear. The noble steed, with a ringing shout he loosened the rein, and the noble steed sprang forward with a bound, and plunged boldly into the surging flood. How gallantly he breasted the waves; tossing them aside as if in scorn, yet obedient to the lightest touch of those iron hands, and the fondest tone of master's voice. Onward, straight as an arrow; they were nearing me fast, but would they reach me before the frail support that held me broke? Not so long was deserting me now. My stiffened fingers still clutched convulsively the railing, but there was a strange numbness before my eyes, my head drooped, and my heart seemed to cease its beating. A roar in my ears drowned the sluggish blood coursing through my veins once more.

"Lillian, darling, are you dying? speak to me!"

The mist vanished from my eyes; I could not speak, but I looked up and answered the speaker with a smile. The sight of his face, the sound of his voice had given me new life.

Loose your hold," he said, as he stretched out his arms to receive me, but I was powerless to obey. The strained muscles refused to relax their tension. He saw my helplessness, and stipping from the saddle, stepped cautiously on to the wreck, and with some difficulty unclasped my hands; then he took me in his arms and lifted me to the saddle.

"Black Ralph cannot bear the weight of both, but I will swim by your side," he said. "Can you keep your seat?"

A shock by head, and motioned to the scarf about my neck. He understood me, and drawing it off fastened me securely to the steed. Then he turned the horse's head shoreward, and with the reins secured to his wrist struck out boldly for the land. We had nearly gained the bank, already the horse's feet touched bottom, and he flung up his head with a joyous neigh. The men cheered and extended their arms to assist us, when a heavy plank came whirling and spinning down the tide. Black Ralph saw it and swerved aside, but it struck his master full in the breast. He threw up his arms, struggled wildly for a moment, then sank like lead. I gave one cry of surprise, and the whole scene vanished from my sight.

CHAPTER IV.

WHEN I struggled painfully back to consciousness I was being borne in men's arms to my mother's door. It was Frank Wollaston on whose shoulder my head rested. I raised it feebly, and looked eagerly around. The question that trembled on my lips was answered the next moment. Several men were bearing the body of my father, on which lay extended the form of my preserver. I caught one glance of the deathly face, and the crimson stain coming slowly from the wound in his side, and then insensibility mercifully came again to my relief.

Days and weeks of illness followed. I think I was delirious a part of the time, but at length I began slowly to recover. My first question, when I could understand what was going around me, was of Hugh MacAlpine, and my mother hastened to relieve my anxiety regarding him.

He was beneath the same roof with me, having been brought there in the first instance as the nearest place at which medical assistance could be procured, and then my mother had insisted on his remaining that she might herself nurse him back to health. He had been severely—it was thought at first fatally—injured in the chest, the ribs were pronounced by the physician to be out of danger, and my mother added in conclusion that he was recovering as rapidly he had a right to be able to leave his room before I did mine.

How fervently I thanked God for the mercy that had spared me the intolerable anguish my death would have occasioned me. In that hour of fearful peril I had learned the secret of my heart, and knew that I loved him well. And now I only asked to be permitted to devote to his happiness the life that he had preserved. Despite my mother's prediction, I was first able to leave my room, one morning she dressed me with more than usual care, and having arranged my hair to her satisfaction, offered, well pleased, to assist in quite a parlour than I was prepared. Having laid me into the room, she retreated, and closing the door, left me alone with Hugh MacAlpine.

He sat in an easy chair, enveloped in the folds of a crimson dressing-gown. How pale and changed he was! The jetty masses of hair swept back from his broad, serious forehead, and the dark, curling beard increasing his pallor by their contrast. A glad light broke over his face as he saw who was last enter, and rising hastily, before I could prevent him, he took my hand and leading me to the sofa seated himself beside me, still retaining my hand in his. I am not much given to tears or sentiment, and on this occasion I meant to be very calm, expressing my gratitude in the strongest terms, but guarding carefully against the betrayal of my warmer sentiment. But I was weaker than I thought, and the warm clasp of his hand, the softened look in his proud eyes, and the tone in which he pronounced my name, were too much for my composure. I attempted to speak, but choked, broke down entirely, and then, womanlike, burst into tears. I shall not tell with what gentle and loving words he soothed me, but I had grown very humble and childlike in my weakness, and when he asked me to bestow on him for life the hand he held in his own, I answered frankly that, as my heart already belonged to him, my hand might as well accompany it; only, I added, thinking through my tears, that he must promise never to give way to jealousy again; and with something warmer and sweeter than a smile, he assured me that that demon was effectually exorcised from his bosom.

I am the mistress of Kilcraig now, and my husband's eyes never wears its olden gloom in these days. I will only add that never was horse so petted and caressed as is Black Ralph by both master and mistress.

A WONDERFUL HINDOO HEAD.—The owner of it is between 45 and 50 years of age. He plays three games of cards at one time, blindfold, and wins them. At the same time he plays a game of cards—there are 110 different cards in a Hindoo pack—and wins that at the time when these games are going on he is given only sums of multiplication to the extent of four figures (e. g. 9997×9999) and gives the correct result. At the same time a audience of about 50 persons are each being numbered, is given to him irregularly (38 if, 97 but, 61 pitcher, etc.), and he gives the whole sentence, during the games a bell is touched every one or two seconds, and he gives the number of times it has been touched. A man stands behind and throws little pebbles, one by one, against the lucky; these too he counts. And after these games are over, and all these are told, he recites a poem in perfect rhyme, which he has composed during the sitting.

PROPORTION OF BIRTHS TO POPULATION.—The proportion of births to population in various European countries is given in a brochure of "Statistical Tables Relating to Foreign Countries." In England and Wales the annual births are 1 in 34 persons; 1 in 30 in Belgium, Holland and Norway; 1 in 32 in Sweden; 1 in 33 in Hanover, the Hanse Towns and Denmark; 1 in 35 in Greece; 1 in 36 in France; 1 in 26 in Wurtemburg; 1 in 29 in Russia; 1 in 34 in Austria, Saxony and Prussia, and in Poland 1 in 39.

GREAT NAVAL ENCAGEMENT IN ALBEMARLE SOUND, N. C.

THE rebel ram, accompanied by the Cotton-plant and Bombshell, made its appearance at the mouth of the Roanoke on Thursday, May 5, at two o'clock p.m. "He followed our boats," says our correspondent, "down the sound 11 miles, until the arrival of the gunboats Sassacus, Wyalusing and Mackenzie, when a terrific engagement took place, lasting from five o'clock until eight p.m., the enemy retiring to Jones, with all prisoners; the Cottonplant made her escape during the early part of the action. The ram had one of our boats steadily, while slowly retreating up the sound. The Sassacus fired her broadside two hundred yards, striking him abaft the centre, but did not succeed in sinking him or exploding the torpedo over any injury. The Sassacus retired with her forward rudder knocked off and her smokestack riddled with shot, and the remainder of the ram. The ram finally escaped in the darkness up the Roanoke river, the vessel pursuing in the last shot. Our loss is one killed on the Mattabesset and several slightly wounded, one third on the Sassacus from rifle practice. Several on this boat were wounded and scalded, some of whom are in a critical condition."

THE BATTLE OF SPOTTSYLVANIA COURT-HOUSE.

THE spot seen in our engraving is one on which night and weeks of fearful slaughter is to be famous, having been repeatedly the scene of fierce strife, as the battle swayed to and fro. Here we give it, as sketched by our artist, a moment when our men were lying down, with skirmishers in the ad-vance ready to fire, and supports in the rear with their rail barricade. Here a desperate contest took place.

As a sequel to this we give a view of the 5th corps' hospital on the fields and in the woods soldiers crossing the Rappahannock at Fredericksburg, after this battle, a few of the many thousands who have successfully streamed from the battlefield, some to be seized by rebel citizens and sent to Libby prisoners, and to be waylaid by guerillas, and left out amid a pitiless storm without food or means of advancing.

HANCOCK'S CHARGE.

THE most brilliant operation in Grant's campaign is, beyond all dispute, the charge of Hancock on the night of the rebel attack on the 5th corps, reported Court-house, May 12. The night previous Gen. Hancock swept down upon Spottsylvania Court-house, where the enemy had a strong position, and the guns from which annoyed our batteries exceedingly, and which it were defended that night, if possible. At daylight the charge was made; and, although our men were met with a most destructive fire, and fell in heaps, the fate of their works before the rebels could get out and run. Never before, in the campaign, had the rebels been losing 140 officers, among them Maj.-Gen. R. Johnson and Brig. G. R. Stewart, besides, as reported, 3,000 men in their casimates, etc.

The rebels made the most strenuous exertions nearly all day to regain the position, but each time failed. They came impetuously charging on, but each time were received with tremendous volleys and buried back in confusion.

We show also the captured cannon as they were brought in. Never before has the army of the Potomac made such a capture.

BRIG.-GEN. ALEX. HAYS, U. S. A.

GEN. HAYS was the son of Gen. Samuel Hays, of Venango, Penn., and was born in Franklin, in 1820. He graduated at West Point, in 1844, in the class with Gen. Grant. He was appointed to the regiment of the 4th Infantry, and was distinguished at Palo Alto and Resaca-de la Palma, capturing a rebel flag from the enemy. Returning home, he enlisted 200 men, and with them joined the army of Gen. Scott, and fought in part in the relief of Puebla. He was subsequently distinguished in the battle of the garita near Mexico, and Col. Casey to Gen. Lane.

He left the army after the war, but in 1861 applied for his military experience and skill to his country. On the 14th of April he left Pittsburgh for Camp Cameron, Harrisburg, in which he was Major. When their three months' service expired he became Colonel of a regt., and fought with it at Yorktown, Williamsburg, Fair Oaks, Peach Orchard, Gladding's Farm, and Malvern Hill, besides others. He was wounded in the last of these battles, and on his recovery was appointed Brig.-Gen. Subsequently at Gettysburg he commanded a division with such skill as to elicit the warmest praise from the commander of the army.

He was next engaged at Auburn, Bristoe station, Locust Grove, and finally fell in the battle of the Wilderness just as he baited for a moment in front of his old regiment during the fiercest of Longstreet's attack.

BRIG.-GEN. ALEX. S. WEBB, U. S. A.

BRIG.-GEN. ALEXANDER S. WEBB, severely wounded in the battle of the Wilderness, is the youngest son of Gen. James Watson Webb, was born at West Point in 1835, and was appointed Assistant Professor of Engineering at the Military Academy on graduation up to the outbreak of the rebellion. He fought at Bull run as an artillery officer, was afterwards appointed to command a regiment, and was made Brig.-Gen. of volunteers by Gen. Fitzjohn Porter, and, being in 1863 appointed a Brig.-Gen.-General, fought with great distinction there at Gettysburg, at the head of a command in the 2d Army corps. He is now in command of the 1st brigade, 1st division, 2d Army corps, under Gen. Hancock. Although he has thus fought his way to one of the highest positions of the army, he is only 26 years of age.

THE REBEL RAIDER'S LAST FIGHT.

WE give a sketch which our readers cannot fail to admire of the battle of the Yellow Tavern, May 11, between GEN. J. E. B. STUART, the rebel raider, and the successful raid around McClellan, fell mortally wounded.

Mr. Bulkley, the Herald correspondent, says:

"We found the enemy in considerable force behind fortifications, composing the outer line of the Richmond defences. Gen. Sheridan at once made a charging attack upon a hill, commanding our whole corps, and our pretty battery of 6 guns, under Capt. Martin, and Gen. Sheridan was equal to the emergency. The enemy was slowly and steadily driven from the hill.

"The General ordered Gen. Custer to take his gallant brigade and charge the enemy's lines. Custer placed himself at the head of his command, and with drawn sabre led his dashing, undaunted troopers forward. The roar of a withering fire, captured two pieces of artillery, upwards of 100 prisoners, together with a large number of caissons and horses, which he brought off in safety. It was, without exception, the most gallant charge of the raid, and when it became known among the corps there was a loud cheer from the air. The rebels retreated behind their fortifications, destroying in their flight Meadow bridge.

"In the rear Col. Gregg's brigade, of the 2d division, and a portion of the 3d division, under Gen. Wilson, were busily engaged with Stuart. Gen. Wilson sent word to Gen. Sheridan that the enemy were in force in his slowly back. Gen. Sheridan sent word that he must hold the position at all hazards; that he could and must whip the enemy." Col. Gregg's brigade, being reinforced by a regiment from the 1st brigade, charged the enemy, and drove them nearly a mile. The day now cure. The enemy had disappeared from our front, and we succeeded in rebuilding the Meadow bridge, and the 1st and 3d divisions crossed, covered by the 2d division, which, in turn, withdrew, and also crossed without being annoyed by the enemy.

The Richmond Examiner now describes it:

"In the meantime Gens. Stuart and Fitz Lee came up with the enemy at Yellow Tavern, but, being hotly outnumbered, they managed to maintain their ground only by desperate fighting. Upon this, Gen. Lee, in those desperate charges, at the head of a charging colors, fell mortally wounded—Gen. Stuart fell, severely wounded—an irreparable loss to our cause. His many years of faithful service and glorious exploits will challenge the admiration of the world. He was best known and loved by his men, and his great appreciable fact always cheered them in the camp, the march and the battle-field. His voice was like a trumpet, and his voice inspired and nerved them in the hour of battle.

"Gen. Stuart was killed instantly.

A noble soul for liberty died!

"In this engagement Gen. Gregg severe. Col. H. Clay Pate and Lieut.-Col. Robert Randolph were also killed—both of them brave and accomplished officers."

MOUTON'S PLANTATION, VERMILION BAYOU, LA.

THE devastation of Southern agricultural districts may be appreciated in the sketch of Gov. Mouton's place, in the Vermilion bayou. His son likely fell in action, fighting against the National army under Gen. Banks, and here are the ruins of Governor Mouton d'Afrique, possibly some of his own ex-slaves, furrowing around the ruins of the mansion, and hoeing the fields of ex-Rip. Such work, of course, disembodies all involuntary servitude.

BROWNSVILLE, TEXAS.

BROWNSVILLE took its name from the gallant Major Brown, who fell during the bombardment of the batteries by order of Gen. Taylor. It was, before the present war, one of the most attractive places in Texas, as our readers may judge by the description, taken from the New Orleans Daily Crescent, of Aug. 20, 1860:

"We have many towns, less favorable in collecting it, and less difficulty in keeping it: we have more people, less disorder and more business. But, after town in Texas. Our ladies are filled with better and cheaper goods than can be had in any other town in the South, and we have them longer and at cheaper rates than anywhere else. The streets are wide, and the town comfortably, with fresh meat, vegetables, bread, milk, etc., at the door, and plenty of good water.

It has of course suffered fearfully, and as the rebels have confessed themselves, it is the opposite of Gen. Banks, they set it on fire. One of the finest buildings remaining is the U. S. Custom House, which we have shown on the left of our illustration. The Rio Grande, with the Mexican shore, are seen on the right.

PORTO CABALLO, TEXAS.

THE spot where our Rio Grande army landed, Porto Caballo, is associated with a point of historical interest. It was in this bay that La Salle, after missing the mouth of the Mississippi, entered, in his search for it, and ascended the river a little way, built a fort and built a fort near the Lavaca river, which derives its name from him. The place where the settlement is well-known. A Spanish expedition sent to expel the French found the fort deserted, and burned it, which fact the ruins of the fort and lifeless corpses. The Indians had butchered all.

FORT MONTGOMERY, TEXAS.

ONE of the defences on the Rio Grande will also be remembered. It stands on the bank of the Rio Grande, within sight of Brownsville, and is an earthwork, defended by a formidable battle of thirty-two black bushes, which stand out spectral in the white sand. Since the withdrawal of the National troops, it has been strengthened to meet any exigencies on the frontier.

CHIT-CHAT WITH THE LADIES.

Why they Grumble.

OF course this column is intended for the eyes of lady readers only, otherwise I should never dare, oh! dear, no, to write as I am about to write, to touch upon a subject that we men are far too bad enough to bear without talking about it.

But the cares of care we I have always striven to alleviate, and at any risk I must whisper this secret.

You must know that every day, that your husband (hide this paper before he returns, I beseech you) is remarkably cross, not to say bearish, in these latter days; that he will not be particularly sympathetic with your admiration of that "love of a bonnet!" at Madame H.'s, and that your dress and jewels, which you flatter yourself that "baby has cut two teeth." Perhaps you cannot account for the phenomenon? But listen to me a moment, and I will explain the whole affair.

The case lies between two B's—Beef and Brandy—and the former has risen to such an altogether prohibitive quote now—than ever ever known before in this market!

And as for his favorite beverage, after all the taxation, why, we cannot ask him to do by Bunn and Jones as he would that Smith and Jones would do by him, for he is not a publican, and has no sign to swing. Beef and brandy-and-water are as necessary to their existence as bread-and-butter and vegetables are to some. We need not expect smiles again until the tax is taken off liquor and the meat market falls.

Dress Reform Movements.

What are we coming to? Where will the hairdresser's art pause in this time of fearful and marvellous innovations in the shape and fashion of heads? What shrine will our tresses attain? How many locks of borrowed hair will it be necessary for a lady to add to her own before the edifice of her coiffure is considered complete?

The appearance of the heads of the unhappy slaves of crinoline on full dress occasions is something terrible to contemplate. They are brushed, and braided, and waved, and frizzled, and curled, and rolled, and pomatumed, and bolstered up and combed, and hairpinned, until the human head divine is a thing of humps and bumps and excrescences, and that of the buffalo presents a more classical and comely appearance. And the contrast to the face (of course), is much like that of a buffalo. It certainly is not human. We think with horror of the days when our own wives and children shall appear in the frightful accounts which we used to read in a book of travels in our childhood, of the horn worn by the Dyak women, about which their hair was bound in such a manner and with such toil that the unhappy belle was obliged to sit up all night rather than endure another hairdressing operation, and sleep bolt upright for weeks together. Shall we come to this in 1864? It seems likely.

A Naughty Story.

A very spiteful old bachelor (of course) tells a story which we don't believe. He declares that on the occasion of the meeting at the Cooper Institute he had the pleasure of walking behind a very elegant lady, who had appeared prominently as an advocate of calico and bonnepium, as she returned to her carriage, and that on the way she dropped a folded paper from her pocket, which he picked up just too late to return before the carriage drove off. Examining this paper, with some little hope, we presume, of discovering it to be a billet-doux addressed to himself, he found it to be a pyrgoods bill for the sum of $1,000 for the aforesaid bonnet, the principal item Lyons velvet. We don't believe a word of this, of course.

Out of Date.

We think it quite time that the complaints of the sterner sex in regard to the conduct of ladies in public conveyances should be done away with. Fashion is given up their seats without even the poor meed of thanks—for politeness is now-a-days, but they certainly do not do so now. In stages and cars they will engage with loud tone gentlemen and boots outstretched, or sit sideways to read the last extra sheet, or their greater convenience, while women stand up, clutching the strap and reflecting sorrowfully on the remarkable curves and angles which compressed crinoline will assume. "Sit-fortune" we still and grumble, while feminine passengers of four-feet nothing split their abnormal drives and lour their cloak sleeves out of the armholes, trying to hand the fare to the impatient driver; and to which, one must clamber over a mine of muddy boots, the owners of which never think of withdrawing, but rather enjoy the discomfort occasioned by their graceful proximity, which is only silenced when a lady has fairly slighted, and the gentlemen (?) find it expedient to withdraw themselves out of the window, in order to discover her claiming to be, and assume themselves by watching her progress over a mile of mud to the sidewalk. Yes, complaints on the score of women's rudeness and men's sacrifices at the shrine of politeness are out of date. The fact is, that it ever was a mistake or oblivion; a thing of the past never to be brought to mind, and which is remembered by every elderly gentleman, who, knowing what used to be in his youth, occasionally pens a paragraph upon the subject to the astonishment of his younger readers, who never saw anything of the kind.

Postscript.

It appears that Government has appointed a large number of ladies to fill the place of men hitherto employed in the Treasury. We are very much pleased to hear it, because we are always desirous to hear of any new and remunerative field for woman's labor; but we cannot help wishing that they may be of more decided hesitation in sending letters of importance, bilabore, to the post.

Imagine an army of postmistresses, assistants, mulcarriers, &c.; do you suppose a suspicious-looking document, directed in a delicate female hand to John Smith, New York, perfumed with night-blooming cereus, and sealed with a heart, would ever get out of "over-there," would reach its destination without being subjected to the most rigid investigation? Could any female postmistress resist the temptation of a lovely-scented and snowy envelope? or refrain from finding out whether that girl really meant to say to John Smith?

And after the secret was discovered, could it be kept within the bosom of the trustress? No indeed.

Why, the whole country would be thrown into a fit of red hair and a valentine, and sold to the culprit, "Johnny, farewell you are my fate," would be the order of the day, and "Jeff Davis" would be the favorite name for a poodle.

Keep the women out of the Treasury, we say, and let them remain in the greatest confidence in Postmistress C, and the culprit would be secure from detection, while all the love-letters and valentines would be brought to light in the most mysterious manner.

Those Dreadful Cows.

The pleasures of a walk uptown are to the best rather doubtful. What with new buildings, with outworks of the upper-ten, and with the so-called streets by which at the most unexpected moment laborers with carts of rags emerge, yelling, "Back, back!" while a shower of logs, shavings, bricks, &c., &c., from the houses which they have been blasting; and the dogs, who regard all strangers as their natural enemies, a promenade near the Central Park is fraught with danger.

But these grievances are to guarded against and avoided, and the most vexatious nuisance perhaps is a form terrifying to the unhappy wearers of crinoline, and that is cows. Do we exhibit cows by the roadside for fresh air and exercise. You are walking along quietly, expecting no danger, when suddenly you hear a noise behind you. "Cows, cows, cows yells of "Ya-ha-yahip-yo," &c.; and, looking up, behold a drove of cows, headed by a small boy, and followed by another, homeward. Two unearthly-looking creatures, in ragged headgear and flannel shirts, with inexpressibles tucked into their boots, are driving the herd with sticks, and doing all they can to deprive the animals of their natural propensities to stop to feed on the grass and overhanging boughs, and to scatter in every direction. If you turn to the right, a wall of unpleasant countenances and horns is to be left, a red animal, that is The House that Jack Built, with a crumpled horn, adresses; you turn to the left, and behold a third, with dingy marks of drab and brown, evidently regards the movement as an infringement of his rights, and is about to run at you around the corner, intent upon goring you, on account of the exasperating hue of a rose in your bonnet. For safety you might as well be in the midst of a Spanish bullfight, and no very person would lay a large wager on the chances for escape of the life. As a general thing, you do stonde the horns, and gain nothing more than a severe fright and a pair of muddy gaiters, but now and then a cow is gored to death and all accounts, it is not pleasant to present yourself on the double quick at your own residence covered with abuse from the inferior of some suburban Dutch grocery, where customers are few and far between. Our suggestion, put in time to hear the foremost horned beast give a low of preparation, is that the fiends in charge too always carry a cutter. We understand that a movement is being made in the Fifth ward, the city of cows, and we hope it will be successful, for we own to being very much afraid of cows ourselves.

The Stuyvesant Pear Tree.

The grand old Methuselah of pear trees, 256 years old, continues in the light of a young tree, very young. The old tree is certainly in its second childhood, or it would never condescend to bear such small pears. Some upon a time by the most ancient of Knickerbockers, upon the disgraceful generation in which we live.

Think of tasting pears from boughs which yielded the dessert of our grandmother's grandmother's great-grandmother! Certainly, we should regard the occurrence in the light of a miracle.

New York should give the new cover, during the pear season, to the Central Commission, which might realize quite a sum by disposing of the fruit at such prices as antiquarians give for their musty treasures, and bibliomaniacs for the monkly volumes now and then intemptingly before their avaricious eyes.

He who would not give a good round sum in greenbacks for a Stuyvesant pear is no true Gothamite.

TO ONE AWAY.

BY INEZ.

I've been rambling on the bank of the river,
Then rested beneath the old trees;
While through my dark ringlets came stealing
The breath of the sweet Spring breeze.
I heard it, up—up—in their tops,
Whistling a favorite song;
I saw it upon the bright water,
As it danced the waves along.

And I knew by the beautiful shadows
That played on the opposite side,
It was touching the nodding daisies
The game of seek-and-go-hide!
It shook the delicate blossoms
So rudely, they fled with affright;
Then sway to the waltzing May blooms,
It caressed them with wild delight.

It cuffed the youthful pines
That were bending far over the stream,
Trying to catch between the ripples
A glimpse of their coats of green.
Around me the landscape was glowing,
Tinged by the sun's golden beam,
With beauty like this lavished round me,
I could do naught but dream.

The birds they were soaring above me,
The wild bee hummed lazily by—
Yet alas! in midst of the beautiful,
My heart found time to sigh;
Not, not that I was weary,
For earth seemed all too fair;
But oh! I missed the footsteps
That so oft had loitered there.

With nature's carpet beneath me,
And heaven's bine dome above,
Such rushing memories came o'er me,
Memories of one beloved;
The tears sprang all unbidden,
The sighs burst from the heart;
Ah! thou art not forgotten,
Of our life thou form'st a part.

When twilight deepens around thee,
And the stars are gleaming bright,
There ascends a prayer through the gloaming
To our Father who dwelleth in light,
To watch o'er and protect thee
Where'er thy feet may stray,
And remember warm hearts await thee
To thy home, far away, far away.

The Gulf Between Them.

BY ANN S. STEPHENS.

CHAPTER XLI.

ELSIE was better that morning. When the physician arrived he pronounced her much improved, and confessed to Mellen that he had at first feared an attack upon the brain, but he believed now it was only the result of a severe nervous paroxysm. This time he made no inquiries of Mellen concerning his wife; the manner in which they had been received on the previous day did not invite a renewal of the subject.

Elsie was easy to get up, after her usual habit, the moment she began to feel better; but the doctor ordered her to lie in bed, at least for that day.

"But I want to get up so badly," she said; when her brother returned to the chamber; "I am so tired of lying here."

"Just have patience for to-day; the doctor would not allow of your making the least exertion."

"He's a cross old thing!" pouted Elsie, with a faint return to her old manner, which made Mellen both sigh and smile.

"You will soon be able to put him at defiance. But, indeed, you are so weak now you could not walk."

"Oh, that's nonsense! I don't believe anything about it. You shall stay here with me; if I have to be kept prisoner I will hold you fast, too."

"There is no fear of my attempting to leave the room," he replied.

Elsie felt much improved. She sat up in bed, made her brother play at various games of cards with her, talked and looked more like herself.

But into the conversation, in which Mellen did his best to lure a share, there crept some chance mention of that name which those walls must no longer hear. It fell from Elsie's lips thoughtlessly, and at once recalled her faint attempt at cheerfulness, throwing her back on the gloom which she had succeeded in shutting out for a little time.

"Did you hear that letter, Grant?" she asked, quickly.

"To Mr. Hudson?"

Elsie bowed her head.

"Yes; I sent it down to the village, to go by the morning's boat."

"Thank you, Grant, thank you!"

She tried to console herself with thinking she had done something in Elizabeth's behalf, but when her conscience compared it with all that she ought to do her coward heart shrank back at the contrast.

"I am tired of cards," she said, sweeping the bits of pasteboard off the bed with one of her abrupt movements, which would have been so rude in another, but seemed graceful and childish as she did them. "Cards are stupid things at the best!"

Mellen patiently collected the scattered pack and laid it away, trying to think of some other means of relieving her ennui.

"Shall I read to you?" he asked.

"I don't believe I could listen," she said, tossing her head wearily about. "I don't know—just try."

There was a pile of new novels and magazines on the table in the centre of the room, for Elsie always kept herself liberally supplied with these sources of distraction, though it must be confessed that she had always carried the recreation to an extreme, reading her romances to the exclusion of more solid studies, just as she preferred nibbling at sweets to eating substantial food.

"There certainly is opportunity for a choice," Mellen said, glancing at the pile. "What book will you choose?"

"Oh, bring a magazine; read me some short story."

Mellen seated himself, opened the periodical and commenced reading the first tale he lighted upon. It was a story by a popular author, beginning in a light, pleasant way, and promising the amusement his listener needed. But as the little romance went on it deepened into a pathetic tragedy. It was an account of a noble-born Sicilian woman who, during the Revolution, endured, silently, every species of suffering, at last death itself, rather than betray her husband to his enemies, and yet the husband had bitterly wronged her and half-broken her heart during their married life.

Elsie did not listen at first, but at length her thoughts became so painful that she tried to fasten her attention upon the reading. When she began to take notice Mellen was just in the midst of the account of her martyrdom in prison, bearing up with such serene patience, faithful to her vow, firm in her determination to save the man who had injured her.

Elsie fairly snatched the volume from his hand.

"Don't read it!" she commanded. "What made you choose such a doleful thing; it makes my flesh creep."

He saw the change which had come over her face, and reproached himself for his carelessness in having chosen so sad a tale; but the truth was, in his short description, he had not had the slightest idea of what he was reading, his voice sounded in his own ears mechanical, and as if it did not in the least belong to him.

He went to the table to make a more fortunate selection.

"Here is a volume of parodies," he said; "shall I try those?"

"Anything, I don't care."

He commenced a mischievous travestie of a poem, but though it was wittily done, its lightness jarred so terribly on both reader and listener that it was speedily thrown aside. For some time they remained in gloomy silence, but when Elsie began to sigh and move restlessly about Mellen tried to rouse himself and be cheerful again.

The afternoon passed very much in the same way, till at last Elsie declared that she would sleep awhile.

"Anything to wear away the time!" she said.

Mellen wondered if he should leave and help to shorten the hours to him, but he held his peace.

"I have such an odd, horrible feeling," said Elsie; "just as if I were looking anxiously for something—every instant expecting it."

"That is because you are nervous."

"Perhaps so," she said, wearily.

He was waiting. Henceforth life would be but one long wait, just for his revenge, then to be free from the dull pressure of this sad misery.

"How white you are!" Elsie said suddenly. "I don't believe you have slept at all."

It was true. For two days Mellen had not closed his eyes, but he felt no approach towards drowsiness even now.

"You will fall sick," cried Elsie. "What shall I do then?"

"Don't be afraid; I am well and strong."

He said the words with a loathing bitterness of his own ability to endure.

The more powerful his physical organization, the more years of lingering of this sad pain would he left for him to bear. His mind flew on to the future; he pictured the long, long course towards old age; the dreary years over which would bring only a cold exterior over his sufferings, like a crust of lava hardening above the volcanic fires beneath.

"Don't sit so, looking at nothing," cried Elsie. "I see, dear. There, do you think you can go to sleep?"

I won't try, unless you go to sleep too. Draw the sofa up by the bed and lie down."

He obeyed her command, willing to gratify her least caprice. She gave him one of her pillows, threw a part of the counterpane over him, and made him lie there, holding fast to his hand, afraid to be alone, even in her dreams.

"Do you feel sleepy, Grant?" she asked, after a pause.

"Perhaps so; I am resting, at all events."

"Don't you wish you were dead? I was sick once years ago, I never would sleep unless I held your hand?"

"Yes, dear."

How far back the time looked—he had been a mere youth then—what a fearful waste lay between that season and the present!

Suddenly Elsie started up again.

"You sent the letter, Grant?"

"Yes, my sister, be composed."

She was so much afraid even to go to sleep, that it relieved her to make her last waking thoughts those where little Dolph and she were doing Elizabeth.

"Good-night, now," she said; "I can go to sleep. Kiss my hand, Grant. You love me, don't you?"

"Always, darling, always; nothing can part you and me."

She fell away into a tranquil slumber, and Mellen lay a long time watching her repose; it was a brief season of peace to her, for her burning, thoughts had not followed her into her dreams.

The extreme quiet, the sight of her pinched face soothed him imperceptibly. A dreary weakness began to make itself felt after that long continued excitement. At length the lids drooped over his eyes, and he slept almost as profoundly as Elsie herself. For a long time there was no sound in the chamber; the brother and sister lay there in profound slumber, while the day wore on and the twilight crept slowly around.

But when Elsie did wake it was to rouse him with the cry which had been so often on her lips during the previous day—

"Bessie, Bessie!"

He started up, spoke to her, and his voice brought her back to the reality.

"I was so happy," she moaned; "I dreamed Bessie and I were gathering pond lilies—she was wreathing them about my head—then just as I woke I saw a snake sting her—before that it was all bright. Oh, dear, if I never need wake, never!"

CHAPTER XLII.

TIME next day Elsie was still stronger and better. She consented to lie in bed all the morning, making it a condition that she might get up and be carried downstairs in the afternoon.

"That is the dreariest time," she said; "it passes so slowly."

Mellen promised her, and she was childishly happy.

"You shall have an early dinner, Grant, and then we'll take tea in the evening, and eat toast and jam just as we did when I was a child."

"Yes, that will be very comfortable."

He had tried to say pleasant, but he could not speak the word. The day was so warm and bright that a little after noon he took her out for a short drive, then she lay down to rest again, resolved to be strong and pass the evening below. The least sick of Elsie's own progress had been to her—she felt quite elated, as she always was in health, at the idea of amusement.

They got through the day much better than they had done the previous ones, and Elsie did not have a single relapse of her nervous tremors and agitation.

When she woke from her afternoon nap it was growing dusk. She cried out quite joyfully when she saw Grant sitting by the bed:

"It is almost evening at last!"

At that moment Victoria appeared at the door.

"Come in, Vic," cried Elsie; "what do you want?"

Victoria entered on tiptoe, though she knew plainly enough that her young mistress was awake, and called out in a childish manner she reserved for sick rooms:

"If you please, Mister Fuller's just arriv, and he's a-taking after all of you in a breath."

Elsie started up on her pillows, and the brother and sister stared at each other in blank horror at the thought of the terrible woe that must be inflicted upon the warm, honest heart of Elizabeth's cousin.

"Go and say that we will be down," said Elsie, recovering her presence of mind before Mellen.

Victoria departed, and Grantley cried out:

"How can I tell him? Poor Dora, he will nearly die."

"You must not tell him yet," said Elsie, "not one word—just say Bessie is absent."

"Such prevarication is useless, Elsie, he must know the truth."

Elsie began to groan.

"There, you are contradicting me already. I tell you I can't—I shall be sick again—my head swims now."

"Don't distress yourself so, dear, don't."

"Then let me have my own way," she pleaded.

"What do you wish? Anything to content you."

"That's a good brother," said Elsie. Go down and meet him. You have been very sick, and that Bessie has gone to New York—anywhere—not a word more."

But he will wonder at her absence during your illness."

"No, he never wonders; it doesn't make any difference."

"I detest these white lies, Elsie."

"Oh, well, if you want to kill me with a scene go and tell him the truth at once, throwing herself back on her pillows; "I shall be killed at last."

Mellen was too anxious to soothe her not to submit.

"I'll go, darling; I'll go."

"Good-bred; kind brother! Send Victoria to me; I will be all dressed when you come back."

Mellen went out and called the servant, then he passed downstairs, and in the hall met Tom, who nodded wildly towards him, exclaiming:

"The woman says Elsie is very sick; is she better; what is it?"

"She is much better; don't be frightened; she will be downstairs in a few minutes."

"Thank God," said brother Tom, his face still white with fear Victoria's words had aroused.

Mellen was too much preoccupied to notice his extreme agitation, or speculate upon its cause if he had observed it.

"I only got back this afternoon," pursued Tom, "and I hurried over here at once. How is Bessie?"

"She—she is not at home," faltered Mellen.

"Not at home and Elsie sick?"

"She was gone," said Mellen, "and I did not send for her."

Tom was too much troubled about Elsie to reflect long upon anything else, and directly Mellen broke from the eager questions, exclaiming:

"Go into the library, Tom; I'll bring Elsie down."

He went upstairs and knocked at his sister's door.

"You may come in," Elsie called out; "I am ready."

When he entered she was sitting up in an easy chair, wrapped in a pretty dressing-gown of white cashmere, braided and trimmed after her fanciful habits, a gay shawl thrown over her shoulders, her long ringlets shading her face, and looking altogether quite another creature.

For the first time in all those days a feeling of relief loosened the oppression on Mellen's heart.

"You look so well again; God bless you, darling!"

"Am I not pretty?" she cried childishly, pointing to herself in the glass. "I shall make a nice little visitor."

"You will always be one, my sunbeam," he said.

She shivered a little at his words, but she would not think, she would have her old carelessness, her old peace back if she could grasp it.

"How is Tom?" she asked.

Dreadfully anxious about you, poor fellow."

"Did he ask for Bessie?"

"Yes—yes."

"But you said nothing?"

"No, Elsie; he knows nothing."

"That is right," she said; "I can tell him better than you. Be kind to him, Grant."

"Yes, dear; he saved your life; Tom is very dear to me; poor Tom."

"I am a bad visitor, remember," she said childishly; "you must not forget that."

"I will forget nothing that can give you pleasure, you may be certain; be unnerved, kindly."

"Now you shall lead me downstairs," she said. "You must not call it; I will carry you."

"No, no; I am so heavy."

But he took her in his arms and carried her downstairs, as he had so often done in her childish days, while Victoria followed with cushions and shawls to make her perfectly comfortable.

"I am a little baby again, Grant! Don't you remember how you used to carry me about."

"Indeed I do; you are not much larger now."

"You saucy thing! I would pull your hair only I am afraid you would let me fall."

He carried her into the library and laid her on the sofa. Tom sprang forward with a cry of terror at the change his absence had made in her appearance, but a gesture from Mellen warned him that he must control his feelings lest his anxiety should agitate her.

Tom m ade it so well. "Tom, so very glad," she said, clasping her delicate fingers about his hands, and so filling him with delight by her look and words that he could not even remember to be anxious.

"It has seemed an age to me since I went away," pursued Tom. "And you have been so sick, little princess, and Bessie gone! that is strange."

"There, there," cried Elsie; "you must not talk about my appearance or sickness or anything else! Just tell me how pretty I look, and do nothing but praise me."

"You look like an angel of light," cried Tom, looking mystically at her little hand, as if he longed to hide it away in his broad palm.

The fire burned cheerfully in the grate, the tea-table sparkled with light, the tea-table spread, and everything done to make the room pleasant which could suggest itself to Dolph and Victoria in their eagerness to please the young favorite.

"It is so pleasant," she said, with a sigh of relief; "so pleasant."

Then Victoria brought her a bunch of flowers Dolph had cut in the greenhouse, and she strewed the fragrant blossoms over her dress and wreathed them in her hair till she made a beautiful picture, with her rich wrappings and delicate loveliness.

"Now we will have tea very soon," she said, "and bring all sorts of nice things, Victy."

"Yes, 'deed, dear Miss Elsie! Clo she's ben a-fixin' for you, you know! Lawsy, it jis' makes my heart jump to see you up agin."

As the girl left the room Mellen said:

"How you have won her! Everybody does, dear."

"They must," she answered; "I should die if I was not petted. Oh, Grant, it's so nice here; don't you like it?"

"Yes, indeed; you make the old room bright again."

Her spirits had risen, she was really quite like her old self, and that without effort or pretence.

Then the tea was brought in, and she insisted on at least one cup from Victoria's hand. They were all acquainted with her love for sweets, and the varieties of preserves and jellies she had brought out from her stores were marvellous to behold.

Elsie fed Tom with bits of toast, made him eat everything he did not want and beg for all that he did, and grew more bright and graceful that Mellen himself grew quiet from her influence.

While the meal was progressing so pleasantly with them, the principal personage below stairs were holding a subdued revel in the housekeeper's room.

Miss Dinah had come up from the village, and her ebony suitor was expected, so, what with their delight at Miss Elsie's improvement, the whole staff was in excellent spirits.

"It's one of dem 'casions," said Dolph, "when we get to do somefin'. I little use to do common run—what do yer say, Miss Clorindy?"

Clo smiled affably; certain explanations had passed between her and Dolph on the previous day, which made her inclined to consider any proposal of his with high favor.

She summoned her undercutor drudge Sally, and ordered her to set the table at once.

"And don't spend yer time a gapin' at Miss Dinah's new dress," said she, severely; "taint manners, nohow."

The truth was Sally had not observed the gown, but its brilliant color had struck Clorinda fancy, and because she stared at it curiously she concluded the girl must be doing the same.

"Jis' observe what Miss Clorinda tells yer," remarked "Dolph, "and 'ere'll be on the road to 'provement; Sally, yer couldn't have a more reflicient guide."

Clo bridled and grew radiant, threw a glance of triumph at Dinah, and only regretted that Victoria had not yet come downstairs to witness these benign words.

"I spect Othello won't get here till late," said Dinah, beginning to fear that before his arrival the good things would all have disappeared. "Der's some of meeting at de hotel, and he'll be kept dar—de gemmen thinks nobody else can wait on 'em."

"He deserves deir 'preciation," said 'Dolph, loftily, with the air of a man so supremely great that he could well afford to allow ordinary people to claim their little virtues unchallenged.

"Wal," said Clo, "arter all it needs trabbel and the world to develop a man proper."

"Jis' so, Miss Clorindy; yer's allers rezact."

He gave her a very tender glance, and Clo giggled in delightful confusion.

"But I tell you, Mr. Othello mustn't lose his share of 'freshment," pursued 'Dolph, anxious to receive as many extra meals as possible. "Miss Clo, will you permit me to make a proposition?"

"I'll feel it an honor," said Clo.

"Yer does me proud," returned 'Dolf with a profound bow, while Dinah sat quite aghast at their stateliness and high breeding, and Sally began to think Clo must speak Spanish as well as 'Dolph.

"I moves we has our tea now," said 'Dolph; "it's a sort of delercate compliment to Miss Elsie to eat when she does, and later in de ebenin' arter Mr. Othello comes we might make a brile ob dat chicken in de closet—marster don't eat nothin', and I'se afeared it'll be wasted."

Clo was complaisance itself, and went to work while 'Dolph encouraged her with his smiles.

By the time Victoria came downstairs the table was spread with good things, and in order to carry out 'Dolph's extraordinary idea of complimenting Miss Elsie, there were sweetmeats and cakes of all sorts, hot muffins, cold tongue, and stores of eatables that made 'Dolph's mouth water.

The meal began with the greatest harmony, Miss Dinah was very affable, Vic really was the best-natured creature in the world, and just now she was perfectly happy from seeing her beloved young mistress better; 'Dolph was so circumspect in his conduct that Clo was kept in the state of high goodhumor befitting the glory of her new turban, and the first brightness of the change which had come.

The truth was, the day before, while she was peeling onions, 'Dolph grew sentimental, and was led on to the point beyond which there was no turning back. Clo had grown tender and confidential—he learned the amount of her fortune—five hundred hard dollars in the bank. After this the happiness of that sable pair was supreme. For the moment she really looked beautiful in his eyes, and with tears in their depths—the result of affection, not of the onions he assured her—he implored her to make him the happiest of men. He did it all in the most grandiloquent style, dropping on one knee as he had seen lovers do from the upper loft of the Bowery Theatre, and holding her hands fast, one of which grasped a knife and the other an onion.

Before they were disturbed matters were completely settled, though 'Dolph pleaded for the engagement being kept secret a little while.

"I jis' want to see what dat ole parson 'll say," he averred, though the truth was, 'Dolph had been so indiscreet in his protestations to Victoria that he was a little fearful of consequences if that high-spirited damsel learned the news without a little preparation.

"Nebber you mind de parson," said Clo; "laws, I wouldn't wipe my ole shoes on him, 'sides it ed be something wuth while jis' to denounce our connubiolity to de hull company dis ebening."

But 'Dolph flattered until she consented to comply with his wishes.

CONFIDENCE.

ALL is silent, lonely, free,
 Perfumed winds alone disclose
Where the startled hare, retreating,
 Dash'd aside the drooping rose.

Rest we on this fragrant bank,
 Harebells in the grass half seen,
Wide dark woods around us meeting,
 And a clear stream rolled between.

Happy scene! more lovely face
 Press'd near mine, above the stream.
"Love, what means thy heart's quick beating,
 Sighs more fit a troubled dream?"

"Full of happiness with thee,
 Beats this heart so close to thine;
Yet I sigh'd to think how fleeting
 May be the passion so divine."

"Looks, not hearts, may have a change,
 Changing face this stream does show;
Yet the same translucent current Tranquil ever flows below."

CHAPTER VII.

Keen
As is the razor's edge invisible.
Love's Labor Lost, Act V., Sc. 2.

But France got drunk with blood to vomit crime,
And fatal have her Saturnalia been
To Freedom's cause.
Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, Canto IV.

DURING the stormiest days of the year 1848, in the focus from which revolution radiated over Europe, Julien St. Croix and Bertram Hapswell had a busy and anxious time with their patients. Both were in a most precarious state, requiring great attention and care, and the tremendous excitements of the period were calculated to retard and hazard their recovering, especially in the case of the sculptor, whose mind was of the most inflammable nature. To keep him as serene and equable as possible was St. Croix's main object, and he had to guard his patient on every hand against the tumultuous influences that flooded the whole Continent.

Elfstone's memory returned, and with it the painful consciousness of the mysterious disappearance of his beloved wife and child, who, as he had been given to understand, had followed him, and perished, it was thought, most probably in some remote part of the Continent. His whole mind was now bent upon ascertaining where they died, if dead they were, and he would fain have wandered over Europe to learn their fate. The agitated state of the Continental nations and the confinement to which he was subjected rendered the gratification of his longing an impossibility at the time; and St. Croix could only endeavor to quiet him with promises, from which the future may be drawn upon to infinity.

Marina was a constant visitor and assistant nurse to Elfstone; and, strongly as he had been prejudiced against her, she extorted the unbounded admiration of St. Croix. Her gentle patience, her admirable management, consummate address, the multiform and rich fulness of her nature, and the inexhaustibility of her resources, won his highest esteem, and rendered her, in his opinion, superior to any woman he had ever known. The variety of her charms, the tender softness and delicate voluptuousness of her tones and graces were intoxicating to all, and it was no wonder he was fascinated. He had been designed by his parents and was himself disposed for the Church, and Marina's magic influence raised him from a dream of placidity into the kindling, trembling, melting and burning visions of love. It was a second birth and another life to St. Croix.

When Elfstone first opened his heart to Marina and gave free vent to his thoughts and feelings touching his lost wife and daughter, she grew at first uneasy, then pale, and at last almost fainted. He attributed the emotion she manifested to sympathy, and for a while forbore to renew the subject. When, however, he did recur to it, she was much less affected than before, but sufficiently to induce him to say:

"What is the matter, child? Do you fear they are dead?"

"I do. The mother is dead, doubtless."

"If I only knew how and where she died, and could visit her grave, I could rest content till I could rejoin her in heaven. But a political earthquake is convulsing Europe, and I am confined in this asylum. What can I do? I am not lunatic indeed, but I am sure I shall go mad if I am not soon released."

Marina coiled her serpent arms about the old sculptor, and kissed him with great affection.

"Father, I'll tell you what to do; imitate me. Be as I am—cunning, very, very cunning; seem saner than you are; flatter your keepers, flatter your doctors, without letting them detect your policy, and set yourself free. Return to England, recover your estate and fortune, and when you have money you can do anything. Money and cunning can exhume the dead, and all but bring them to life again!"

"I will be cunning, my darling Serpent."

"But do not let your cunning betray itself. Seem blunt and honest as the broad and staring summer's day, and keep your cunning busy at the bottom of your heart. If you feel a madness, hide it, and promise it indulgence in the future, when you are free. Talk in a strain of free impartiality, calm ingenuousness and manly remonstrance; and by the consistent rationality of your conduct and skilful flattery of your captors, compel them, for shame's sake, to restore you to freedom. Take the advice of your Serpent, and remember that the Wisest and Best enjoined us to add the wisdom of the serpent to the harmlessness of the dove."

Elfstone promised compliance with his fair counsellor's advice, and the next day St. Croix was struck with the rational demeanor of his patient. After the continuance for several days of this gratifying semblance, he concluded his restoration was complete. Elfstone seemed fully aware of his position and of the various difficulties in the way of his release, and conversed about them with so much calmness and common sense as to impress all who heard him with the conviction of his perfect sanity. The medical faculty exposed him to many tests, but his equanimity withstood the severest, and his politeness and address won the hearts of all who conversed with him. It had been made the interest of his custodians to retain him in the asylum, and it required all St. Croix's sagacity, means and management to influence them to favor his views and lend him their aid. But St. Croix had determined to try all, risk all, rather than fail, and success promised to be the inevitable reward of his perseverence.

Bertram Hapswell had not so tractable a patient in his brother Victor, for the spirit of the latter was chafed by his durance, and grew restless and prone to desire the very things which were worst for him. His recovery was consequently long delayed, and it was May before Bertram, who had been recalled by imperative business to England, could set out on his journey. He left Victor in St. Cloud, in the care of Madame Dégaine, an excellent lady and an old friend of his mother's. During his brief stay in England he received the following letter, dated Paris, June the 17th:

"DEAR BERTRAM—Our brother Victor returned to Paris a week ago, and has been guilty of imprudence that has brought on a relapse and thrown him into a dangerous fever. This city now is no place for a sick man, for there is a storm brewing here to which the one you witnessed in February will be no more comparable than a typhoon to a zephyr. Victor favors the Montagnards, but I am beginning to hate extremes as much as you do. I wish you could get here in time to remove him before the explosion takes place, but fear that is impossible. Come at once, if you come at all. Yours ever, MARINA."

Upon the receipt of this communication Bertram immediately prepared to return to France. Before it was possible for him to start terrible news came from Paris, but it did not frighten him from his purpose. He arrived in the French capital late on Saturday, the 24th of June, while the ultra-republican insurrection was raging there at the height of its fury. Not doubting that his brother had occupied his favorite apartments in the Quartier Latin, he made a desperate effort to reach them; but after receiving a slight wound in the leg and a couple of bullets through his hat, he relinquished the attempt as impracticable. The locality was held by the enemies of the government, and he was compelled to wait till one or the other party proved victorious. On Sunday afternoon the Gardes Mobile, National Guard and troops of the line had so far prevailed over the fierce ouvriers as to afford him an opportunity to gain his old lodgings. He effected an entrance into the house in the most informal manner, and after a diligent search found its occupants in the cellar. From them he learned that Victor had lain in the house sick of a fever for more than a week past, but had, a few hours previous to Bertram's visit, while a fight was raging in the street close by, become excited by the fusillade and shouting, sprung from his bed, half-dressed himself, and grasping his sword, rushed forth and joined in the conflict. The Montagnards were giving way, when he dashed among them, rallying them with his voice and example. Heedless of odds and the many who made him their target, he fought like a madman, which he was at the time, and carried all before him, inspiring others of his party with superhuman courage and strength that enabled them to rout their foes with great slaughter. Victor's nurse had witnessed the contest from the window, but upon the return of the National Guard in overwhelming numbers had retreated with the rest of the household to the cellar, where she remained till summoned by Bertram from her hiding-place.

Bertram's dismay at this news was so great as to paralyse him for some time. He felt himself powerless, and gave way to utter despair. How could he expect his brother to survive this sanguinary fray? What chance was there that he would ever see him alive again? When he went forth, for he found it impossible to sit inert and passive, it was with a feeling of dismal hopelessness, and he scrutinized many a corpse with apprehensive curiosity, lest he should pass his brother unheeded. The sites of captured barricades were heaped with slain, and many of those still defended were fortified by the dead stacked upon them. As Bertram was approaching the Faubourg St. Antoine, the life and centre of the insurrection, and to which the fighting was gradually being confined, he came unexpectedly upon a formidable barricade, surmounted by two flags, one of them black and bearing the motto in white, "Bread or Death" (du pain ou la mort), and the other red, with those terrible words in black, painted upon it, "Rape and Pillage."

The struggle for this position had been most desperate, and the bodies of the dead and wounded were there strewn and piled about in awful plenitude. The defenders had dwindled to a dozen, three of whom, strange to say, were women. A party of Gardes Mobile, consisting of boys, from fifteen to eighteen years of age, now preparing to assault the ouvriers, suddenly surrounded Bertram.

"This man is English," said one, seizing him by the arm; "he is a stanch friend to the government." Then in a lower tone he demanded, "How did you find your brother?"

"I have not found him yet; he has joined the combatants."

"Grand Dieu! he is lost! Yet do not give up all hope; if I find him I'll bring him to you, dead or alive, as he may chance to be."

"You may fall yourself," said Bertram, gazing wonderingly at the handsome young soldier, and trying to remember where he had met him before.

"There will be none to lament me if I do. My life is worthless and may be well spared for my country. Adieu!"

"En avant, mes enfans!" shouted the captain of the little band. In a moment the guard formed and dashed at the barricade.

Bertram saw his unknown friend climb it with the agility of a cat on the instant after its defenders had fired, snatch the red flag, and then fall or rather roll down to the foot of the defence. The assailants met with the most desperate resistance from the sturdy ouvriers, or Montagnards, who hurled them back as fast as they scaled the stony breastwork; but they remounted it, and with others swarmed upon the "blouses" so simultaneously as to overpower and slaughter every one of them within a space of time fearfully brief. Bertram approached the barricade in the hope of assisting the guard he had conversed with, but found him on his feet among his fellows and active as ever. Of the female combatants two had been shot, but not before one of them had killed the captain of the guard, whom she stabbed to the heart with a knife. The third woman, closely followed by several soldiers, escaped with the black flag she carried into a house, from the windows of which vitriol and scalding oil were thrown upon her pursuers. The exasperated soldiery burst into the building, bayoneted its inmates, or threw them from the upper storeys headlong into the street.

Bertram left this scene of butchery in horror, visited his old lodgings again, and again sallied forth. In his wanderings he met Julien St. Croix, who had hastened to Paris as soon as he heard that its beloved archbishop had been fatally wounded. He had paid the venerable martyr his last visit, and was overcome with sorrow. The minds of the two young men were so much in sympathy, that they found it impossible to separate till they had mutually unburdened their minds, and they spent the ensuing night at the house of St. Croix's mother. On Monday, about noon, Bertram returned to the apartments Victor had left so abruptly, and was delightfully surprised to find his brother lying on the bed asleep. It seemed to Bertram that he must have been dreaming of his disappearance, so tranquil and natural did the sleeper appear. The mystery was, however, instantly solved when he looked round and beheld the young Garde Mobile who had promised to bring him back also lying asleep on the sofa. He approached him to examine his countenance, which had puzzled him ever since he beheld it, but as he drew near him, the soldier started to his feet and cried:

"Qui vive?"

Bertram laughed, and extended his hand.

"I have kept my word better than I could have hoped to do," said the young guard, recovering himself and grasping the Englishman's hand. "I found your brother in Père la Chaise, where the most obstinate of the Children of the Mountain took refuge when their game was up. He was much exhausted and quite out of his head, and I had to get a cabriolet before I could bring him hither; but his utter prostration fortunately rendered him as submissive as he was helpless. He seems little hurt, and is only in danger from the government. I had some difficulty this morning in preventing his summary execution by my fellows."

Notwithstanding the brusqueness with which the soldier affected to speak, Bertram began to recognise the richness and melody of his tones, and catching the full lustre of his black eyes, exclaimed:

"Heavens! Marina!"

A low musical laugh responded, avouching the truth of his discovery, and before he knew what he did he caught the military beauty in his arms and kissed her with a fervor that his gratitude served to palliate but not wholly to excuse.

"Marina, I can hardly believe you mortal. You seem capable of anything. Angel you cannot be, for I have just seen you fighting like a fury."

"I am much obliged to you for the inevitable inference. If, however, you take me for the devil, that, I suppose, accounts for your sudden outburst of affection. I doubt not that the roots of your family tree extend as deep as the infernal kingdom."

"Forgive me, Marina. Your rebuke is as deserved as it is severe. You are a mystery beyond my comprehension. I can only admire you, and, for your friendship to Victor, love you. Believe me, my gratitude is such that you can ask nothing of me I shall not be happy to grant."

"I ask nothing but your love. If you can waste it upon a piece of marble, you must have an abundance to spare."

"You have no brother, I no sister; I will be a brother to you—a true and affectionate one—if you will be my sister?"

"A genuine bit of Platonism, I declare! What an interesting relic of the early ages!" said Marina. "You, Bertram, are one in ten thousand, simple and sincere, and I accept your offer in the spirit it is made."

She gave him her little hand, while sweetly murmuring the last words, looked into his eyes with the deep witchcraft of her glance, and he drew her near to him, so near indeed that their lips met in a kiss, sweeter than Bertram had ever dreamt sweetness could be. The coils of the Serpent were wound round their victim, and his soul was yielding to their soft pressure, when their kiss was echoed by a profound sigh. They turned, and beheld Victor's keen gray eyes wide open and fixed upon them. The rich blood was instantly mantling in the cheeks and foreheads of the detected ones, the sudden dawn of shame before the rising of the sun of love. Marina, however, quickly recovered her self-possession, and said to her patient:

"How durst you awake, contrary to my prescription? You will never get well if——"

"My brother takes my medicine; certainly not," answered Victor, slily.

"Do you accuse him?"

"I saw him with it to his lips even now."

"Only to learn how bitter it tastes. There is no danger that he will repeat the experiment; he thinks me poison."

"You must be a powerful poison to dissolve his iron nature."

"He is only hardened by the warmth of affection, like clay in the sun. He has just given me an adamantine kiss in confirmation of friendship true as steel."

"Love is mutual ruin, you know; and friendship mutual aid."

"Oh, we speak as we feel. I am a woman; love is my element, and I perish, like a mortal in the chill ether, without it. The selfish are no doubt alone wise; but your frigid island blood and calculating philosophy are death to me. I cannot keep the flame of my life alive in an iceberg. I must breathe in a warmer clime, though the earth burn beneath my feet. I must go where the sun has strength enough to reach the hearts of men."

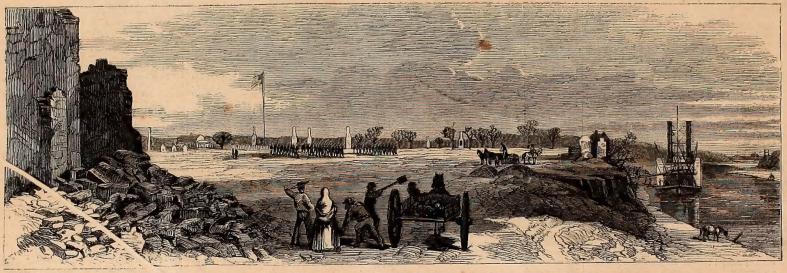
She caught from off the sofa a black and a red flag, which Bertram remembered to have seen waving over the barricade she helped to capture, flaunted them proudly before his eyes, and cried:

"Adieu!"

"Marina!" shouted he.

But Marina was gone and would not be recalled.

HOW A CAT IS ABLE TO SEE IN THE DARK.—The pupil of the eye of the cat is of an oval form, the transverse diameter being parallel to the nose; and cats have the power of contracting or dilating the pupil at pleasure. It is always contracted in the sun or before a fire. This prevents a painful sensation which would be occasioned by a number of rays of light falling on the pupil. But when a cat sits in the shade, or in the dark, she fully dilates the pupil, which enables her to see and seize her prey rather by surprise than by hunting it fairly down.



POWER OF A HORSE.—One horse can raise 150lb 220 feet high in a minute, eight hours a day; one horse-power is reckoned at from 30,000 to 36,000lb, raised one foot per minute; one horse's force, drawing horizontally, is estimated at [illegible]lb; one horse can draw on a level 4,480lb, two tons, equal to seven men.

POWER OF A MAN.—One strong man can raise 10lb 10 feet in a second, 10 hours a day; one strong man can raise 100lb one foot in a second; one strong man can draw on a level 640lb; one strong man can press with his hands equal to 110lb; one man's force, drawing horizontally, 110lb; one man can lift with both hands 250lb; one man can support on his shoulders 300lb.

GOLD FISH.—The beautiful little fish called in this country "gold and silver fish" were originally natives of China and Japan, where they are held in great estimation, and are called kiuyn. From China the English carried some of them to the island of St. Helena, and from thence the captain of one of the East India ships brought some of them to England in the year 1788.

A LIFE PICTURE.

Look on that little head,
Pillow'd on softest down;
Cambric and dainty lace
Shadow that baby face,
Safe from Life's frown.

Hush every waking sound,
Softly tread, whisper low;
See, sweet babe, how she sleeps,
Forth one dimpled arm peeps,
All in a roseate glow.

Here lies an infant form,
Rags are its only bed;
Dirty and scant its gear,
Dabbled with many a tear,
Life's baptism dread.

Hark! that curse, hush! a shriek—
'Tis but its lullaby;
Cradled 'mid odors foul,
Rock'd by a man's demon howl,
There let it lie.

See yon frolicsome elf,
Azure-eyed, golden-hair'd;
Six bright summers have shone,
Six of God's years have flown,
Since she Life shared.

Groping 'midst gutters foul,
Dirt-begrimed see her there;
Look at her tangled locks,
Eye that youth's gladness mocks,
Dull vacant stare.

Gay carol the joy-bells,
'Tis a bridal to-day;
And the golden-hair'd maiden,
With Love's blessings laden,
Goes forth on her way.

Why halts the procession?—
'Tis but a funeral;
A vile pauper soul
Borne forth to its goal
Without hearse or pall.

Famine-bred vice hath done
Nobly its work in her;
There she goes all unmourn'd,
Both in life and death scorn'd,
On her rude bier.

Children of Eve, by Fate
Sever'd how far;
The same hour gave ye birth,
Both shall moulder to earth—
Sisters ye are.

Listen, ye highborn dames,
Have ye no mission?
Can ye no little one,
Born 'neath the blessed sun,
Snatch from perdition?

Hear it, my countrymen,
Cruel tale, often told;
Ponder it carefully,
Wistfully and prayerfully,
Angels behold.

Ye have a stern duty,
Refuse it who will;
Each must his burden bear,
Christ's loving work must share,
Ere Life be still.

THE MOORISH BRIDE'S RESCUE.

A Romance of Tetuan.

Soon after the accession of the present Emperor to the throne of Morocco an officer in command of the fortress of Tetuan was suspected at court of plotting against the new Sultan, or being too rich. Either crime was enough to warrant his destruction. As he was deemed rather popular, it was thought unsafe to spare his life. A messenger from the Sultan stood before him one morning, politely wishing him a thousand years of life, and assuring him that his prosperity was the delight of the Faithful, and that the messenger was less than the dust before his greatness, he went on to say the most just and clement Sultan had resolved to dismiss him to Paradise, to receive the reward of his good works.

"God is great," ejaculated the officer, and, without murmur or remonstrance, he laid aside his pipe, and calmly submitted his neck to the bowstring.

In countries where life is under the guardianship of fixed laws a man regards it as a valuable capital, which he manages at his own discretion, and feels that he has the most direct interest in preserving. In despotic countries no one thinks his life is his own property. He holds it by the capricious, uncertain tenure of another's will, and learns not to calculate or value it. The mere instinctive fear of death is nearly all he has to contend with, and that their deep undoubting faith half disarms.

The officer had been raised from the lower ranks, and the fall of his family was utter—complete.

One of his wives fled with her children to a lawless tribe of Berbers near the Spanish fortress of Ceuta; another retired with her son, Achmed, to a small house close to the city walls, trusting Caled, the successor of her husband, and the Basha would forget their existence. She was mistaken in her hopes. Caled Bey declared he had the Sultan's order to convey the son of the late officer to Fez, where the imperial court was then held. The sanctuary of the harem could not be violated, but a close watch was kept on the widow's dwelling, in order to intercept the son when he left the house. The old lady took such care to spread a report that her son had escaped from the city, that it came to be generally credited.

In the meantime the youth pined in the close confinement he was subjected to. He was hardly sixteen, and the buoyancy of youth rebelled against being a prisoner. To give him the privilege of enjoying the evening air on the roof, where men dare not appear, and to disguise him more effectually from the reach of his enemy, Caled Bey, his mother dressed him in the costume of a Moorish maiden, and introduced him to her neighbors as the daughter of a deceased sister. As the widow was known to be unfortunate, she was not excessively troubled by the visits of friends. The house adjoining hers was occupied by an old priest, whose limited household consisted of one wife and one daughter, the youngest of his children, and perhaps a servant or two. With this daughter the pretended niece of the widow formed a close friendship. While the elder ladies enjoyed a pipe and a quiet dish of scandal, the young ones, each with an arm around the other, would walk the terrace and recite the wild legends or wilder love songs of the Arab poets.

Achmed grew more reconciled to his female trappings, at first so irksome, and daily expressed less impatience to join the Berbers, as he originally intended, though he insisted on attending his mother to the fountains when she went for water, and to the "Field of the Dead," when she went on Friday to water the flowers that grew on her husband's grave. Perhaps he thought the exercise necessary for his health; at any rate, he was sure to meet his pretty neighbor at the fountain and in the sacred ground. He found some other acquaintance among the fair dames of Tetuan, and everywhere the gay, witty niece of the widow was a welcome visitor. He had ceased to complain of the confinement of the harem, although nearly a year had passed away in its monotonous seclusion. He wore his haigue with such a grace, and was so sprightly and entertaining to his mother's friends, that more than one lady asked the supposed niece in marriage for her son, and were not a little surprised to find her so averse to matrimony. The good priest next door had hinted to the widow his disposition and ability to add another jewel to his harem, but his overtures were most unaccountably repulsed.

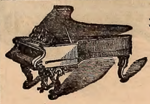
As a man never sees his wife's face before the marriage, they have to depend on the opinion of their old lady friends, who are regular marriage brokers in Moslem countries. These useful personages were not exactly agreed as to the respective superiority of Achmed or the priest's daughter, Amuna. Achmed was too tall, certainly, and not quite so soft in language as Amuna; but then in wit and gaiety he equalled Ayesha, the best beloved of the Prophet.

In short, the friends were the most celebrated belles of their quarter, and rivals, as it were, in spite of themselves. The old priest had caused it to be entrusted to Caled Bey, who had ordered some inquiries to be made touching the personal attractions of the rival beauties, that Amuna would bring a dower worthy of his notice, while the widow's niece would, according to the more usual custom, demand one. Caled Bey wished to appropriate both, and carried out this plan by making overtures to the priest for his daughter, and informing the widow that he wished, or rather commanded, her niece to attend his bride to his mansion as her future companion. The old lady flatly refused to part with her niece, and threatened to appeal to the Basha, if the officer persisted in his demand. Amuna, on her part, entreated and implored her father not to consign her to a man so notorious as Caled Bey unhappily was, for repulsive looks and domestic harshness.

The old priest was not so ridiculously indulgent as to refuse a rich son-in-law merely because he had a taste for killing his wives and his daughter detested him, and the marriage went on. The mother of Amuna exchanged presents with the senior wives of Caled, the day, dower, and jewels were fixed upon, and the bride ceased to lament, that she might examine her robes in company with her confidant, the widow's niece. Achmed, too, gave up all opposition to Caled's order, and submitted so cheerfully to an adoption in that officer's household, that his mother, in sheer disappointment, left the city the morning of the nuptials.

Attended by her faithful companion, Achmed, Amuna was conducted in state to her husband's mansion, where, loaded with gems and embroideries, she received the congratulations of her fair friends. Caled, according to the Moorish custom, paraded through the city with a gallant train on horseback, and at the lucky moment when his bride was lifted over the threshold of his house, amid music, and shouts, and the ringing of firearms, he turned his face homeward to meet his invited guests at the bridal banquet in the men's apartments.

When the hour approached at which he was to see for the first time the face of his wife, Caled withdrew to the inner apartments. A servant wished to interrupt him to inquire whether he had ordered a horse to remain at the door saddled for instant use. The bridegroom impatiently waved him away, and entered the chamber.



Before him, on a wide divan of crimson and gold, trembling through her gorgeous veil, knelt his unconscious bride, but nearer and between them flashed a gleaming blade in the hands of the stranger youth. It was Achmed who presented his sharp steel to the bosom of Caled Bey, and commanded silence. Indignant, yet wonder-stricken, he obeyed.

"Swear, by Alla and his Prophet, by the grave of your mother, and your hopes of Paradise, that you will neither prevent our escape or pursue us for the rising and setting of two suns, and live: refuse and die," was the brief alternative offered by the stripling.

It was accepted. Amuna, hastily throwing off the cumbrous trappings of the marriage ceremony, and honestly selecting from her jewels those only which were the gift of her father, passed forth with Achmed, amid the astonished household, mounted with him, unopposed, the fleet charger at the door, and in an hour had left the walls of Tetuan and the possibility of pursuit far behind. Ten days after a mounted Arab presented himself at the gate of Tetuan, leading a steed caparisoned in the rich trappings that had graced Caled's wedding-day.

"Achmed, my friend and guest," said he, as he transferred the bridle to a soldier at the gate, "the brave and prosperous Achmed greets Caled Bey, and wishes honor and increase to his house, and may every day be like the one in which they last embraced."

Our Vegetables and Flowers.—Almost all our corn, vegetables and flowers were brought from foreign countries. Rye and wheat are indigenous to Tartary and Siberia, rice was first brought from Ethiopia, buckwheat from Asia, potatoes from Brazil, gourds and melons from Astracan, cauliflowers from Cyprus, asparagus from Asia, cresses from Crete, parsley from Egypt, shalots from Siberia, &c. Jasmin came from the East Indies, the elder tree from Persia, tulip from Cappadocia, daffodil from Italy, lily from Syria, tuberose from Java and Ceylon, carnation and pink from Italy, aster from China, &c. In short, nearly every choice garden flower now cultivated is of foreign origin, and in general from a warmer climate than ours.

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

THE BITTER FRUITS OF BAD BITTERS.—Invalid reader do you know what nine-tenths of the Bitter compounds you are solicited by the proprietors to accept as universal panaceas are composed of? Give heed for a moment. They are manufactured from unpurified alcohol, containing a considerable portion of fusel oil, a poison almost as deadly as prussic acid. The basis of the regular tinctures of the Materia Medica is the same. No amount of "herbal extracts" can overcome the bad tendency of this pernicious element. The Essence of sound Rye thoroughly rectified, is the only stimulant which can be safely used as a component of a Tonic, alterative and anti-bilious medicine, and HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS is the only medicinal preparation in the world in which this article is used as an ingredient. Hence the extraordinary effects of this great specific. It gives strength without producing excitement. No other Tonic does this. All the ordinary Bitters flush the face and affect the brain. Hostetter's Bitters diffuse an agreeable calm through the nervous system, promote digestion and produce sleep. No other Tonic so quickly revives the exhausted physical energies, restores the appetite, and removes the gloom and depression which always accompanies weakness of the bodily powers.

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 455—VOL. XVIII.] NEW YORK, JUNE 18, 1864. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4.00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1.00.

The Campaign — Grant and Sherman — Richmond and Atlanta.

ANOTHER week of signal and uninterrupted successes has been added to the glorious record of our advancing armies, East and West. Grant thundering at the gates of Richmond, and Sherman sweeping down with his irresistible columns upon Atlanta, are the great historical facts of the day. The heart of every Unionist rejoices, while the chiefs, organs and oracles of the rebellion are amazed and confounded.

These treacherous guides of a deluded people are now beginning to realise their folly, and to hint at their hopeless situation. Their hitherto unfailing devices of audacious falsehoods and brazen deceptions have failed to account, to the satisfaction of their credulous followers, for the presence of Gen. Grant in front of Richmond and of Gen. Sherman at Atlanta. And why? Because the popular credulity of the South had been flattered with the promises of a crushing campaign through Maryland and Pennsylvania by Gen. Lee, and a sweeping invasion of Ohio by Gen. Jo. Johnston with an army of veterans 100,000 strong.

These royal promises, contrasted with the sorry performances of both Lee and Johnston, have demanded an explanation beyond the inventive faculties of the rebel leaders to make. But they have, nevertheless, tried, by the boldest misrepresentations and effrontery, to make it appear that Lee and Johnston are doing wonders towards the achievement of Southern independence. Thus, when a few weeks ago the people of Virginia inquired why Gen. Lee, instead of moving across the Potomac, was on the road to Richmond, with Gen. Grant close upon his flanks, they were answered that Gen. Lee is drawing the Yankees away from Washington. He will still entice them on to Richmond with a small force, so disposed as to appear a large army, while, with the main body of his troops, he pushes around into Maryland, captures Washington, liberates Baltimore, and next proceeds to levy his military contributions upon abolition Quakers of Pennsylvania. So in the West, as the famous retreater, Jo. Johnston, with the advance of Sherman upon him, was dislodged and fell back from point to point, it was proclaimed that his plan was to lure the Yankee army down into the heart of Georgia, that it might be the more effectually destroyed. But these shallow prevarications and excuses are now at an end, and from Virginia to Mobile the organs of Jeff Davis are beginning broadly to hint the truth that can no longer be concealed—that Richmond is in danger; that Jo. Johnston is powerless to stay the onward march of the Yankees, even at Atlanta, and that the "Confederacy" cannot survive the fall of Richmond or the loss of Georgia.

With such admissions as these from Richmond and Georgia, we cannot doubt that with the fall of the rebel capital the whole establishment of the so-called "Confederate States," financial, political and military, will immediately collapse. With the fall of Richmond the prestige and the credit of Jeff Davis abroad will quickly disappear. He will get no more "financial and material aid" from English capitalists and speculators, ironclad shipbuilders, cotton loan takers or blockade-runners. From England to China Davis and his Confederacy will be regarded as exploded and extinct with the fall of Richmond. Nor will the immediate consequences among the people of the rebellious States be different. With their general Government expelled from Richmond, where is it to find a place of refuge? It becomes a vagrant, "without a local habitation or a name," and it than appears to its dupes in its true character of a swindling imposture, a hideous despotism and an intolerable nuisance. The moral effect at home and abroad of the loss of his capital will of itself be fatal to Davis and his hopeless cause. Otherwise the loss of Virginia and the cannon foundries, the factories for small-arms, the machine shops, the flour, cotton and woollen mills, the clothing manufactories, the sources of subsistence, and magazines of ammunition, etc., that will be lost to the Confederacy with the capture of Richmond, will, at this desperate crisis in the fortunes of the rebel Council of Five Hundred, bring their usurpations, their labors, their fears, and their hopes at once to an end.

They know it, they feel it, and they are at length constrained to confess it, that their model of a Southern Confederacy, founded upon the corner-stone of slavery, and set up in the name of King Cotton, has proved a deception, a delusion and a snare, and is vanishing like a castle in the clouds. The profound sagacity of Gen. Grant in making the rebel capital the principal object of all the combinations of this grand campaign, will soon be made apparent with the capture of Richmond, and the genuine collapse of the rebellion that will instantly follow, in every quarter, in every shape, and in everything, from Virginia to Texas.

"Joy to the World!"

THE INTRODUCTION OF

PERRY DAVIS'S PAIN KILLER

To the suffering humanity of this age, has relieved more pain and caused more real joy than any other one thing that can be named.

IT IS A

"BALM FOR EVERY WOUND!"

Our first physicians use and recommend its use.

The apothecary finds it first among the medicines called for, and the wholesale druggist considers it a leading article of his trade. All the dealers in medicine speak alike in its favor; and its reputation as a medicine of great merit and virtue is fully and permanently established.

A. N. WILLIAMS, Parkersburg, Va., one of the oldest and most respectable and reliable druggists of Western Virginia, writes:

"I can say of Perry Davis's Pain Killer what I could not say of many of the medicines of the day. In my trade it is a leading article. I sell largely of it, and it gives entire satisfaction to all. I would on no account be without it."

JOHN PARKINS, druggist, at Athens, Ohio, writes:

"I sell considerable of Davis's Pain Killer in this place, and it is well liked and highly commended by all who use it."

GEO. WILLIAMS, druggist, at Hockingport, O., writes:

"Perry Davis's Pain Killer is quite generally used by the inhabitants of our town, and is much extolled. I think it the best medicine I have for the uses for which it is recommended."

WHILST ordering the arrangements in front of your house, bear in mind that a man is often judged by his gait.

Summary of the Week.

VIRGINIA.

To make the situation of affairs more clear to our readers, and enable them to follow the operations of the armies, we have treated of Grant's and Butler's armies separately. But Grant, inexorable as death or fate, has pressed on till the army under Butler is at his immediate disposition.

On the 29th Grant's cavalry crossed the Pamunky at Hanovertown, routing the enemy in a spirited engagement south of Hawe's store. Here Grant took up his quarters, and soon had his army in line, extending from Shady Grove Church, where Warren took post in sight of Richmond, to beyond the head of Tolopatomoy creek.

Lee's position was behind the Chicahominy.

On Monday evening the rebels, apparently under Ewell, attacked Crawford's division, and crowded it back, but Warren brought up his whole force, and easily repulsed them.

On Tuesday Gen. Sheridan, at the other end of the line, routed the forces of Fitzhugh Lee and Clingman at Coal Harbor, taking many officers.

The next day Grant made an attack with his left, consisting of the 6th corps and Smith's troops, and finally, after dark carried the enemy's work in front; Smith's proved to be untenable however. The enemy, to divert attention, attacked other parts of our line, but were repulsed.

On Saturday night the enemy attacked Hancock, Wright and Smith, but were everywhere repulsed. Hancock is now within 40 yards of Lee's works, and Lee is throwing up entrenchments on the muddy banks of the Chicahominy. Grant has indeed failed to force the passage of the river, but his generalship is not exhausted.

On the Peninsula Gen. Gillmore is in command, and Beauregard, finding the offensive abandoned, has sent off much of his force to swell the ranks, and restore the spirits of Lee and Johnston.

The two great armies now confront each other definitely in the strip of country, some 10 miles wide, that lies between the Pamunky and the upper waters of the Chicahominy. Grant's line, from Cold Harbor to Atlee's, on the Central railroad, is fully seven miles in length; while Lee is somewhat more contracted.

On Friday, the 3rd of June, Grant's first battle before Richmond was fought, and the people of the rebel capital, as two years ago, heard the thunder of artillery and beheld the smoke of battle curling above the woods that skirt the city. There was less cause for sanguine hope now. It was not a Confederate attack on an isolated corps of the American army, but an attack by Grant on the entrenchments, to which Lee had been forced back from the Rapidan.

The attack began at half-past four A. M., and Barlow's division of Hancock's corps drove the enemy within his entrenchments at all points, but without gaining any decisive advantage beyond the capture of 300 prisoners, chiefly from Breckinridge, and gaining points nearer the enemy's line.

In the evening about 7 o'clock the enemy made a sudden attack on Smith's brigade of Gibbons's division, but were repulsed after a sharp fight of half an hour.

About the same time Wilson, with his cavalry, fell on the rear of a brigade of Heth's rebel division, and drove them in confusion.

NORTH CAROLINA.

A terrible catastrophe, by which 40 New York soldiers were killed, occurred near Newbern, N. C., on the 26th ult. Four torpedoes were accidently exploded as the train containing them reached the station. The signal tower, near by, was blown 800 feet into the air.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The rebels announce an advance of our troops on Secessionville and the danger of Charleston, now almost stripped of soldiers.

GEORGIA.

An engagement took place on the 28th between the enemy and McPherson's corps, in which the rebels were driven back, with a loss to them of 2,500 killed and wounded left in our hands, and about 300 prisoners. Gen. McPherson's loss not being over 300 in all.

The rebels made an attack on Sherman on the 31st ult., but were repulsed after a sharp and brilliant engagement. Gen. Thomas had reached Marietta, and Gen. McPherson was within 12 miles of Atlanta. Gen. Johnston is falling back with his demoralised army to Athens, and Gen. Polk is retreating towards Macon.

On June 2d Gen. Stoneman, by a skilful movement, got possession of Allatoona gap, a position of great importance.

ALABAMA.

Col. Long, commanding the cavalry of the 17th army corps, recently defeated Molten, a division of Roddy's horse, under Col. Johnson, killing the latter and several of his officers.

MISSISSIPPI.

Forrest is said to be at Tupelo, with 1,500 men, and predatory parties are hovering around various parts of Tennessee and Kentucky.

THE MISSISSIPPI.

The failure of Banks's operations in Louisiana has emboldened the guerillas, who, finding great numbers of troops withdrawn, have begun their depredations again.

The gunboat Curlew was attacked by a rebel battery at Gaines's landing on the 25th; but after returning the fire for an hour and a half the gunboat drove the rebels off. Rebel batteries on the Red river are giving much annoyance.

Advices from Memphis to the 31st ult., state that the tinclads Marmon, Juliet and Prairie Bird recently drove away the rebel batteries at Gaines's landing. The marine brigade boat Delta had her donkey-engine shot overboard and her engineer killed. The rebels are said to have had 12 pieces of artillery. They captured and burned the steamer Lebanon, taking the crew and passengers off as prisoners. The English Government had, on the news of Grant's victories, bought Laird's rams, and the rebels sold the Georgia. The Queen's Bench discharged the Gerety pirates. On Monday last the rebel Gen. Shelby captured Dardanelles, and took some 200 prisoners. Jacksonport and Batesville have been evacuated by our forces.

LOUISIANA.

A great fire at New Orleans, evidently the work of a rebel incendiary, destroyed, on the 27th of May, the steamer Black Hawk, and with it the Empire Parish, Meteor, Fawn, Time and Tide, Bell Lee, New Orleans and Bell Creole, with two schooners, all owned or employed by Government.

ARKANSAS.

Dispatches from St. Louis report the burning of a train and brutal massacre of some 80 men and women—Union refugees from Jacksonville—at Salem, Ark., by a band of 300 guerillas.

NAVAL.

The rebel privateer Florida entered the port of Hamilton, Bermuda, on the 12th of May, on a "flying visit" to obtain American newspapers and letters. She reported only one vessel—the Avon—as burned by her commander.

CONGRESS.

IN the Senate, May 30th, the proceedings were of no public interest, being chiefly confined to slight modifications in the Tax bill.

In the House, Mr. Schenck moved to bring in a bill for the summary punishment of guerillas. Mr. Yeaman was also decided to be entitled to the vacant seat for Kentucky by 94 to 26. Mr. Layear offered a Peace resolution, which was objected to. After some other unimportant business of a technical or local nature, the house adjourned.

In the Senate, May 31st, Mr. Davis submitted resolutions to investigate the character of General Butler. No vote was taken, and the rest of the sitting was given to the Internal Revenue bill.

In the House, the Ohio and East Tennessee bill was passed by 64 to 56. The House then took up the bill proposing to the several States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of said States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of said Constitution, namely: "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except in the punishment of crime, of which the party shall be duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or in any place within their jurisdiction, and Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to carry the foregoing article into effect." Mr. Holman objected to the second reading, and the question occurred, "Shall the bill be rejected?" This was determined in the negative, by yeas, 55; nays, 76. Mr. Wilson said it was not his intention to press the bill to a vote to-night; he would allow a reasonable time for debate. Mr. Morris addressed the House in favor of the passage of the bill.

In the Senate, June 1st, Mr. Sherman, Ohio, from the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the National Bank bill, made a report. He explained that there were only six points of difference between the Senate and the House, the latter having generally agreed to the forms and amendments. The most material amendment was to require all banks, East and West, to redeem their currency at par in New York. The report was agreed to.

In the House, the Bankrupt bill was reported, and Mr. Jenckes supported it in a very elaborate speech. A motion to lay it over to December was negatived by a majority of 21.

In the Senate, on the 2d, the business was confined to the consideration of the Internal Revenue bill.

In the House, the Tariff bill was discussed, and the Pacific Railway bill was postponed for a short period.

In the Senate, on the 4th, after several routine matters had been attended to, the tax bill was taken into consideration and some progress made in it. The amendments proposed and adopted were, however, of no public interest.

In the House, the Bankrupt bill was debated, Elijah Ward speaking in favor of it, and Mr. Garfield against it; no conclusion was adopted.

In the Senate, on the 4th, the only subject debated was the Internal Revenue or Tax bill; little progress was made.

In the House, a very spirited debate occurred between Messrs. Spaulding, Garfield and Jenckes, relative to sharp remarks used towards each other by the two former gentlemen on the previous day, in the discussion of the Bankrupt bill. On the conclusion of this a motion was made to adjourn over until Wednesday next, to enable the members to attend the Baltimore Convention, which was voted down by a large majority, and the Tariff bill was again taken up in Committee of the Whole, and its consideration proceeded with to a conclusion, when the committee rose, and the bill was reported to the House, and passed by 81 yeas to 26 nays.

TOWN GOSSIP.

CITIES are great sores upon the face of the earth. They are evidences of the struggle of man against the Almighty. He gives us the green fields, the waving trees, the rippling, murmuring streams, and we blot them out. We kill the green grass, and put in its stead cobble stones and Belgian pavements. We hew down the glorious trees, and build up tall, smoking factories and brown stone palaces, and the pure, sweet streams we turn into sewers and kennels, all of which is typical of man's mind.

Spring in the city—in our climate—is not provocative of a longing for the country. It requires a month or two to awake the sluggish blood of those who have been so long caged within bricks and mortar, living an unnatural life, and doing their best to undo what nature has done for them, and awaken the instinctive desire for a roll upon the grass, or a free romp under the broad heavens, where Mrs. Grundy cannot see, and where the senior member of the firm of Dildrum, Doldrum & Co., on whom we are dependent for "little accommodations," or "goods at six months," does not come.

New York is going out of town! We mean the sensible part of it. Miss Flora M'Flimsey does not go to Saratoga or Newport until late in August, and as to going in the country, the thing is pre-pos-tu-rous! The first day of summer has come, and carriages rumble out from up-town streets, laden with glad little men and women who have not yet reached the age to sigh after Saratoga and Newport, but who have some glorious ideas about catching and killing fish on a pin hook, and gathering all kinds of floral stuffs from all kinds of places. Carriages laden with stout trunks and inevitable band-boxes, and topped off with baby's chair, and possibly a small assortment of youthful wheelbarrows and garden implements, adapted in size for infantile hands.

Oh! for the early days when there was a real country about the city. When every farm-house was not occupied by a broken-down metropolitan boarding-house keeper, who lies in wait with promises of "plenty of vegetables, fruit, milk and eggs," to attract verdant city folks who would rusticate, and after charging them a little more than hotel prices, sends them back starved and disgusted to their comfortable and deserted homes. Oh! for the time when the sturdy farmer took a few boarders from town during the season, not because it was necessary plunder to allow him to exist through the coming winter, but from a double motive—firstly, that the cooped-up citizen might get a breath of fresh air for himself and family; and secondly, that he might have company through the season, and that wife and daughters might hear something about the fashions, and have something to talk about during the long winter evenings. Those days are gone never to return, and now the rurally disposed citizen must seek "John Brown's Tract," or the far Rocky Mountains, unless he is willing to be taken in and done for, by boarding-house keepers, who have played out the gamut in the city, or by farmers—Heaven save the mark!—who look upon all human nature as summer boarders, and count up how much greater profit can be made by allowing their ill-grown garden truck to be devoured on the premises, than by sending it to a city market.

Enough on that head!

As having some connection with rural subjects we incline to discourse slightly upon worms. Periodically New York is attacked by worms. The plague of locusts, or the grasshopper irruption upon Utah that threatened, a few years ago, to eat up Brigham Young and his 70 wives, was a mere flea bite in comparison. A quarter of an hour's walk in some localities, and the walker makes his appearance covered with the "varmints," not of the crawling kind, but long steppers, who, arching their backs like a Kilkenny cat at bay, stretch themselves out in a way that threatens at one stride to reach from the bonnet to the shoulder, to the tip of the nose, and then—goodness only knows where next. These inch, or measuring worms, are as a great a nuisance as this busy city is obliged to put up with. They are everybody's business and nobody's business. Easily destroyed, and yet suffered to live and thrive from year to year. They are an example of what men unwillingly submit to when the power to abate the nuisance is in their own hands. Why do men submit to rats? Why to cats, who prowl by night, and why to dogs who have no masters and only vagrants? Thinking of this we despair of the doing away with the worms.

No! the worms shall be with us always.

The 15th annual regatta of the New York Yacht Club came off on Friday, June 3. The day was splendid, with a fine sailing wind, and everybody felt exceedingly jolly. Two steamboats, the Matteawan, for the club, and the Meta, for the press and invited guests, accompanied the race. So many hard things have been said by the press and the public in past years about the miserable accommodation furnished by the club that we feel happy to say that the lessons have been of service, and the affair altogether was happily managed. As far as regards eating and drinking all was eminently serene, and appetites and drinkitites had a good chance of disappearing under the treatment of the accomplished physicians who presided.

At a little after ten the steamers floated away from the foot of 20th street, gay with streamers and full with happy freight, and sped to the spot where lay the fleet, waiting, like white-winged birds, for the first alarm that should frighten them to flight. It came soon through the silver speaking-trumpet wielded by Mr. Haswell, and away they slipped, as though gliding over the launch-ways, and out turned Jersey City, where, as though by appointment, a stiff southerly breeze was in waiting and the fleet ready to embrace it. Nine was the number; three schooners, the Julia, Juinata and Maggie, and six sloops, the Annie, Narragansett, Richmond, Nettie, White Wing and Geraldine. All craft cleared the way before the flying yachts and saluted them as they sped on. The start was made at half-past 10, and Robins's reef was passed by the leading boat, the Annie, at 39 minutes past 11. At 12 the wind slackened. The destination was the south-west spit buoy, which was to be turned. As we passed Fort Lafayette an enthusiastic individual was seen to wave his cambric from the grassy slopes outside, but in a moment, even before the glasses that were levelled at him could measure his identity, a cruel sentinel violently squelched the demonstration, though not before the reportorial tribe had decided that the squelched party was Howard of the Times, their old associate. At the south-west spit the Annie was still ahead, rounding it at 21 minutes past 1 o'clock, and away they all went for home, and then what a jolly dinner, or rather what jolly people to eat it.

The Annie led the whole way, and came up to the stake boat at Hoboken at 59 minutes and 20 seconds—mark the seconds—past 3, making the whole run in 5 hours 29 minutes and 20 seconds, and a merry run it was. And then how proudly the little sloop ran up her pennant in salutation to the complimentary cheers—bells and steam-whistles—and sailed round and round the stake-boat, and what waving of handkerchiefs and glancing of bright eyes there were, and how pleasantly every one went home to wait, though not patiently, for the next regatta.

One of the notabilities of the week is the advent on New York of Major (?) Pauline Cushman. This young lady was once, if we are not mistaken, an actress, but with the breaking out of the rebellion, changed her vocation to a different stage, and became a scout and spy for the Federal army. According to all accounts she has been several times at Richmond and at other points inside the rebel lines, and has passed through some queer adventures. Her present domicile is the Astor House, and any fine day the major may be seen riding in Central Park, surrounded by an escort of shoulder-straps, who like New York better than the tented field.

Volunteering, or rather the paying of bounties to volunteers, has stopped in New York, and under the advice of the powers that be, the draft is to take its course. Patriots who have heretofore contented themselves with fighting wordy battles in bar-rooms, will now have a chance to serve their country in a more practical way, either by donating their muscles to its service, or by substituting the muscles of somebody else at a stipulated tax on their pockets. What a refreshing memory it will be to those who send substitutes to the field, to know in the evening of their days that having been elected to a place among its defenders, they sent a representative who fought, bled and died, and his bones whiten on the soil of Virginia. How much better this is than going ones-self and getting killed. It is so unpleasant to be shot.

The unexampled prosperity of theatrical matters at this time leaves little for the historian to record of ups and downs, or of gigantic efforts to attract public attention. The mere mention of an entertainment, provided it has anything in it worthy of notice, is sure to attract a crowd. New York audiences are proverbially the most indulgent in the world; the day has gone by when a play or an actor is condemned either by hissing, or, as was customary in the days of the old Park Theatre, by laughing them down. New York theatre-goers bear everything, and only show their displeasure by keeping away from the entertainments, sometimes not even so much as that. We honestly believe that in no other city in the world, professing taste, could such actors and such plays be gagged down the people as New York managers and showmen thrust continually. Especially is this the case just now, when plethoric treasuries make managers careless and easy to please audiences, teach them that it is useless to spend money in the production of novelties, when that said stupid and inane public are just as well pleased with the trash that is nightly dished up for them.

With this preamble we have little to record. Manager Wheatley sticks to "Bel Demonio" and Vestvali, and full houses are the result of the sticking. Thousands attend there every night, in hope that they will eventually be in at the time when Vestvali shall make the perilous jump from that perpetual precipice that shall break her into pieces, not five-act pieces. "Bel Demonio" for another week.

The Florences have made so great a hit with "Fra Diavolo" that they want nothing new for a week more. A rather funny burlesque of the Davenport Brothers has been introduced in it.

Last week Mrs. Wood produced "Aladdin," about which and its preparation so much had been promised. "Aladdin" is produced with lots of effects, songs, dances, jokes, quips, quirks and pretty women. Mrs. Wood played Aladdin, Mrs. Sedley Brown the Princess, while Stoddart does up the Widow Twankey in as funny a way as the law permits.

"Capt. Bland" was withdrawn at Wallack's, and justly. It was written for a Bowery locality, and pruned down to suit Broadway. This pruning, while it has not helped the morality or respectability of the piece, has cut away all the merit of it, supposing it ever had any, which is doubtful. The hero captain, done in his usual style by Lester Wallack, seems to have devoted the best years of his life to the pursuit of matrimony under difficulties. He has succeeded in his infantile years in contracting alliances with some 70 or a 100 females—more or less—and is still ardently pursuing other chances to perpetrate the same violation of the statutes. On this fact hinges all the action of the play, which has undoubtedly been written under the last literary idea, that nothing is safe for publication and public approval unless the hero or heroine commit bigamy.

All that a proper putting upon the stage, and a good company could do for "Captain Bland," was done, but we think we hazard nothing in saying the bigamistic captain is a thing of the past.

Barnum, with an eye to the patriotic tastes of his patrons, succeeded in making an engagement with Major Pauline Cushman, who daily and nightly recounts her exploits at twenty-five cents a hearing. To enable her to do this in a satisfactory way, the great irrepressible has arranged for an 11 o'clock, A. M. discourse from the major, who will, at that time each day, fight her battles o'er again. Mdlle. Ernestine, one of the prettiest and most finished danseuses we have seen on New York boards, still remains at the Museum.

A new Davenport sensation was brought out during the past week, at Cooper Institute, in the persons of two ladies, one a sister of the Davenport brothers, who undertook to do the same things as were done by the latter. The young ladies, who certainly showed great coolness for debutantes, as they were announced to be, amid all the excitement of the audience, did do the same as the Davenports, though they certainly did not do it as well. Whatever the secret is we can only say that the Davenport Brothers perform it deftly, and having had years of practice, must of course be greater adepts in it than two young ladies who are beginners. We have only to say, that if there is anything to discover, a New York audience, with all the natural prying disposition of the full-blooded Yankee, heightened by education, will have a better chance to discover it in the present case, than with the more skilled brothers, who know all the ropes, and are not easily caught napping.

NEW MUSIC.—We notice with pleasure, two new works by Franz Schlotter, a composer well known to our musical readers. The one is a song, "When other Friends are Round Thee," words by G. P. Morris, and published through Pond & Co. Mr. Schlotter's music accords well with the tenderness of the poetry; it is a charming composition, and will have, without doubt, great popularity. Mr. Schlotter's latest piano composition, "Le Martha de Noel," published by Beer & Schirmer, is a work both melodious and effective, without being difficult.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The first Normal School in our country was opened at Lexington, Mass., 25 years ago, and it is proposed to celebrate the quarter century anniversary in July. The Massachusetts Board of Education have made suitable arrangements for the celebration, which will take place at the Normal School in Framingham. Rev. Samuel J. May will deliver the address, and Rev. Eben S. Stearns the poem. The occasion will doubtless call together a large number of the teachers, graduates and members of normal schools and all others interested in education.

—— Last Sunday night the telegraph wires were connected through from Portland, Maine, to St. Louis, Mo., making a circuit of over 2,000 miles.

—— The amount of subscriptions to the 10-40 loan reported at the Treasury department up to the 2d of June was $100,036,000.

—— The Universalist Church in Stowe, Vt., is divided into Union and Copperhead factions, who have arranged to have preaching on alternate Sundays after their respective hearts. But the Copperheads took possession a Sunday or two ago, and refused to permit the abolition minister to enter, whereupon a quarrel ensued.

—— The 10th session of the American Pomological Society will be held in Rochester, N. Y., Sept. 13, and will continue several days.

—— The mass Convention met at Cleveland, Ohio, on the 31st May, and with great unanimity nominated Fremont for President and John Cochrane for Vice-President. No other candidates were talked about; it is considered by many to be a flank movement on Lincoln. Some Democrats, indeed, have gone so far as to recommend the same nominations at Chicago. The Baltimore Convention will be just as much in favor of Mr. Lincoln as the Cleveland one was for the great Pathfinder.

—— A subscription to our Sanitary Fair has been opened in London, to which Jos. Bates, of Baring Bros., subscribed $5,000: Mr. McHenry, $5,000; and Mr. Peabody, $10,000. Every loyal American is expected to put his name down for a handsome sum.

—— A correspondent says that education is receiving some attention in New Jersey. The recent appointments of teachers in Hoboken having been dictated with sole reference to their fitness for their positions.

—— There were only two bids to clean the city on the 2d of June, one for $575,000 and the other for $500,000. Some years ago Mr. Astor offered to do it for $100,000.

—— Considerable merriment was created in the law courts last week by the appearance of Count Joannes, who brought his hotel bills, duly receipted, in answer to John Cl[illegible]y's assertion that the Count was not pecuniarily responsible. Strange to say, the Judge was not convinced on the spot, but demanded a day to give his decision. The Count ought to indict the Judge.

—— On Saturday afternoon, the 4th June, a mass meeting was held in Union Park in honor of Gen. Grant. It was attended by about 20,000 persons; the principal speakers were Ex-Mayor Opdyke, C. P. Daly, Senator Pomeroy, Chauncey Schaffer, Magnus Gross, Rollins, Hiram Walbridge, J. T. Brady, a person named Tyler, who kept the meeting in a roar of laughter by his poetry, and Gen. T. F. Meagher, who spoke with his usual force and aptness.

Military.—It is a very remarkable fact that while the Union correspondents, in describing our battles, account for our small loss in some of them to the rebels firing too high, the rebel papers say the same thing of our men. There ought to be some instruction given to our troops in this matter.

—— Gen. Sherman having asked the superintendent of a construction train what time it would take him to replace the bridge near Resaca, and having been told that it would take at least four days, replied: "Sir, I give you 48 hours, or a position in the front ranks before the enemy!" The bridge was completed in 48 hours.

—— Major-Gen. Carl Schurz has been placed in command of the convalescent barracks at Nashville.

—— The 17th army corps, which, it will be remembered, was recently assigned to Gen. Frank Blair, has been thoroughly reorganized and strengthened, and left Huntsville, Ala., for Rome, to join Gen. Sherman's army. The corps is largely composed of re-enlisted veterans, who have seen hard service under their old commander, McPherson.

—— During General Birney's recent raid through Florida, a bright little girl was found alone at one house, her parents having skedaddled. She was rather non-committal, for she did not know whether the troops were Union or rebel. Two fine dogs made their appearance while a conversation was being held with the child, and she informed one of her questioners that their names were Gillmore and Beauregard. "Which is the best dog?" asked a bystander. "I don't know," said she; "they're both mighty smart dogs; but they'll either of 'em suck eggs if you don't watch 'em." The troops left without ascertaining whether the family, of which the girl was a hopeful scion, was Union or rebel.

—— Maj.-Gen. Fremont has resigned his commission in the army, and the President has accepted it, as it was not the intention of the Government to call him into service. The Tribune states that Gen. Fremont has handed over his pay since he has been unemployed for the benefit of the sick and wounded soldiers.

—— The rebel Gen. Ed. Johnson was captured by Frank Totman, of the Maine 17th. He took the rebel by the collar and told him he was his prisoner, when Johnson replied that he should not surrender to any one but the commander of the force. His captor replied, "Don't know anything about that; you can't get away from me!" and he took him to Gen. Hancock.

Personal.—Mdlle. Patti has just come of age, and it is stated that one of the first acts of her majority was to settle an annuity of 6,000f. a-year upon her father, and another to a like handsome amount upon her mother.

—— Lord Brougham is said to have commenced writing an autobiography.

—— Belle Boyd, the famous rebel spy, has arrived in Montreal, Canada.

—— Major Pauline Cushman, the female patriot spy and scout, is now in this city, sojourning at the Astor House.

—— A correspondent requests us to insert the following: "William H. Gerbrick, of Dayton, Montgomery county, Ohio, is desirous of finding his parents, Jacob and Mary Gerbrick, whom he has not seen or heard from since 1846. Then they were living in Pittsburg, Penn. They had lived in Somerset and York counties, Penn. Any paper copying this notice will confer a great favor on a discharged soldier of the 15th Iowa Volunteer Infantry."

—— Dr. Robt. Shelton Mackenzie, of the Philadelphia Press, gave a lecture the other night, with great success, in Harrisburg, on the Irish Poets.

Obituary.—Schneider, the renowned organist of Dresden, considered perhaps the greatest of German organists, died on the 13th April, in his 75th year. Another distinguished organist, Mynheer Tours, of Rotterdam, has also died lately; he was one of the first musicians of Holland, and for 30 years the director of the Eruditio Musical Society.

—— At Elmira, 28th of May, Capt. Geo. F. Watson, of the 180th regiment N. Y. V., and formerly of the 12th regiment N. Y. V. He was a brave and able officer, and was wounded at the battle of Gaines' Mill. He was aged 35 years.

—— Lieut. Hart, commanding battery L, 4th regiment U. S. H. artillery, was drowned on the night of the 30th May, while on his passage down the James river. It is supposed that he walked off the transport in his sleep.

—— Chevalier Hulsemann, who represented Austria for several years at Washington, died on the 8th March, at Georgia, Illyria, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health. He was born in 1799. He will be chiefly remembered for his controversy with Daniel Webster on the Martin Kosta affair.

—— The Rev. Frederick S. Wiley was buried on Friday, June 3, in Greenwood cemetery. He died in Florence, Italy. He was for several years one of the ministers of Grace Church, New York, where he made himself much beloved for his urbanity and goodness. He visited Europe last December to recruit his health.

—— On Thursday, June 2, the venerable Francis Price died at his residence, New York, in the 77th year of his age. He was one of the most respected of our citizens, a man of wealth and influence, and has for many years been closely identified with the growth and prosperity of our city. Mr. Price was born in New Jersey, where he owned large property. He was the father of ex-Governor Price, of that State.

—— Col. Peter A. Porter, of the 8th N. Y. V. H. artillery, who was killed on the 3d June, near Coal Harbor, Va., was a native of Niagara Co., N. Y., and a lawyer by profession. He raised the 8th H. artillery in 1862, and has since been actively employed.

—— Col. Frank Haskell, 36th Wisconsin, was killed on the 2d June, while assaulting the enemy's works. He entered the service as Lieutenant and Adjutant of the Sixth Wisconsin regiment, commanded by Col. (now Gen.) Cutler. Subsequently he was selected by Gen. Gibbon for service as Aide-de-Camp, because of his excellent judgment, his great bravery and coolness in battle. He passed through every battle in the Army of the Potomac, escaping unscathed, save at Gettysburg, where he was slightly wounded. During Gen. Gibbon's absence while wounded, Lieut. Haskell remained in the field, serving temporarily on the staff of Gen. Warren, when he commanded the 2d army corps. During the past winter the 36th Wisconsin regiment was organized, and Lieut. Haskell was promoted to the post of Colonel, an honor he had most brilliantly won.

Accidents and Offences.—Andrews, the New York rioter, has been sentenced to three years in the State Prison. Others who took part in the riots of July have been condemned to 10 years' imprisonment. The apparent disparity between the sentences is explained by the fact that the rioters previously sentenced were also convicted of robbery, arson and other offences.

—— About eleven o'clock on the night of Wednesday, June 1, off Cape May, a fearful collision happened between the steam transports City of Bath and Pocohontas, from the effects of which the latter sank, carrying down with her 40 of her passengers and crew. The Pocohontas was on her way from New Orleans to New York, with soldiers on furlough, many of whom have thus perished. The City of Bath was on her way to Washington, with Government stores. The Pocohontas was a steamer of 800 tons, and a capital boat. The night was very dark and hazy.

—— Some light-fingered and light-footed "gentleman" entered the sleeping-apartment of Secretary Chase, on the night of the 1st of June, and stole his gold watch and portemonnaie, which, fortunately, contained only $40 in greenbacks.

—— The San Francisco papers give a most circumstantial account of a duel betwen the famous Billy Mulligan and a Mr. Coleman. Each was armed with a six-barrel revolver, and at a given word they both blazed away their six shots a-piece. Coleman lost a finger and gained a bullet in his thigh. Mr. Mulligan was unhurt, and wanted the sport to continue, but the seconds put an end to the affair, and the two heroes left the ground with their friends.

—— On the 31st May, Mrs. Dubois, of Brooklyn, was run over and killed, in Broadway, near Grand street, by a cart, driven by a man named Lynch. The ruffian, who drove at a most reckless speed, was arrested, and committed to the Tombs for trial. Mrs. Dubois leaves three children to mourn her loss. The police are much to blame for not enforcing the municipal regulations.

—— A drunken lieutenant assaulted a servant of Gov. Andrew Johnson, in Nashville, and when the Governor interfered fired his pistol at him. The ball grazed the Governor's side and passed through his coat. The Governor thereupon knocked the fellow down and wounded him severely.

—— A great fire had happened in New Orleans, on the 27th May, when eight steamers were destroyed. The news comes by way of Cairo.

—— The New York Tribune says that Capt. Sam Black, U. S. Quartermaster, who was recently convicted at Louisville of perpetrating enormous frauds on the Government, has been pardoned; and that Hall & Smith, Western horse contractors, who had likewise been found guilty of the same offence, have had their sentence suspended. This makes the Tribune fear that Kohnstamm may receive Presidential sympathy and clemency.

—— The trial of Edward Hunter for the murder of his wife, before Recorder Hoffman, at the Court of General Sessions, resulted in a verdict of murder in the second degree. The trial has occupied ten days, and excited unusual interest. The prosecution was conducted by O. L. Stewart, Assistant District Attorney. The counsel for the prisoner were J. F. Walton and H. L. Clinton. There was no question raised as to the prisoner's having committed the homicide. The jury were out 48 hours endeavoring to arrive at a verdict.

—— On Wednesday, June 1, the extensive steam sawing establishment of Mr. Crane, 29th street, was entirely consumed by fire, as well as two tenement-houses; loss, about $30,000. At the same time a fire burst out in 23d street, on the North River.

—— The smokestack of the U. S. steam revenue cutter Kankakee, lying at the foot of Horatio street, which was imperfectly secured in its place by means of guys, fell, on the 4th inst., on the deck of the schooner Marie, lying alongside, instantly killing Zeno C. Baker, the captain of the schooner, a deck hand named John Dunn, and seriously injuring John McIlvane and an unknown man.

—— A German lager bier saloon-keeper, named Otto Bittner, was, on the 4th inst. shot through the arm, by Officer Stevenson, of the 31st Precinct, in Broadway, near 70th street.

Foreign.—The Emperor Napoleon III. has established at the Louvre, already so rich in curiosities and treasures of art, a Museum of Monarchs. Here will be collected all the personal memorials which can be secured of the sovereigns who have ruled over France. Among those now to be seen in this interesting collection are the following: Arms and fragments of royal ornaments belonging to Childeric; a curule chair of Dagobert; the prayer-book, sword and sceptre of Charlemagne; the breviary and baptismal vase of St. Louis; the armor worn by Francis I. on the famous field of Pavia; the prayer-book of Mary Stuart, Queen of Francis II.; the helmet and shield, splendidly inlaid, of the monster Charles IX.; the armor of Henri Quatre; the locksmith's tools of the hapless Louis XVI.; the crown worn by Napoleon I. at his coronation.

—— It is asserted on good authority that there are in London 16,000 children trained to crime, 15,000 men living by low gambling, 50,000 by constant thieving, 5,000 receivers of stolen goods, and 150,000 men and women subsisting by other disgraceful means. There are not less than 25,000 beggars. So that there are more than 250,000 persons in the London district, of all ages and sexes, who prey upon the honest and industrious part of the community.

—— The Paris Nation notices a rumor that the Pope has received extreme unction; but false reports of the Pontiff's health have been so frequent as to render the phrase "under all reserve" more than usually appropriate to this news.

—— The excavations which led to the discovery of Pompeii were made during the reign of Charles III., the first Bourbon King of Naples.

—— The Liverpool Albion gives 34 forms in which the name of Shakespeare has been spelled.

—— A Paris letter-writer says: "The world of Paris is gone mad after the Japanese. This embassy, regardless of the 'happy dispatch' which may await them on their return, are enjoying themselves in the most reckless manner. Only last night I found several secretaries of legation—where do you think? Why, actually behind the scenes of the Grand Opera, surrounded with ballet girls! European secretaries of legation know better than that, at any rate, though they do not know much as a rule. As for 'Mabille,' and the 'Chateau des Fleurs,' they are there every night. On Wednesday they 'entertained at dinner.' I saw the menu, but it contained nothing worth recording; judging, however, from the list of wines selected, I should say that the very best of everything is nearly good enough for the dusky diplomacy of Japan."

—— On the day of Garibaldi's arrival in London, 573,000 copies of his photographs were sold. At the last interview of Earl Russell with the great Liberator, he exchanged walking-sticks with him.

—— The Italian people are very much delighted with the enthusiastic reception given to Garibaldi by the people of England, and have held numerous meetings to thank them.

—— The opera of "Merry Wives of Windsor," is now the leading attraction in London and Paris. It is composed by Nicolai, who died very poor in Germany in 1849. The "Merry Wives" was first produced in Germany in 1849, but was not successful.

—— A new tenor has been singing at Milan, in opera too, who does not understand a word of music, and has to be taught everything by ear. A year ago he was a journeyman mattrass maker.

—— A new opera house is to be built at the watering-place of Monaco, on the Mediterranean, for the poorer classes, the rates of admission to be four cents.

—— The yield of the French coal mines for 1863, was equal to 10,000,000 of tons.

—— Sir Thomas Judkin Fitzgerald recently drowned himself near his residence at Golden, Ireland, under temporary insanity from pecuniary distress.

—— The Venetian Chamber of Notaries has just rejected an invitation made by the government to admit to that body persons of the Jewish religion.

—— Carlotta and Adelina Patti, Nantier, Didiée, Tamberlik and Ronconi, and William Vincent Wallace, are among the latest musical arrivals in London.

—— Gazzaniga has been lately playing at the Carrano theatre at Milan. One night she was sick, and Zacconi, a substitute, sang, pleasing so well that she was enabled to make a condition that she should retain the rôle in place of Gazzaniga. This aroused the anger of the latter, a lawsuit was the result, and in the meantime the manager is obliged to close the theatre.

—— It appears from evidence taken in a criminal court that it is a common practice to place counterfeit money in the collection plates in the English churches.

Art, Science and Literature.—G. P. R. James, the well-known novelist, who produced about three or four novels per annum, and apparently had not written himself out, left a posthumous work of fiction, entitled "Bernard Marsh," which has been published, ere this reaches our readers, by Mr. Bentley, of London. It consists of two volumes.

—— M. Renan is understood to be busy with a Life of St. Paul, "the founder of Christianity."

—— A translation is in the press of M. Victor Hugo's recent work on Shakespeare.

—— Mr. G. W. Carleton has in preparation a volume by Mr. H. T. Tuckerman, entitled "American Artist Life: Sketches of the Painters and Sculptors of America, from an early period down to the present time."

—— Elihu Burritt, "the Learned Blacksmith," has published his "Walk from London to John O'Groat's, with Notes by the Way," and the English reviewers speak well of it. The journey, on foot, from the extreme south of Great Britain to the extreme north, will probably be supplemented by the author's walk from the Land's End to London.

—— In a long review of a work on America, which appears in the Paris Moniteur, the writer states that "Go to head!" is the favorite motto on the other side of the Atlantic. He mentions this twice in the course of his criticism.

Odds and Ends.—There are now gathered together in the Central Park, New York, over 200 varieties of birds, American and foreign. They are left free to build their nests in the Park and to make it their resort from generation to generation.

—— Misfits are sometimes lucky. The bandits in Mexico recently caught a colonel; he was in plain clothes, and denied his identity. In his trunk was a splendid uniform, but he declared it belonged to somebody else. He was made to try it on; and although it was really made for him, the tailor had so blundered that the coat was found to be much too large, and the bandits accepted the colonel's word, and neglected to shoot him, as they had intended, if he had been proved to be of the military persuasion.

—— The army contractors forward on an average 40 cavalry horses daily from St. Albans, Vt., to Washington.

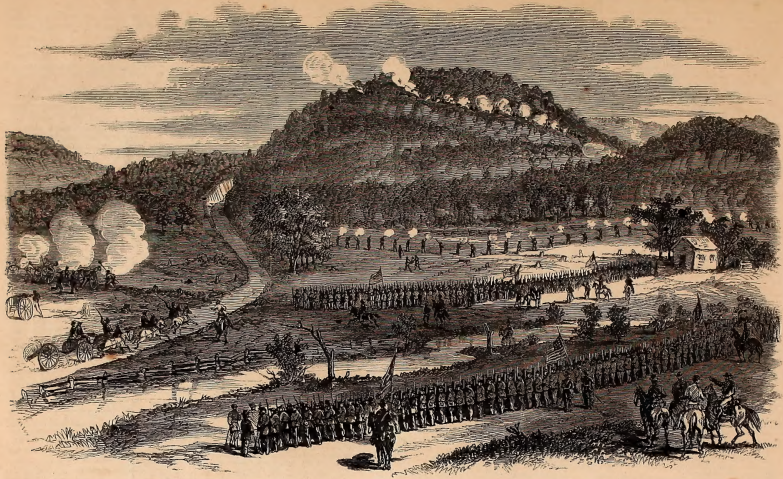
—— "Bob," now called "Belmont Bob," is the body-servant of Gen. McClernand, and at the battle of Belmont, it is said of him, that when the retreat commenced he started for the boats. Reaching the banks, he dismounted, and slid rapidly down, when an officer, seeing the action, called out, "Stop, you rascal, and bring along the horse!" Merely looking up, as he waded to the plank through the mud, the darkey replied: "Can't obey, colonel: the major told me to save the most valuable property, and dis nigger's worf mor'n a horse."

—— During the summer of 1849, a Mr. James Wilson, of West Jersey, died with the cholera, while some 50 miles from his home. John Rogers was employed to convey the dead body in a wagon to his friends at home. By inquiry he learned the precise house of the deceased. On driving to the door he called to a respectable-looking lady, who was in fact the newly-made widow, and asked: "Does Mr. Wilson live here?" "Yes," was the reply; "but he's not at home to-day." "I know he's not at home now, but he will be very soon: for I've got him here, dead, in the wagon!"

GEORGE H. ELLIS'S MUSIC ROOMS, STATE STREET, ROCHESTER.

Presentation to Gen. Tom Thumb and Lady.

A VERY pleasing incident occurred at the handsome piano rooms of Mr. George H. Ellis, State street, Rochester, on the 6th of last month. Gen. Tom Thumb—Mr. Stratton—had been staying for some time in that delightful city, and the General being a member of the Order of Knight Templars, it was determined by his brother Sir Knights to take him by surprise, and to give him and his handsome lady a friendly ovation. Accordingly the details of the affair were placed in the hands of Sir Knight George H. Ellis, who invited the General, and by him was deputed to wait upon the famous Queen of Beauty, and to invite her to meet some friends at his beautiful piano and music rooms, in Ellwanger and Burry's building, State street. Mrs. Gen. Tom Thumb received the ambassador with that distinguished courtesy for which she is remarkable, and graciously accepted the invitation on behalf of the General, of her sister, Minnie Warren, and of Commodore Nutt, to whom the invitation was also extended. The preliminaries being arranged, and the day appointed, invitations were issued to the prominent musical, literary and other well-known ladies and gentlemen of the city, and quite an excitement was created in anticipation of the event.



On the day appointed, the distinguished little party drove up to Mr. Ellis's store in a splendid carriage drawn by four spirited horses. On alighting, they were ushered into the music rooms, where they received the friendly greetings of the assembled guests. The saloon in which the meeting took place, is in every respect splendidly fitted up. Huge mirrors decorate its walls, and its whole area, over 60 feet by 30, is covered by costly carpeting. Here and there are pieces of rare sculpture and bronzes, in fact, every elegance that refined taste could suggest, has been gathered together to render Ellis's saloon fitted to receive the fair ladies of the city, who seem to make it their fashionable rendesvouz.

The gathering was in every way a most social one. The little lions of the day talked freely with all around, but the Commodore was the very life of the party. He was in exuberant spirits, and sang and joked in an irresistibly amusing manner. Mrs. Gen. Tom Thumb sang several songs most charmingly; among them the "Captain and his Whiskers" made a great sensation. The fine grand pianos which Mr. Ellis constantly keeps on sale, were brought into requisition, and discoursed much charming music under the able manipulation of Miss Barton, Mr. Wilkins and Professor Ellis, while the vocal part was most ably sustained by Miss Jennie Bull, Miss Addie Hatch and Miss Barton. It was the opinion of all present that it was one of the most delightful impromptu matinées ever given in the good city of Rochester.

At the close of the musical exercises the special attention of the company was requested, and the ceremonies of the presentation commenced. Many of the principal officers of the Order of Knight Templars being present, the presentation was made under their sanction. Sir Knight General Lathrop, in an eloquent and appropriate speech, presented to Sir Knight Charles W. Stratton (Gen. Tom Thumb), on behalf of Sir Knight George H. Ellis, an exquisitely carved cigar stand, and to his wife, a cup, beautifully and elaborately cut from wood of the Charter Oak, by the blind poet, Mr. Robert Fenn. The General, though taken by surprise, replied with fluent ease, and accepted the gifts on behalf of himself and his wife with warm expressions of pleasure and gratitude. The General and his party then drove off, and the company separated highly gratified by the incidents of the day.

One word as to the gentleman who was the chief mover in this pleasant affair. Mr. George H. Ellis is one of the representatives of the earnest, pushing business men of the country. He despises the old fogy style, which crawls after popular taste, instead of leading it. He knows that if you show the public what they ought to buy, they will most certainly do so. His store is more elegantly fitted up than our New York stores; his collection of music comprises all that is new and popular; he keeps not only square, but grand pianos, a circumstance uncommon in the country, besides every other kind of instrument, including even Browne's celebrated harps. By his business tact and energy, he has extended his business all through the West, and it is no uncommon thing for him to ship off four pianos a day—an amount of business in one department, which would be considered first-class, even in this city. It is such men as this who spread musical taste through wide and hitherto unreached circles, and their success is not only well deserved, but it is a benefit to the community at large.

HEAT OF THE EARTH.—The increase of the earth's temperature, as we descend below the surface, is a subject which possesses great scientific interest, and is also of practical importance as determining the depth at which it would be possible to pursue the working of coal and other minerals. The deepest coal-mine in the world is the Monkwearmouth Colliery, in England, which reaches a depth of 1,800 feet below the surface of the ground, and nearly as much below the level of the sea. The observed temperature of the strata at this depth agrees pretty closely with what has been ascertained in other localities, and shows that the increase takes place at the rate of 1 deg. Fah. to about 60 feet of depth. Assuming the temperature of subterranean fusion to be 8,000 deg., and that the increase of heat at greater depths continues uniform (which, however, is by no means certain), the thickness of the film which separates us from the fiery ocean beneath will be about 34 miles.

ORIGIN OF THE GRAIN IN WEIGHT.—The grain, which is common to the troy and avoirdupois weights, has come down to us from olden times, and is mentioned in the "Magna Charta." It is described as "a grain of wheat gathered from the middle of the ear." This, of course, was exceedingly vague and arbitrary, but it sufficed for the simple wants of our ancestors, and since then its specific weight has been fixed on a firmer and more satisfactory basis.

A GENTLEMAN who had been spending the evening with a few friends, looking at his watch just after midnight, said: "It is to-morrow morning! I must bid you good-night, gentlemen."

THE WAR IN LOUISIANA—DESTRUCTION OF THE U. S. TRANSPORT JOHN WARNER BY CONFEDERATE BATTERIES ON RED RIVER, MAY 4.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, C. E. H. BONWILL

THE BRIDAL AND THE BURIAL.

BY HENRY C. WATSON.

From the steeple of our village church a joyous peal rings out,
And past the gray old headstones, what a gay crowd threads its way!
And foremost 'mongst the merry girls was pretty gentle Ruth,
And at her side, her true, true-love, whom she will wed this day.

She was not dressed in costly silks, no bridal veil was there,
A simple white rose hid itself amidst her curling hair;
A modest dress of flowing white, a sash of orange hue,
And Ruth stood forth as fair a bride as mortal eyes could view.

She was the village pride, the pet, the darling of us all,
Her smile was love and charity, her voice a pleasant tune,
And she a simple orphan, poor, and in the world alone,
Was welcome to our hearts and homes, as sunny days in June!

The story of her life was one we often read in books—
The rich squire's son would seek our Ruth in all the quiet nooks.
But how he won that gentle heart, which beat for love alone,
Must still remain a secret, to their bosoms only known.

The village gossip, ever rife, was carried to the Hall,
And fiercely raged the purse-proud man, nor waited he a day,
The curse and disinheritance, the ban from home and heart,
Were placed against that one great love, in stern and harsh array.

Yet he would brave them all for her, and gave back scorn for scorn—
But sacrifice and wisdom dwelt with her, the lowly born.
He should not lose his home for her—no ban on him should lie.
The love that blossomed 'neath a curse would wither up and die!

And so they parted. Years rolled on, but their faith wavered not,
Till Time's great retribution came, and set love's prisoners free.

And here upon this sunny day, before the altar old,
The orphan weds the rich man's son, and proud of her is he.

Ah me! It was a blessed sight to see that youthful pair,
So trustful in their constant hearts, so humbly kneeling there;
To know how they had struggled, waited, hoped, and not in vain,
For now their hands are joined, and none can sever them again.

The closing benediction given, they take their homeward way,
The sunshine, glowing on their path, in golden gladness lay;
They knew not that it shone so bright, as they walked side by side,
The sunshine in their hearts eclipsed all thought of aught beside.

Blanche surprises Madame Euphrosine.

The Abode of the Witch of Fontainebleau.

And as we reached the grand old Hall, no longer grim, though gray,
Each window seemed a friendly eye that bade us welcome there;
And soon a merry throng was seen around the festive board,
Which not for many years had groaned with such a lordly fare.

The laugh and jest went round and round, and no one felt the thrill—
The shudder—the foreboding—the presentiment of ill.
With glasses filled up to the brim, with one accord we cried:
"A health! a health! and three times three, to bridegroom and to bride!"

Up rose the bridegroom full of joy—but sadly, deadly pale—
He slowly spoke, and painfully—"I know not what to say—
I thank you all—my wife—my heart—my heart is all too full—"
He paused—and in that solemn pause, his life had passed away.

From the steeple of our village church the tolling bell doth tell,
That he who three days since was wed now sleepeth passing well.
God help the widowed orphan, and soothe her heart's great pain—
Alone once more—we take her to our hearts and homes again.

THE WITCH OF FONTAINEBLEAU.

BY MRS. M. A. DENISON.

In a miserable house that seemed every moment ready to totter to the ground, in an obscure street in Fontainebleau, lived during the Reign of Terror in France one Madame Euphrosine. The venerable mansion was so loathed by the inhabitants, that all persons passed it with trembling and a look of abhorrence, quickening their footsteps and almost holding their breath. In the night—particularly when there was a moon—the mansion, once the abode of wealth and beauty, wore an ominous aspect which would seem to repel the very bats, so that it is doubtful if they nested in any of its nooks. On one side it was stone and iron—a very fortress; on the other, the windows were shattered; great holes told where the bricks had fallen out; there were unseemly patches caused by the abrasing of time. Blinds hung by a solitary hinge—curtains there were none. The dismal grandeur that haunts nobility in decay seemed not to reign over these wretched premises; everything repelled, and more than all, the vicious, toothless hag that, doomed by her own vices to the most horrible seclusion, lived, or rather dragged existence out in the frightful house. Not far from this place rose that splendid structure, the hunting-seat of the kings of France, at which, early every morning, she who had once been the most beautiful ornament of a frivolous court, stood at her window and shook her shrivelled hands.

At the time when the guillotine was doing its deadliest work, and there was weeping in all the streets of Paris, a French nobleman laid dying. The sinking sun shone faintly in upon the splendors of an almost royal chamber, where, beneath coverlids of crimson and white satin, the Duke of Delisse quivered and gasped. On her knees, at the side of his bed, knelt a beautiful creature, whose eyes were filled with tears. The small crucifix held tightly in her slender fingers blazed with diamonds; the long fair curls that streamed back, leaving her white brow and colorless cheeks unshadowed, seemed in themselves almost a wealth of gold.

"Oh! my darling!" quivered the dying lips, "in this time of horror to leave you! And yet it is better. They will soon come for me when they hear I have returned—they would even drag me from this pillow to lay my poor head on the block. And you, my tender little Blanche, what can I leave you? Not safety—they hate our house; nor riches—they will sack this beautiful home which now, alas! it is out of my power to give you."

"Papa, never think of me," whispered the young girl, falling on her father's neck as she arose from her knees, "God will remember me."

"Yes, yes, it seems so; you are young, beautiful, innocent, yet neither of those will protect my darling, for alas! you are noble, There is only one thing I can think of, my child. In Fontainebleau lives a woman who once professed to love me. She is old and unhappy, but perhaps she has not lost all the goodness of her heart. Here is a ring which she will remember; she promised when she gave it me to do me a service if ever I should require it. I should advise you, after I am gone—for you will be alone then, my darling—Antoine has been obliged to flee for his life—to adopt a servant's costume, disguise your hands in thick gloves, wear a cap, and conceal a little money. Find your way to Fontainebleau, and in the house number fourteen, that stands alone in the midst of a garden quite neglected in the Rue De———, seek for one Madame Euphrosine. Do not tremble if her tongue is malevolent at first, she will not dare, fallen as she is, to forget her promise, and even her ill-nature and possible contempt will be better than the guillotine. Ah! you shudder, my poor darling. Thank heaven with me that you are spared that horror, that your old father is mercifully released by death."

The little clock, a trifle of exquisite workmanship on the mantel, struck six. Blanche looked pitifully up, with its last stroke had departed the soul of her father. The poor child—she was only sixteen—uttered a wild, despairing cry, and gazed around the room in terror. At that moment a coarse face looked in, its features troubled with a mute pity, then turned and beckoned. To the consternation of Blanche, a man entered roughly dressed; a workman's paper cap upon his head, a long, coal-black beard hanging from lips and cheeks that nearly covered the lower part of his face. Blanche thought herself betrayed, and shrank back shuddering, as she moaned, "Alas! pity me, my father is dead!" But in an instant the paper cap was dashed to the ground, the heavy beard followed, and a handsome, high-bred young man stood before her with arms open and outstretched.

"My darling!" he whispered, "see what I have risked to behold you again."

"Oh! Antoine, and your name is on the list of the proscribed."

"I know it, my darling, but I felt that I must make one more desperate effort if I died for it, so I procured this blouse and have disguised myself, my poor little dove!" and he caressed the fair brow that laid so helplessly against his shoulder.

"Antoine, I tremble while you are here; they may come in, those cruel men, at any moment. See you not that my poor father has escaped them?"

"What! dead!—the duke dead?" he cried, nearing the splendid couch. "I thought he slept. My poor little Blanche with no protector, what can you do? Oh, God! that I am powerless!"

"Hush! there is noise—they are in the street, that fearful soldiery. Oh! Antoine, we are lost!"

The young man had hurriedly thrown on his paper cap and beard. The girl who had admitted him now flew into the chamber, seized Blanche, who was nearly fainting, and dragged her from the room. Descending the stairs again, she had just time to enter the chamber where laid the corpse, when three gend'armes rushed in clamorous. They found the girl weeping, and the man in a carpenter's dress standing by. Fortunately the room was now quite dim, twilight was falling. Antoine's hands were stained ingeniously, and looked like those of a coarse, hard-working mechanic.

"So the duke is dead?" cried one of the fellows, glancing suspiciously upon Antoine.

"The girl was crying at the street door, and I came up here," said Antoine; "is this a duke in truth?" he asked awkardly innocently.

"Aye, and just escaped justice," cried another of the soldiers with an oath, deceived by his bad French. "But there are more of his family. Girl, on your life deceive us!" he turned threateningly.

"More of his family, indeed," cried the girl, looking up in apparent fright, "there's only the daughter that's in school in Valence, poor dear! A sore blow will this news be to her." The soldiers scanned her curiously, and evidently thought she spoke the truth.

Meanwhile Antoine was examining the pictures and beautiful trifles, as if he had never seen such things before in his life. They then went out, casting scowling glances toward the bed where the white, stern face gave back no response. Antoine made sure they were in the street, then exchanged a few low rapid words with the girl, who left the room. Presently she came down again and handed him a slip of paper, on which was written the words:

Rue De———, No. 14, Fontainebleau.

Antoine read the paper, his cheek paled. "That human tigress," he muttered; "well, well, in these times we will trust all to God," he added, reverently. "Now I must go, good-bye, Annette. Be assured if I live I will remember you. If ever I recover my fortune, or even a part of it, you shall see that I am grateful. Only do the best you can by your mistress. Poor dove! she goes indeed out of the ark to find, perhaps, no place for the sole of her foot."

"I promise you I will do what I can," whispered the girl, tears filling her honest eyes again. "I will be true to Miss Blanche, who has always been like an angel to me and mine. Ah! I wish the red republicans were only half as good."

"Hush! cried Antoine. "Now I must go. I will not trust myself to see the poor girl again—but if I live and these terrible persecutions cease, I will find her and you."

At that moment the place in which the guillotine stood was running rivers of blood. Deserted though it was, one old crone dabbled in the crimson stream, laughing hideously to herself.

"Off with their heads," she muttered; "the gilded fools—to perdition with all of them. Oh! I could dance about this monument of death, if only they would decapitate the Count D'Artois."

Presently the moon came up shining calmly on this ghastly spectacle. It shone also on two forms clad in the garments of servitude, quietly toiling out of the city. They had reached the great gate without molestation.

"Courage," murmured Annette; "it will not take us so many hours."

"But I am so tired, and my heart is so heavy," pleaded a faintly soft voice.

"I know it, mademoiselle—I am used to walking and you are not—there, hang on my arm as heavily as you can—it will not trouble me. See how beautiful the light shines—and the waters are so clear and still."

"Oh! Annette, I wish I could look—I wish I could feel that these things are beautiful—but think—think who I have left behind. O! mon pere—mon pere!"

"Hush, my dear mademoiselle, for from the shadows of these trees, these fences, there may somebody come who will listen. Though the great God has kept us so far and not even a soul has met us. You must try to think of the good duke as away up in the shining heavens, as indeed he must be—he was so charitable and so virtuous. Alas! that I dare not have masses said for the repose of his soul!"

"Oh! Annette—and he is lying there where fiends may pull him from his bed and insult his gray hairs; it is like death to think of it. Alas! how lonely I am! fatherless, motherless—it would have been better to stay—to die and go to heaven."

"Not in that horrid, horrid way, mademoiselle; don't talk of it—it makes my blood run chill even to hear that terrible name. No, no—please heaven the young count may escape; and you, after a little confinement, can come out again—and at least—if there is nothing else left—remember there is Annette who would die for you."

"Oh! my good girl," cried Blanche, weeping—"what should I do indeed without you? If you could only stay with me. Someway I am very much frightened at the prospects before me. I am going to Madame Euphrosine."

Annette, with an effort, repressed a shudder—that crone's name was known all over Paris. There was no danger there, to be sure, unless the woman herself should be revengeful—for her very baseness protected her. Nobody would think of searching that Bastile for perished beauty—child and man alike feared its very shadow. No officer of justice was dauntless enough to exist for a moment within its poisonous atmosphere.

"And how did your good father know so bad a woman?" asked Annette.

"Ah! it was when she was young and beautiful. Mama told me about it. She used to be the most splendid woman in France. Kings went to her levees—and even worshipped her. All the great men of the time ran after her. Papa was then young and a poet, and she fascinated him. But he was too good ever to be ruined by her. I believe he once did a good deed for her that made her grateful. But, alas! perhaps she has forgotten in these terrible times. No doubt she hates the nobility, as all such persons profess to do now. And if she refuses me, where shall I go?"

"We will wait and see," said Annette. "I will watch. If you go in, it will be a sign that you are safe. If you turn back, then we will walk further and further. I do not fear. I have a little money, and so have you, and I will work for you; keep up your heart, mademoiselle."

A heavy sigh and quiet pressure was the only reply.

"Heavens!" exclaimed Annette, in a low voice.

A man stood before them strangely habited, a blouse thrown over what appeared to be a frock coat. His face was dark and forbidding, and looked worse to them in their terror than it really was.

"Who are these?" he asked, gruffly, planting a gigantic figure in the way.

"Two poor girls," replied Annette, who kept her wits about her, "who are going to see their sick mother. Word was sent this evening, and we must walk because we have no money."

"Where is the mother?" questioned the man, still with his eye fixed upon Blanche, whose face was quite hidden.

"In Fontaineblau, on the outskirts," was the answer. "Oh! monsieur, don't detain us—for the poor woman may die without seeing us."

"Poor soul!" cried the man, with ironical emphasis; "and this is your sister. No doubt your words are true—but everybody is at liberty to question in these times. Let me see your face, mademoiselle?"

These dreadful words proved that he suspected. Annette lost her strength. Blanche lifted her young fair face almost as proud as it was resolute.

"Ha! no likeness—I should think," he muttered, sarcastically. "Now let me look at your hands, my little lady."

Blanche drew off the thick, coarse gloves, and displayed two small hands so snowy white and tapering, that the man evidently looked at them with ill-concealed admiration.

"Humph! my dainty lady, I don't think your mama will be blessed with a vision of your pretty face to-night—you'll have to come with me; you are an aristocrat."

Annette fell on her knees, dumb with terror, holding up her clasped hands beseechingly—but Blanche towered—the color came into her face.

"Very well," she said; "it is best. My father is dead—he is now waiting for me there," and her beautiful eyes were turned to the heavens. The man stood irresolute.

"Well, well, mademoiselle," he said again, "we won't be rude even with the pretty daughters of our nobles. Here, give me that ring on your finger and you may depart."

Blanche tremblingly removed the ring, and the two girls went on, scarcely able to breathe through fear.

"Alas! I am worse off than before," murmured Blanche; "that ring was my passport; I shall not dare present myself now."

Footsteps were heard.

"The horrid fellow has repented," gasped Annette; "he is coming back after us."

They stopped. Of what use would flight have been in that place—two feeble women against a strong-limbed, coarse ruffian.

The man came up holding something between his thumb and forefinger.

"Take it," he said; "keep your bauble. I stopped near a light—I read the initials—I saw the crest—I would not curse myself with keeping it. It belongs, or did belong, to Madame Euphrosine."

"Alas!" said Blanche, mournfully, after he had gone again—"even he rejects such a token—how can I enter her portals? how can I accept charity from her?"

"Courage!" cried Annette; "you are not to stay there only during these terrors. Who knows but the day after to-morrow it may all be ended. Bear up with patience—we are now far on our way. Only to cross this wood—it is surely deserted at this hour. Yes, yes, it is better to trust to the tender mercies of the old witch of Fontainebleau than of the guillotine. Ah! mademoiselle, you have not seen it, else you would say so too."

"Stop!" cried Blanche, panting now with terror—"there is a man following us. See, that is him crouching near the tall post behind. Oh! how shall we dare to cross the wood. Annette, I believe I am a coward—I shall sink upon the ground with fear."

"Let us get into the wood and hide suddenly in one of its paths," whispered Annette. "I know we are two poor women, but I know also that God has not deserted us yet."

Blanche darted forward. She had never been so nervous, so much excited in her life. The thought of her dead father at home—of Antonie's peril—of the rude man who let them off, only perhaps, to recapture them after a momentary contrition, deepened her fears every instant. The moon was still bright as they stole into the wood, whose long arches looked solemn in the distance, and through whose treetops could be seen the silvery lustre of the moonlit sky. Still the stranger went on. He was evidently following them. Arrived at the entrance of the wood he took the same path they had taken, but his consternation was great when he no longer saw their floating dresses. He peered cautiously around—he stood still—then stopping again he cried, in a loud whisper:

"Blanche—Annette—do not fear—it is I."

Another moment and the two girls had emerged from their place of concealment. Half fainting with joy, Blanche recognised the voice of Antoine. Oh, what pleasure to be folded for a moment in his arms, to hear him speak her name!

"It will never do," said the more prudent Annette, fearful of listeners, of followers with far other intentions.

"Only for a few moments, my good Annette. I have reconnoitred the ground; for an hour I have watched and listened; I think there is no danger here, and this poor girl must have rest," he said, half bearing Blanche on his strong arm. "I know where there is an arbor on these grounds, a rude little spot, that has served for my own hiding-place. There we will stay until my poor darling feels stronger, for she leans as if all her strength was gone."

Annette did not oppose, fearful though she was. She had great confidence in Antoine's good judgment. So she followed where he led, to a rough seat, under some interlaced trees, in the thickest part of the wood. Here Blanche rested at last, only conscious of one happiness, that of being near Antoine. He sought among the rubbish under the seat and brought out a small tin box and a flask. From the box he produced some biscuit, very sweet and delicate, and insisted that both should eat. Then he made them swallow a little wine and chatted with them pleasantly.

"There will be worse work to-morrow than there has been to-day," he said, when they prepared again to depart; "and I am glad that you will be housed even in so revolting a place as that of Madame Euphrosine, though I am told there's no end of beautiful things in the old place, no end of silver and gold, which the old creature has hoarded for years."

"Every minute that we stay here fills me with distraction," murmured Annette.

"Wait till the moon goes down," said Antoine; "then I shall not fear to be your guide. Every inch of this forest is familiar to me."

"But will Madame Euphrosine let me in so late?" queried Blanche.

"I don't suppose that will make any difference to her, such people are light sleepers," said Antoine. "At all events, I'm determined to see you to the end of your journey."

In the course of an hour the three set out again, and it was not long before they gained Fontainebleau. Then Blanche's heart began to fail her. She was to take leave of the two best friends who remained to her on earth, one of them her lover and affianced husband. She refrained from weeping, though her heart was full.

"Annette, you will go back to papa?" she said, mournfully.

"Yes, I shall return to protect the property, if I can. Remember, that if you are spared to go again to Paris, I have buried money and silver under a plank in the cellar. They may not search the place, but if they do, that at least will be spared to you."

"And now, farewell, Blanche," said Antoine, tearfully. "It is already two in the morning. Before night I shall be leagues away from here. Keep up your heart, my darling. Madame Euphrosine cannot but be tender towards you, so young, so beautiful!"

He embraced her as they came in view of the building, which, in the gloom, looked like some fortress. There was no light to be seen.

"Go!" whispered Antoine, as he stood back and gently held her from him.

"Oh, I cannot—I cannot!" cried the poor child.

"Blanche, do you not see that before many hours it will be light, and it has been difficult already for me to escape detection? If I remain——"

"No—go—go!" cried Blanche, pressing forward with resolute steps. "Farewell, Annette! only stay till I enter."

She crossed the gloomy courtyard, guided by Antoine, and raising the antique knocker, gave three resounding blows on the oaken door. For some moments nothing could be heard save the prolonged echo of the noise she had made. Once again Antoine applied his strength to the knocker. Presently steps were heard inside, a great clatter, as if pans, boards and furniture were being overthrown. Blanche shrank back when the rattle of chains and bolts struck her ear. One after the other all obstructions were removed, and the door was opened, still chained, but admitting little more than a square inch of light. Most hideous was the face that looked forth, the tangled locks of hair falling over shrivelled cheeks and bare vein-knotted neck.

"What do you want? Away with you!" cried a shrill voice.

"My father sent me here," whispered Blanche, trembling, and half resolved to turn back.

"And who is your father, hussey, and who are you that disturb my slumbers?"

"He bade me give you this ring and remind you of a promise you made him many a year ago."

"I am very forgetful," croaked the old creature, accepting the ring, nevertheless, starting as she took it.

"Ah! Yes, yes! I remember him—the Duke Delisse—yes, yes—and I suppose the guillotine has done for him. It was a charming execution yesterday; I was there all day."

Blanche shuddered with horror.

"What did your father ask for you?" cried the witch.

"Protection," faltered Blanche—"shelter till the trouble is over."

"Protection — shelter!" muttered the other. "The child of an aristocrat comes to me, the old witch of Fontainebleau; the aristocrats, whom I hate with a mortal hatred, send their precious things to me! Well, girl, you shall have shelter. This man, your father, was a fool; but still he once did me a good turn, and I'll not turn my back on my promise, even if 'tis a bad one. Come in."

So saying she held the door open. Blanche cast one look behind her, almost ready to brave the wrath of the avenging populace, rather than face this terrible virago; but Antoine, unseen by all but her, beckoned her to go forward. She stepped into the great gulf of darkness, hardly brightened a foot on either side by the miserable candle. The door was bolted, chained and locked, and the broken, horrible voice bade her follow.

"You'll not find luxuries in this house, not to your mind at least, my fine lady. There's a couch that the poor old king has laid on for many a month, and there's a hassock that Marie Antoinette has honored with her feet, for a pillow. As for a nightdress, I've nothing very nice; but you can wrap yourself in this, 'twill keep you warm. I can't afford bedclothes."

As she spoke she threw the hassock on the couch, and catching something that hung near by flung it at Blanche, and hurried away to repeat her fearful dreams. Blanche felt the dress, whatever it was, was some soft and flexile texture. She was wearied and heartbroken, and yet so tired out and tortured that her eyes were heavy. Throwing the garment, which was thick and warm, over her, she composed herself to sleep.

The light of day never fully penetrated the house of Madame Euphrosine, because of the hangings before the windows, or boards, or broken limbs standing against them. But Blanche was awakened by the familiar sound of the milk bells that penetrated even these thick walls. She had waked from a dream of heaven to find herself—where? All night she had been happy, sharing the love of her father, being blessed by his caress, his smiles, his kisses; now this dark confusion of splendor, this squalor of sordid wealth greeted her eyes. For some moments she could not think out where she was. The room was immense, much larger than any in her father's palace, and covered with the richest and most beautiful carpets. They spread apparently one over another, the entire length of the room, while heaps of brocaded stuffs stood in a corner, heaps of laces in another, and, piled against each other, the most lovely pictures, in costly frames, leaned, covered with dust and neglect.

From these strange things her glance wandered to the lounges, of which there were six of the most recherché and elegant patterns conceivable. Those on which she herself rested was covered with crimson satin and brocaded with gold, as was the bolster, sack, on these soft velvet were worked the initials of royalty. The wrap which she had so carelessly thrown over her was of quilted white satin, among the folds of which gleamed hundreds of seed pearls; the laces around the sleeves were worth a small fortune, and the work upon it a pleasure which must have cost many weary hours of labor. In unbounded astonishment she lifted herself upon one elbow, and began to inspect these strange premises. There was neither method nor cleanliness. The splendid colors in the chibbaun at her feet seemed coated here and there with filth, in other places cut and slashed, as if in some mad frolic. The pictures were so defaced in some parts that the institution seemed premeditated. A Venetian mirror, of which there were three, framed in ivory, inlaid with gold, alone had escaped the defacing hand of cruelty or time.

After a few moments Blanche lifted herself from the lounge, and moved around to inspect these beautiful things. Behind her dragged the long trail of her strange night-dress. Wiping the dust from one picture and another, marveling at their wondrous traits, she did not know how far the morning had advanced, for through the obscurity the sun gave only a dim, creamy light that only enhanced the sense of her obscurity, while it played false with her reason. Not until she began to feel light-faintness, if hunger did she think that it might be past the breakfast hour, and then came to her a vision of that home in which her father kept a maid to tell him then there was dare to hope they had given him a Christian burial? Ah! no; that blessing was denied all the aristocracy, as they were called. Through and down in the midst of that rotting and fading splendor, she wept and moaned unrestrainedly. No one heard her; no one came near her, and the silence of the great house at last grew something frightful. Not even a mouse was to be heard; not even a spring in the clustered air. Blanche grew conscious of a coming terror that was even worse than the cries of the excited people for blood. Was she alone in this dreadful place? Did the grim creature given her the refuge she sought, and then left her to starve? The thought was not a welcome one, though she wished at moments to die; the pangs of hunger must be even more dreadful than the sharp pains of the guillotine. She rose to her feet at the door by which she entered; it was locked, but there was another door directly opposite, and down the great length she travelled in the midst of splendid but faded chairs, silk hangings, thrown into heaps, until she reached it in terror, for fear it, too, should be locked against her. But no; though it resisted her strength for a long time it gave way at last, and she stepped into a long dreary entry, from which the murdering paper was literally dropping, but which, like the room, had long lengths of Aubusson carpet thrown carelessly down so that it hid the small hillocks. From this hall several doors seemed to open, but, one after another as she tried them, she found them securely fastened on; but one; this she entered and stood aghast on the threshold. It was a kitchen with a smoky, yawning fireplace, and was literally heaped with magnificent rubbish. Beautiful frames that had held masterpieces by the greatest painters were broken in splinters, and laid piled upon the hearth ready for firewood. A splendid panel of Watteau's laid across two broken chairs, and two or three sliced cousins disfigured the rare coloring of its outlines. Several porcelain vases that had been and still were worth hundreds of pounds contained flat refuse of the table, or dirty water. Across the window was suspended a rare piece of Gobelin tapestry, and immediately under it stood a grand Erard pianoforte, the keys covered with dirt, and the rich bronze work disfigured by scraps of mouldy bread and meatless bone.

On the walls, over and between the pictures, hung dresses which had, no doubt, graced the forms of royal personages; brocades, satins, silks, crapes, laces from the most recherché modern cashmeres; shawls of plush or beaver; robes of velvet, trimmed with ermine, or which were surprisingly fur; golden spoons, on which were engraved the crests of great but fallen houses; silver plate, tarnished, bent, put to the most degraded uses; here platters of wood; there splendid pitchers of cut glass; here goblets with pictures of princes engraved thereon; luxury, squalidness and filth, though the latter reigned paramount.

Was she alone in this fearful house? There was no food to be seen, save the crusts of mouldy bread—save the slices of raw onion, whose flavor always disgusted her. She could not eat. Clearing away the rubbish she touched the keys of the splendid instrument before her; a flood of harmony rolled round the narrow, high-ceiled apartment. The sound so voluminous, so grand, almost frightened her, and she recoiled, expecting to see the wrathful visage of the owner of all this blended wealth and misery. A heap of books next attracted her attention. They were thrown down regardless of the dirt, on the rich and costly bindings. Lifting them she found here also a collection for which some would willingly have spent a fortune. They appeared to have been shuffled and kicked from one place to another, and had been handled with no tenderness. Selecting one from the number, Blanche crawled back to the room in which she had passed the night, and endeavored to read. Wearily the hours passed on. The light grew deeper, then fainter, and finally, faded out. Blanche was very hungry; she could not dismiss the fact from herself; she felt as if she would go mad. The onion raw, and disgusting though it was to her delicate taste.

At last there was a clanking as of chains, a chafing of steel. Blanche's heart beat quickly; she trembled violently from fear and weakness; from dread to see again the woman who had placed herself so utterly heartless. She needed not; the steps did not come near her, but were soon heard receding in the distance; Madame Euphrosine had gone to another part of the house with more spoils, the fruits of her horrid day's work.

How to pass another night without food Blanche scarcely knew. She who had always her daintiest wants supplied would scarcely have refused a Bedouin crust. All the day before she had scarcely tasted food; that which Antoine had given her was the first that touched her lips. In this darkness she shivered and wept. If Antoine but knew that she suffered, and yet if he did, was he not powerless? Terrible fancies crowded to her view. At last she thought to go to Antoine's room to save her new hope. Perhaps the old madame had after all a piety of some sort, and she had come to classify; that would be a relief to her sence; she might think of her, inquire after her yet. But no; the weary hours of another night succeeded, and sleep fled from her eyes. She even fancied that the old room was full of moving phantoms; that now and then a stern voice cried out: "This was my room!" "Antoine took Versailles," or "This was my carpet; it laid in the royal salon!" At last the day, the second day, broke again, and Blanche, nearly delirious with her hunger, pressed out of the room towards the lookout window. Below, in her way she passed another door; one of those that had been locked yesterday, and there saw Madame Euphrosine diving deep into an old chest. At the moment she thought she heard the clink of coin. Hearing a footstep the crone looked up; her face was instantly flushed with anger. She hastily closed the chest, crunk angrily, and turned with a menacing gesture to Blanche.

"What do you here—impertinent?" she cried, with a terrible oath.

Suffering had made Blanche reckless.

"I am hungry," she replied, boldly; "I am very hungry. All day yesterday I had nothing to eat."

"Well, I did not tell you I would feed you," cried the old woman, still angry. "I have given shelter to a hated aristocrat; is not that enough?"

"Then you wish me to die?" said Blanche, the tears running over her cheeks. "Very well; I had as lief die by one way as another, now."

"Fool—code money!" cried the old woman.

"Will you give me some food if I pay you?" cried Blanche, hope reviving.

"Perhaps so. But how aristocrats are fortunate if they have a few pence in these times."

"Well, I have some left," said Blanche; "I have one eagle which I will give you to buy food for a few days, if you will not let me starve."

Blanche is talking something like it. What do you want?"

"Anything that will appease my hunger," said Blanche.

"Then perhaps milk will do, and a small baker's loaf."

"Oh! yes; that will be all I wish," cried Blanche, clasping her small hands; this small prospect of simple food seemed so delicious.

"Then come and get it, and I will purchase while I am getting them you will play me a tune," said the old woman, leaving the room. "There! that is the music-stool of Marie Antoinette! Sit at the sacking of the palace—ah! that was a brave day. I said once, long ago, that I would revenge myself upon that woman, and I have done so—I have the cup she drank from, the dresses she wore, the carpets she trod upon—ah! I love to grind my heel in them," and she suited the action to the word.

"See, here is some milk—it is in my Antoinette—you shall drink out of the cup she loved."

Blanche shuddered from head to foot, but she dared not remonstrate, it would only make matters worse; so, with a sigh for the delicious food and the fear that fell within the watery beverage, she drank while the haggish eyes were fastened upon her. Then taking the bread, she found it sweeter than anything she had ever eaten before, she finished the little loaf at once.

"Aristocrats are rich, after all, mice with delicate appetites," cried the old woman. "Now that you are satisfied, let me tell you some news. What a pity I have not done so before, for you will lose such a such zest to your pleasure. Ah; yesterday was a grand day, the grandest day I have ever seen."

Blanche grew still more silent.

"You see they sacked some of the most beautiful houses in Paris."

"On the Sabbath!" cried Blanche.

"Ah! my little one, the better the day the better the deed. I was privileged. I saw many splendors; I possessed myself with a few—such a very few though—for I am old, and my arms are not as strong as they were. However I offered my gold, and some fellows remained who will sell me whatever I want. I expect them to bring it today."

Blanche sat like a statue. Her lips were dry and parted, her eyes wide open, yet she seemed to see nothing.

"In one house I met a very pretty process—my servant men bringing out the corpse of an aristocrat."

"Oh!" shrieked Blanche, "what were they going to do with it?"

"Burn it or throw it into the Seine," returned the frightful old woman. "It was such an old man too, with long white curling hair."

"The wretches," escaped from between Blanche's set teeth.

"Ah! there, there—that will do for an aristocrat," cried the woman with a furious look.

Blanche was silent. She felt herself in this woman's power.

"Ah! yes, a white-headed old man, with a high forehead. They said he had been found dead in his bed."

"My poor father!" sobbed Blanche.

"If it so, indeed? Very well, he escaped the guillotine."

"Yes, oh, yes! I am thankful for that. They did not at least have that consolation."

"Take care again," cried the old woman with the growl of a tiger. "And, my dear, I went all over the house—ah! indeed, it was beautiful. I have several little mementoes—among them this, which luckily no one saw but I. It was rolled in the bedclothes."

"Ah! it is my cross;" and Blanche stretched forth her hand impulsively—"my mother gave it me."

"Too fast my little aristocrat—did I not say that these things are spoils for the people? How do I know that you are not a spy? You have told as well as fine lady?"

Blanche shrank back while the diamonds were thrust again into the woman's dirty neckerchief.

"Ah! that was a very fine house, but it was stripped. The carpets were on my way and the books another. There may be daintier amusements, but for the pretty excitement give me the sacking of a house. Sometimes one makes many fine show in the hands of a tattered wretch, who in it sees bread for his children—the rich carpets will look so well on the parlor floor of their wretched cabin. Oh! 'tis beautiful. And then the guillotine—what brave work it did yesterday. Going, going, click, click, steady, steady, and the beautiful women, men with an air of desperate pride, as if even there they were as good as their neighbors—oh! it was beautiful, I say, to see."

Blanche grew sick with horror.

"And did you hear any names?" she asked, trembling from head to foot.

"Of course—august names—names that have made all Paris tremble. Ah! but that fine young lady who had the cross. If he had not been an aristocrat, I should have cried myself, I am certain I should."

Blanche saw a sinister glance at her visitor, who sank back upon the shapeless heap of finery.

"He was so handsome! just like a king. And he could have been one, I am sure, if he were not enough to listen, and I heard him say only one word before they dragged him away. That word was the name of his sweetheart, perhaps—perhaps of his wife. Ah! Blanche!" she whispered. "You are Blanche, child."

"A little," murmured Blanche; "there, I am better. And how did this young man look! what was the color of his eyes, tell me?"

"A dark blue—a very sweet dark blue eye—a rich head of auburn hair, approaching golden. He was—he was—like a king of his kind." She took from the folds of her kerchief a beautiful ringlet. "Ah, I remember now—his name was Blanche, and he was a nobleman."

A half-stifled shriek; Blanche threw her arms up with a gesture of agony.

"Stop! you old hag—oh! men call you a witch. You are a devil; for all this time you knew that I was desolate. Inhuman creature—kill me if you will, denounce me to the authorities—but let me meet you before the God of heaven and brand you there, fiend and murderer."

Madame Euphrosine staggered forward as if to strike the young girl. She foamed at the mouth and fell in terrible convulsions. At one bound Blanche leaped over the body of the room, and returned to her prison chamber. There her torture commenced. There she might have been seen flying about the room, raving, shrieking, dancing, shouting in the hot fever and delirium. Days passed; she fed upon the disease that rioted through her veins; there was no nourishment, and at last she fell senseless on that beautiful couch, embroidered with the royal arms. She had not seen the dreadful woman more, the ringing of bells, the cannon that proclaimed that the terrible reign of the massacre was over. She did not hear the thundrous assaults on the doors of the house that she knew nothing until ten days afterward, she escaped her cruel fate by death; and Annette, whom she recognised.

"Does she really know you?" asked a voice that thrilled the poor girl to the heart.

"I think she does," said Annette. "Perhaps it will not be best to try her too much."

"Poor darling!" murmured another.

Blanche tried to lift her poor wasted arms. She gasped as a light like a great glory broke over her face.

"My father! Antoine! Then I am in heaven."

This exclamation brought them to her bedside. Yes, it was indeed her father—it was also Antoine—whose reported death had been a cruel fiction. But her father—how was this double blessing to be explained for? In the manner. Supposed to be dead, during that terrible Sunday they had dragged him to the river, and after some indignity thrown him violently in. In some almost miraculous manner, the body was caught amidst the sedges and weeds a mile lower down, and there found by some kind peasant woman. During his transit his head had struck some sharp projection—she blood trickled forth—he was partially revived from his dreadful trance. The work of the peasants did all the rest.

Blanche had passed through a frightful o

but she soon forgot it in her supreme happiness of possession, where she thought all wrecked—all lost.

Madame Euphrosine was found where she had fallen, dead—and as recorded by the historian—for I have limned no creature of the fancy in this woman—with her hand clasping a volume of Voltaire. She was not allowed Christian burial.

THE DIABOLICAL BARBARITIES OF THE REBELS

In the Treatment of Union Prisoners.

An irrefragable proof of all that has been stated of the rebel cruelties towards our prisoners will be found in another page in the portraits of prisoners returned to us by exchange. They are from photographs, and therefore suggestive, without being a case where any is needed. The London Illustrated News recently gave from sketches by its own artists views of the prisoners on Belle Isle, and the picture drawn by one who sympathizes with the rebels, confirms completely the accounts of the prisoners themselves.

The Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War proceeded to Annapolis and Baltimore, and took the testimony of returned soldiers. In their report they say:

"The evidence proves, beyond all manner of doubt, a determination on the part of the rebel authorities, continued persistently and deliberately for a long time past, to subject those of our soldiers who fell into their hands, whether sick or well, to their barbarous system of treatment which has resulted in reducing many of them who have escaped with life and limb, when restored to us to a condition, both physically and mentally, almost indistinguishable from the unhappy dead. Though nearly all the patients now in the Naval Hospital at Annapolis, and the whole of that in hospital, in Baltimore, have been under the kindest and most intelligent care, many of them for a period of weeks, and many of them for a greater length of time, still the surgeons in charge of the hospitals have informed us, many of them being nothing but skin and bone; some of them are unable to walk. Without doubt, they have exposed to the inclemency of the winter season on Belle Isle, with, in many cases, no fire in the guard, without tents or blankets, some of them without overcoats or shoes, and with but little food to sustain life, except in the winds and storms to which they were exposed.

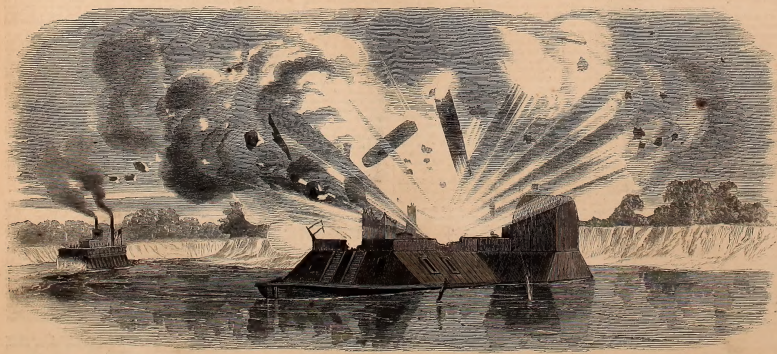
"It is also in evidence that the general conduct of their captors was to rob them, as soon as they were taken prisoners, of their money, watches, blankets, and good clothing, for which they received nothing in return. Their rations, as a general rule, consisted of corn meal, hardly better than none at all. Upon their arrival at the prisons they were huddled together, without shelter or other covering, in buildings without fire, or upon Belle Isle with, in many cases, no shelter at all, or others with nothing but old discarded army tents, so injured by use that they let in the rain and the cold nights, as the wind and storms; on several occasions, the witnesses state, the rain fell in such torrents as to make the rain-pig-places upon the bare earth, and found several of their comrades dead in the morning. It is also in proof that many others would have met the same fate had they not been brought back and kept through the hours which should have been devoted to sleep, for the purpose of obtaining sufficient warmth to preserve life.

"In respect to the food furnished to our men by the rebel authorities, the proof shows that the daily ration of each man was totally insufficient in quantity to preserve health and strength, and that in the matter of proper quality, which it was not, it consisted usually, at the best, of a small piece of corn bread, and, in most instances, as the witnesses state, of corn and soba boiled together, with sometimes a little rice mixed in, and sometimes a little ounce of meat, usually of poor quality, and unfit to be eaten by persons in health, and sometimes nothing consisted of but fat and bone. Many of our men were compelled to sell to their guards their boots, or what portion of clothing such guards might want, that they were permitted to receive of their friends, for the purpose of procuring food, in addition to the insufficient food sufficient to sustain life; thus, by endeavoring to avoid one privation, rendered more severe the same destitute condition in respect to clothing and blankets that they were in before they received aid from our government. When they became sick and disabled in consequence of the exposure and privations, and were admitted into the hospitals, their treatment was little, if any, improved as to food, though they, doubtless, suffered less from exposure to cold than before. These food and general arrangements, unsanitary and altogether unfit in quality. Their diseases and wounds did not receive the treatment which the commonest dictates of humanity would have prompted.

"Upon Belle Isle, in addition to the want of food, clothing and shelter, our soldiers, while prisoners, have been compelled to do most cruel drudgery at the times placed over them. They have been abused and shamefully treated on many opportunities. They have been murderously shot and killed when they failed to comply with the demands of their jailers, and instances are violating rules of which they had not been informed. Upon Belle Isle, in addition to the buildings that have been fired at and killed by the sentinels outside when they were not in the immediate vicinity of the windows at which the shots proceeded, there are also buildings a little fresh air. One man, whose comrade in the service, who was in the cars with him, had been shot down as he was about to enjoy the fresh air, and was compelled to see him breathe his last, and was then ordered to his friend; and other instances of equally unprovoked murder are found in the testimony taken.

The portraits which we have selected are those of 1. Private Thomas Cox, Co. A, 24th Michigan, July, enlisted from steamer New York from Richmond into rebel's hands—Andersonville, April, 1864. 2. Private John Breining, Co. G, 4th Kentucky cavalry, sergeant, was taken prisoner, and was in all kinds of misery care, May 12th. 3. Private George H. White, Co. F, 9th Michigan cavalry, was taken prisoner, May 5th. 4. Private Francis N. Beedle, Co. M, 8th Michigan cavalry, admitted to U. S. General Hospital, Annapolis, May 30, and died May 31. 5. Private John Q. Rose, admitted same day, May 30, died June 1. 6. Sergeant Charles Hall, Co. C, 44th Massachusetts regiment, died Andersonville, April 29, 1864. 7. H. Parker, Co. B, 2d Wisconsin cavalry, admitted into hospital, Annapolis, died May 30. 8. Edward Cunningham, Co. F, 7th Ohio cavalry, admitted into hospital, Baltimore, died May 15, 1864.

Is it possible to conceive of demons exceeding the monsters which the rebel authorities could produce, able, healthy men to such a frightful state? And yet the assertion is made by those who gave over on their lips professions of piety and religion.



KINGS, who once held learning in such scorn among that the Latin tongue, think it worth learn to write their own names, now aspire to literary honors. Of Frederick the Great, it is said that he was fond of Latin and edits a journal, and the King of Sweden has just published a small volume of poetry. Louis Napoleon sometimes signs himself "Charles, a literary man," and it is said that recently the reigning Duke became at a hotel in Gothenburg he handed out having a high opinion of literary men, could not conceive a noble grimace. A waiter, the monarch, not relishing a joke from his assumed position, gave him a sound cuffing, and sent him following note to the master of the hotel: "Sir—I intended to stay a week at Calmar; but seeing you did not consider yourself greatly honored by lodging an author, I have returned to Stockholm." The letter was signed, "Charles, a literary man, and King of Sweden." In this little transaction one hardly knows which to laugh at most, the King or the landlord.

"I HAVEN'T another word to say, sir: I never dispute with fools," said a gentleman, who was getting the worst of an argument.

"No," was the reply; "you are very sure to agree with them."

SUNLIGHT AT EVENING.

WEARY and worn, and old and gray,
The light of my young life passed away,
But a trace of its radiance lingereth yet,
Like the western sky when the sun has set,
With the shadows of evening closing round,
And its dim mists veiling the dewy ground.
Yes! even on the verge of the lonely tomb,
One vision calls back youth's rosy bloom;
One memory still makes life divine,
The dream of the love that once was mine!

Star of my life! yet lead me on,
Till the twilight of sorrow is past and gone,
And the morning of joy and hope shall break
On the sight of waiting, for thy dear sake.
The undying love in my heart that dwells,
Was sealed for thine own by our last farewells
And still shall the same at morn and even Go up on the wings of prayer to Heaven.
Then, e'en if we meet on this earth no more,
I shall wait for thee on the deathless shore.

CHAPTER VIII.

If he be sad, he wants money.
Much Ado About Nothing, Act III., Sc. 1.

Things out of hope are compassed oft with vent'ring.
Shakespeare's Poems.

An envious, sweeping frost,
That bites the farthest blades of the spring.
Lowe's Labor Lost, Act I., Sc. 1.

To preserve his brother from the consequences of his last scrape, Bertram Hapswell was obliged to exert all the policy and influence he could command. To induce the authorities to tolerate his stay in Paris under strict surveillance, till his recovery, with the understanding that he should, as soon as he was able to travel, receive his passport and quit France and Europe, was the best he could do for him. Accordingly, he no sooner became convalescent than he was furnished with ample means and sent to America.

He arrived in New York in safety, and was agreeably disappointed in that magnificent metropolis. Here he found associations of the worst description, indulged in the wildest dissipation, gambled and lost his money, and in a few months was in debt for his board and a destitute wanderer in the streets. While hanging about the Post Office one morning, after having inquired in vain for his remittances from Europe, he met an old acquaintance, whom he had not seen since boyhood, but whom, after having once had a fair view of his remarkable physiognomy, it was impossible to mistake for any other than Mr. Gregory Gringrip. Victor Kingsland was, however, forgotten by the former friend, and had to take a deal of pains to recall himself to the old fellow's memory, which proved inconveniently obvious to the circumstances which for this purpose. Victor's perseverance was finally successful, and Mr. Gringrip condescended to inquire after the young man's relatives and friends, more particularly about his father and Mordaunt Elfstone, in whose fate he seemed interested. Victor's recital was great, and he had to make it known to the only person from whom he hoped for immediate aid, Mr. G., who, after confiding with him in the most unbiguous manner, assured him of his own poverty and utter inability to render him the slightest assistance, and wished him better luck and a good morning.

Victor was convinced that Mr. Gringrip deceived him, and cased his heart as much as he could by cursing his parsimony. Early evening, few minutes afterwards, to drop into an exchange-office, in Wall street, to ascertain to what extent it would avail him to draw for money upon his mother or brother, he beheld his old acquaintance at the counter, exchanging a thick roll of uncurrent banknotes for bankable money. When the latter looked up and caught Victor's eye, he smiled grimly, observing quietly, as he passed out of the office:

"I am a collector, Mr. Kingsland, and these funds belong to them by whom I am employed. If a portion of the money were mine, I should be only too happy to aid you."

Mortified as he was for the moment by this circumstance, Victor thought little of it till a few days afterwards, when he chanced to see Gringrip enter a drinking-saloon, at the door of which several cabs were hanging.

"Isn't he an ugly cuss!" asked one.

"Yes, but as rich as Croesus," answered another.

"And as hard as granite," continued a third.

"And as pitiless as death," observed the first speaker.

He owns more rum-holes than any other man in New York," said the second.

Victor would not without overhearing any more of these dubious compliments to the niggard who had treated him with superfluous closeness and falsehood, but he was desperate, and muttered:

"Though it be impossible to get blood out of a stone, it shall go hard but I will get gold out of a miser. Would the old skinflint refuse me aid? He knows well enough that my mother is good for ten times the sum I ask. By Jove, I'll try something out of the moneygrabber, if I have first to wring his neck a little to get him into the lending vein. I'll beard the lion in his den."

Victor stood on the corner of the street till he saw Gringrip come forth, and then diligently followed him from place to place till he saw him enter a dingy house in Mulberry street, which, upon inquiry he ascertained to be his residence. He ran up its dirty doorsteps and tugged lustily at the bellpull. He had to repeat the latter effort more than once ere the door was opened. It was slightly unclosed at last by a shrivelled old woman, with a cold inexpressive face, who shook her thin, grizzly locks at Victor. She had not heard the bell and did not hear him, now he spoke to her. Incensed by her rude conduct, he thrust himself into the passage. Seeing he was not to be got rid of without explanation, she handed him a little slate which hung against the wall, and at the top of which was written:

"Write your business."

He wrote on the slate:

"I want to see Mr. Grimgrip on business of importance, immediately."

She read what he had written, scribbled, with a tremulous hand, and returned him the slate, upon which he found these words:

"Write your name."

He complied with this injunction, and sway the crone bobbled with the slate, but soon returned with it, with this additional sentence upon it:

"Mr. Gringrip's compliments to Mr. Kingsland, and regrets that he is so much engaged that he cannot possibly see him."

Victor, determined not to be got rid of so easily, instantly wrote in reply:

"Mr. Kingsland will not leave this house till he has seen Mr. Gringrip."

The old woman, who had been holding the door open to induce and facilitate Victor's egress, received the slate back with a bad grace, pocketed the added writing with a frown, hung up the slate, pointed to the open doorway, and even made an attempt to push him out. To convince her of the utter fallacy of any such endeavor, Victor shut the door, thrust the wrinkled dame aside, and walked into the house till he came near the foot of the stairs, where he stood looking up them, as if disposed to ascend to the storey above.

The old woman flew past him with speed surprising in such a cripple, disappeared through a backdoor, which she shut violently behind her, and left him, much amused by her impotent display of temper.

He whistled a tune, hummed an opera air, walked up and down the passage, and indulged in diligence unrelieved by a single article of furniture, looked up the narrow stairs, lit by a dirty little round window, and saw, peering from behind the balusters, on the second flight of steps, a face that sent a chill through his heart, like the apparition of a countenance from the grave.

It was a very white face, with large, pure, blue, vacant eyes, low, broad forehead, clear as immaculate purity, surrounded by waving auburn hair, the features matchless in their classic perfection, and the mouth, half open, beautifully formed, showed a row of teeth that glittered like white jewels. The lost, forlorn look of the countenance touched his heart, and he beckoned to it, moving pleasantly. It disappeared for an instant, the mouth opening a little wider and the blue eyes distending. Suddenly the face made a shuffle of a person, and then looked into his eyes with a keen, penetrating glare.

"Will, sir!" exclaimed Gringrip.

"Mr. Gringrip, I want to borrow money of you, which you know well enough my family will repay."

"I know no such thing."

"You do; and you know that you have already loaned me, Mr. Kingsland, and more always found it easy to quiet the boldest. Quit my premises this instant, or I'll send for an officer and have you put out."

"Send for one, Mr. Gringrip; I'll wait till he arrives. I am content to go to prison, if that be the penalty I must pay for my intrusion, for it is worth it. I have gained a secret worth thousands. I am master of the situation."

"It is more than you are of yourself. You are crazy."

"My mind is lucid, and so can I make my meaning. What face was that which peered over the balusters as me just now?"

Mr. Gringrip interrogated the countenance of the old man became a fearful sight to behold, the like of which Madame Tussaud's famous room of horrors never contained. Ugly as he was by nature, the green pallor that now overspread Gringrip's face, made him look ten times more abhorrent and devilish, and the writhings of his features in his effort to maintain composure, rendered them as horrible as the snakes in the hair of the Furies.

"What business have you to pry into my family affairs?" gasped he at last, hardly knowing what he said.

"I have business, Gregory," replied Victor, with cool familiarity, delighted to find that he had struck the right vein at last, "and authority, too, if I think proper to use it. I will, if you are at leisure, enter into full particulars; if not, I will resort to the business that brought me here."

"What, what is it?"

"The want of twenty pounds—I mean a hundred dollars."

"Will you let me and my affairs alone henceforth, if I give it to you?"

"Of course; I shall afterwards have nothing to do but to call and repay you the loan."

"Save yourself the trouble. I am not such a fool as to lend, without security, to spendthrifts.

"Pay—pay the money as the price of a full exemption from all remark or interference from you with reference to my affairs hereafter. Do you understand me?"

"Perfectly."

"That you are not to breathe a word about my affairs, or to enter this threshold again."

"You give me a hundred dollars to do neither one thing nor the other."

"Exactly."

"Good."

"Here's the money," said Gringrip, handing him ten fifty dollar bills from his portly pocketbook.

"Thank you, Gregory. Good-bye!"

"Good-day to you," said Gringrip, shutting the door after him, and muttering as he returned to his supper:

"I'll be the death of the scrapegrace if he ever ventures into this house again."

"I'll bleed the old miserly villain to death," said Victor Kingsland to himself, as he descended into the street.

CHAPTER IX.

One, whose voice was vehement melody
Sate by a well, under the willow-trees;
The breath of her false mouth was like faint flowers;
Her touch was as clinging flame.
Out of her looks into my vitals came,
And there they lay burning and burnt them raw
A killing air, which pierced like honey dew
Into the core of trees hard.—
Shelly's Epipsychidion.

DUKE St. CROIX had succeeded beyond his most sanguine expectations in seeing Mordaunt Elfstone re-established in his fitting position in society. Count Elfstone himself, by his apparent obliviousness of thought and calmness of action, contributed principally to this happy result, and his friends generally were secretly wished to prevent his restoration to his former dignity and freedom, were confounded in their machinations by a quiet discretion which brought which put their own rationality and wisdom to shame. It was vain for any of them to deny his claims to perfect freedom, for what they could do was to predict (and even wish, alas!) the return of his madness. St. Croix rejoiced greatly in the return of Mordaunt, for whom he entertained a profound esteem and veneration, and though he longed to get back to France (for he had kept aloof from Paris since the latter took up his abode in his family mansion in Worcestershire), he delayed his return till Bertram Hapswell joined them.

Bertram had, to gratify Elfstone, been following up some imagined clue to the fate of the lost Lady Alice, and had been out in spite of the most diligent and close researches, returned as wise as he went, and quite cast down with his failure. Marina was in France on a like mission, and Elfstone himself would have started on a similar journey but for the entreaties of his friends that he remain where they were of the disturbed state of the continent, and of the schemes his relatives would probably make a third attempt to carry out during his absence abroad.

Julian St. Croix took an affectionate farewell of the man he considered his own father, and toward him he had shown a filial regard and duty and commended him to the friendly offices of Bertram Hapswell. St. Croix was not long in France ere he had ascertained the whereabouts of Marina and paid her a visit. He found her in an obscure lodging in the Rue de Nord, residing with Madame Nitouche; a tall, dark and fairy! eyed lady of a malignant temper and pious turn, who exposed, in her humble purchases, prayers and penance to atone for an evil life and win her way into heaven. Her religion was superstition, her superstition was blind gravelling, and her formal and laborious piety seemed rather to obscure than brighten her intellect, and to narrow rather than expand her sympathies for her fellow-beings. Marina was her daughter, but she had never acknowledged her, and seldom received her under her roof. She was a humble purchaser, and penance to atone for an evil life and win her way into heaven. Her religion was superstition, her superstition was blind gravelling, and her formal and laborious piety seemed rather to obscure than brighten her intellect, and to narrow rather than expand her sympathies for her fellow-beings. Marina was her daughter, but she had never acknowledged her, and seldom received her under her roof. She was a humble purchaser, and considerable presents. Avarice and superstition piety were the ruling passions with Madame Nitouche, and poor Marina besieged her heart in vain for the smallest share of maternal love. The mother had deserted the daughter at a period of the latter's life when she had nearly expired, when Julian St. Croix arrived and effected an entire change in the sentiments of her daughter that the duration of her stay had nearly expired, when Julian St. Croix arrived and effected an entire change in the sentiments of her daughter that the duration of her stay had nearly expired, when Marina with apparent kindness, and made herself sure of her daughter's sympathy, if not saintly person. She had heard much of St. Croix before she saw him—of his eloquent defence of the church, his zeal, and his burning goodness; had perused some of his writings, and looked upon him as a holy youth destined to canonization. Marina was delighted to perceive that his influence over her mother was very great, and hoped to profit by it.

She knew the struggle that was going on in the mind of St. Croix. She knew that he loved her and that he loved against a sense of duty, and therefore the more deeply and ardently. His resistance to the overwhelming passion that absorbed him rendered it more chafed and maddened it, rendering it the more intense and self-devouring. His heart and soul were filled with her, and the sweet dream of possessing her, was he felt, to him worth all the world besides. It was interoicating to declare in think of her as one who was to become his own, but often as he would drive the delicious delusion from his mind, it came back to him again and again, more entrancing at each return.

On one occasion he had accompanied her to the ruins of the Castle Pressomptueux, and while they were wandering about the crumbling walls and towers, her fascinating power almost drew the soul out of him. He trembled, and his voice betrayed in every tone the burning agitation of love that throbbed in his heart so tumultuously. Marina saw that her witchery had done its work, and that her victim was in her power.

They entered the ruined chapel of the castle. There was little left of it, and that was open to the sky and its influences. Its walls were crumbling to the earth, and the grass grew in its aisles. Opposite the remains of the altar, upon a sunken monument, half covered with verdure, they sat down and gazed upon the relics before them. They soon ceased to consider, or even to see the sacred fragment before them, for their thoughts were too busy with each other, and both felt that the moment of mutual avowal was arriving. Marina was neither agitated nor embarrassed, but Julian was both, and he powerfully wrought upon by his passion as to be lost to everything but one absorbing emotion. Marina had turned her magnificent gaze upon him, and when he ventured to glance at her, and their eyes met. The tender lustre of hers drew him like a spell, and, with a sigh, the last sigh of the struggle, he surrendered himself wholly to the o'ermastering weakness. His trembling and venturesome arm stole round her waist, and his burning and liquid soul rose to his very lips.

"Julian," said she, archly and tenderly, "are you resolved to become a priest?"

"I have no resolution at all, now, Marina. I once aspired to be the glorious instrument of restoring the true church to its pristine purity and perfection, which the wicked ways of designing and evil men had corrupted; but my ardor and my enthusiasm has abated much of late. Can you not guess why, Marina?"

She looked up to the beautiful arm on Julien's shoulder, looked closer into his eyes, and answered with apparent simplicity:

"Julian, I have many sacred to me with safety, my friend, for I am very fond of you. What has changed your mind, Julien."

"My love for you, Marina."

"I love you, too, Julien."

Julian's arm drew his fairy fighten that clasped her waist, and his frame shake with the violence of his feelings. His lips quivered, his eyes filled, and, pressing her to his bosom, he exclaimed impetuously:

"Marina, you are dearer to me than life, than heaven itself, and that is why I no longer wish to be a priest."

Marina was reared in the school of deceit, and was, in fact, a consummate adept in the art. Madame Nitouche had much sympathy and esteem for Julien, but she did not love him. When his lips had told her of the existence of his passion, but she did not show it, for she had an object to gain.

"Julien, you know not who or what I am. You are a count, and I am ignorant of my father, and that my mother has never yet acknowledged me. I have been an outcast from my birth! Have I not left an outcast's life. Your declaration has taken me by surprise, but I love you too well to ruin or disgrace you. Leave me here, before I consult holy altar, do I kneel and swear not to promise pledge, or bond of love shall be exchanged between us, till I can honorable paternity is proven and acknowledged to be mine."

"I no not Madame Nitouche your mother?"

"She shall when she acknowledge me, I believe I am her daughter. She has my secret, and more than mine, but keeps them like the grave. If you love me, if you be a gentleman, if you believe, make her your friend, for she knows all we most wish to learn. You have already great influence over her, for she considers you a young saint, and hopes that in you, for she is very superstitious, she will obtain an immense legacy. Remember the recording angel to blot out her many sins and write her name in the book of eternal life. If she reveal you in any other light, you would have no more weight than I, who have to pay gold for the privilege of crossing her threshold."

"This is all invention, perplexity and mystery to me."

"To be plain, then, I am sure that my mother knows more of Elfstone's wife than I do, where his child is living."

"Why did you not tell of this before?"

"Because I was not certain of her knowledge as I am now, and because the least inadvertence might seal up her lips for ever."

"As long for ever sealed!" exclaimed a voice near them.

They started to their feet, and from behind the ruined altar glided Madame Nitouche herself, her black eyes gleaming terribly, and her tall form threatening them like a fiend-inspired prophet.

"Wretch!" she cried; "is it not enough that you have offended every human law and plotted against the peace of my house, but you lay schemes to abuse religion, to violate the sanctities of the church, and coil into heaven to pollute it? I always suspected you to be either a heretic or a hypocrite, and now I find you both. You are no child of mine, but the daughter of an idiotic mountebank and his meanest and most hideous man I ever beheld. I hate you, and never do you dare to cross my threshold again. Your room shall be occupied to my home before such a serpent as you are."

Marina threw herself imploringly at the feet of the fierce speaker, who spurned her with her foot, and stalked out of the ruin with the air of the sternest of the Furies.

THE CAMPHOR TREE.—This tree is indigenous to all parts of China, Japan, Formosa, Burmah and Chinese Tartary, and flourishes as far north as the Amoor country, but it is found in the greatest abundance along the eastern coast of China, between Amoy and Shanghai. In the districts of Kwangtung and Fuchien it grows in dense forests, the trunk attaining a very great size. The principal market for camphor is within the camphor guns of commerce does not in any case exude from the tree, as has been so generally supposed; but it is obtained from the leaves, twigs and smaller roots by distillation.

A LOVE SONG.

BY ERNEST TREVOR.

My darling is the gentlest thing
That breathes the blessed air,
Her smile is like a gleam of spring
When the young days are fair.

And then her voice is sweeter far
Than music in the night,
Her love is now the guiding star
That tills my soul with light.

And when her loving glance is thrown
Upon my heart to shine,
I joy to think she is my own—
Mine only—only mine!

The Gulf Between Them.

BY MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

CHAPTER XLII.—CONTINUED.

VITCHITA had been so much occupied above stairs that she found no opportunity for observation, otherwise Dolph's manner and the mysterious air of importance which Clo assumed would have warned her that something extraordinary had happened.

Clo made Sally wait on her more than ever, boxed the girl's ears for her own mistakes, tried on new turbans, surveyed herself in the glass, and strutted about in the highest state of feminine triumph. Dolph made his best to be happy, but it required a vivid recollection of the money he should acquire to make him at all comfortable. He kept repeating to himself:

"Five hundred dollars! One—two—three—four—five!"

Then he would remember Victoria's youth and yellow beauty, his own delicious freedom, and groan heavily. But he was sure to bring up his spirits again by muttering, vigorously:

"Five hundred dollars! One—two—three—four—five!"

But it was a season of holiday delight to Clorinda. The highest aspiration of her spinster soul was soon to be gratified—she would have a husband! No long engagement for her; she made up her mind to that on the moment. With the bird once in the cage, she was not going to lose time in closing the door—not she!

She fed her sable intended to repletion with dainties, and with spoke marvels for his digestion that after all the dinner he had eaten he could make such havoc among the cake and preserves, and still look complacently forward to the prospect of broiled chicken. Crisp curlicues disappeared like fleetwork in his nimble jaws, he held in a very pleasant stock of tongue considering his natural advantages that way, made a liberal exercise of an immense fruitful mouth, softened the effect with a whole mould of apricot oily.

Dinah and Vic certainly kept him in countenance, but Clorinda rather trifled with the sweets, drinking so much strong tea in her pleasure absorbation, that to an observer given to ludicrous ideas, her jetty face would have suggested the idea of an old fashioned black teapot, with her pug nose for the chubby spout. Sally witnessed this dashing festival from behind the door, scraped the jelly left in the glasses, stole bits of toast and muffins on their road to the table, and solaced her appetite on various fragments, till at last, growing so bold and getting so fussy, that she crept to the pantry and pocketed half a pumpkin pie. Until it had disappeared, like a train down a tunnel, she never remembered that Clo was sure to miss it in the morning, but she reflected, in her fright, that it was possible to stuff the cat up in the closet at bedtime, and so escape detection.

After tea Dolph brought out a pack of cards—a pack which had mysteriously disappeared from the library some time before—and inducted the ladies into the mysteries of sundry little games, winning their pennies easily and cheating them without the slightest scruple.

That was a point beyond Clo, she could not lose her money even to Dolph, and vowed that she would only play for pins.

"Gamblin's wicked," she said, virtuously.

So they played for pins, and Dolph allowed her to be the winner. When she had all, Clo gave up crooked ones in payment, and thus her high spirits were preserved untarnished.

At last Clo arrived and made the circle complete. A great, shiny creature, uglier than a mortal easily can be, at whom Miss Dinah cast a lamplighting glances and did the fascinating in a way which Clo copied on the instant.

Dolph reminded her of the chicken, and proposed making a bowl of flip while she cooked the fowl, an idea which was received with unanimous approval.

They were gathered about the supper-table, Dolph was carver, and managed to secure an unfair proportion of delicate bits, proposed a number of toasts to suit Othello's palate, and then devoured in them before the unfortunate creature could get more than a look at the dainties.

Othello was giving an account of his labors during the evening, and from his story it was quite evident that he had been the most important personage in the assembly, and Dinah shone like a housedoor knob with the triumph she had in his success.

"Oh, lawd!" said he, suddenly; "I quite forgot!"

"What, what?" they asked.

"Why, what Mr. Mosehy said. 'Spec it don't concarn nobody here; only, as Miss Clorinday's a lady of property, she naterally feels interested in what happens to oder folks wid forfine."

Clo bridled, and Dolph said majestically, feeling that he had already a share in her wealth:

"In course, in course; perceed, Mr. Othello."

"Wal, yer see de gemmen was talkin 'bout de banks—I didn't hear de beginning, 'cause dat boy, Pete Hopkins, let de punch glasses fall, and I was a-doin' him."

"Did it break 'em?" cried Dinah, feeling an interest in the details not shared in by the others.

"Only two. I gave him six cracks for each, little limb!"

"Wal, 'bout de bank," said Dolph, impatiently. "Yes, dat's what I'm gwine to tell. Mr. Mosehy, he said—you know him—dat tall man."

"Laws, we know him well 'nuff," said Vic. "Go on if you're gwine to tell."

Dinah looked reproachfully at her, and Othello continued:

"Mr. Mosehy—he said de Trader's Bank had blowed all to smash—clean up."

A scream from Clorinda brought them all to their feet.

"Massy sakes," cried Vic; "what is it?"

"Have yer got fits?" demanded Dinah.

"Bring de peppermint, you ugly-eyed Othello.

"Miss Clorinday, dear Miss Clorindy, what am it?" cried Dolph, with a sudden sinking at his heart.

Clo would have had hysterics if she had been a fine lady, as it was she gave two or three yells, kicked the table, pulled her frizzed hair, and shouted, amid her fears:

"You Sally, get my bonnet—quick!"

She rose, and they crowded about her.

"What be you gwine? What's up?"

"Git my bonnet!" she repeated. "Tse gwine to York, I is."

"To York, this time o' night? Vic cried.

"Yes, I can—let me go."

Dolph laid a hand on her arm.

"Only 'splain, Clorindy, 'splain!"

"I'm gwine to git at dem banks. I want my money—I'll have it! Marster shall git it. Oh de villin scampgeses! I want my money."

Dolph dropped speechless into a chair, while the rest poured out floods of questions, which Clorinda was in no state to answer.

"Was yer money in dat bank?"

"Tse gwine to York; get my bonnit!"

"They fairly shook her in their curiosity.

"Why didn't yer speak, Clo? Vic. "Was yer money in de bank?"

"Yis; dey rob'd me. Oh! oh! Five hundred dollars—all it's got, all it's gone!" she sobbed. "I'll hev it! I'll hev it! Call marster! Git my bonnit. Oh! oh!"

The poor maid her sit down, they explained to her that nothing could be done until the next day, and finally established that nothing could. All this while Dolph sat without offering one word of consolation: now he said:

"Mebby dat's some mistake, Othello."

"No, dar ain't," persisted the nancsake of Shakespeare's Moor. "Mr. Mosehy's lost ten thousand dollars, and he never to know. De bank's broke to smash, clar 'nuff."

Clo burst into a new paroxysm of distress, and Dolph, after a moment's struggle with his own disappointment, turned on her:

"Yer needn't rouse de house wid yer hurly-burly," said he, savagely. "Better 'member Miss Elsie's sick."

Clo stared at him in tearless horror; a new fear struck her; he was going to desert her.

"Don't talk so," she said; "tink of yesterday, Dolph!"

Dolph drew himself up, and looked first at her and then at the company with an air of profound astonishment.

"I tink her brain is turned," said he.

"Taint!" roared Clo. "Oh, Dolphy, yer said yer loved me; yer know yer did; did yer didn't yer love money; did yer? I was Venus in yer eyes—oh—oh!"

"Wal, I do declar!" cried Vic.

Dolph drew into a great rage.

"Miss Clorindy, yer sorrow makes yer forget yerself; yer's out of yer senses."

Clo threw her apron from her eyes and looked at him; lightning was gathering there which he would have done well to heed, but he did not.

"Does yer mean that?" she demanded, sternly.

"Sartin, I does."

"Yer jilted Isabellin' at my feet an' sayin' I wasn't de onions made yer cry; a pleadin' and a coaxin' till I scented to marry yer."

"It's quite true, Miss Clorindy," said Dolph, doggedly.

"Take care! Jis' tink!"

"Miss Clo, dis ere sin't decorous; I'se 'stonish at yer."

With one yell and a bound like an unchained Ogress Clo sprang at him. Dolph dodged, ran behind the startled Othello, jumped through the chairs, through the kitchen and back, and Clo at his heels. She had caught up a broom; once or twice she had managed to hit him, and her yells of rage mingled with Dolph's cries were hideous.

"Take her off," he shrieked; "ketch a hold of her!"

"I'll kill him," shouted Clo. "I'll break every bone in his finken body! Oh, yer varmint, yer varmint!"

They laid hands on Clorinda at length, though it was a difficult operation; and Dolph took refuge behind a great chair, peeping through the slats at the back, with his eyes rolling and his teeth chattering like some frightened monkey in a cage.

The women were consoling and blaming Clo; Vic divided between conviction and anger, and Othello, like a sensible man, siding neither way.

Suddenly they were roused by a prolonged cry from the floor above, by a shriek and unearthly that it froze the blood in their veins. In an instant there followed a loud knocking at the outer door, and forgetful of their own troubles, they crowded together like a flock of frightened crows driven from a cornfield.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE evening had passed very pleasantly to Essie; Mellen had humored her most whatever cost to himself, and kept her thoughts as much aloof as possible from the events of the past days.

It was growing late, and he had several times reminded her that it was time she went to rest. Tom Fuller had taken the first hint and retired.

"Let me sit up a little longer," she pleaded; "I am not in the least sleepy; it is so nice to get out of that dull chamber."

"But I am afraid you will tire yourself so completely that to-morrow you cannot come down at all."

"There is not the slightest danger of that; I am stronger than you think. When this little dizziness in my head leaves me I shall be quite well."

They talked a few moments longer, then she began turning over the papers on a stand near her sofa. Suddenly she took up a letter, and glancing at the writing, exclaimed:

"This is from Mr. Hudson! You did not tell me that you had heard?"

"It came this afternoon while you were asleep."

"What does he say? Does he know where she is? Will you send him money for her!"

"There is no address."

"But she must have it; she can't live."

"My dear, he has her money in his hands. He writes me that he has invested some he sold out the stocks by her orders, and that he has been expecting her for several days to call on him for the money. She was doubtless preparing to leave the country with that man."

Elsie fell back on the sofa overwhelmed by the new fear which broke over her. The money had not been paid; there was no safety, for Elizabeth's sacrifice had been in vain! What to do—how to act! Before her mind had left her brain there was a sound at the door of the little passage which led to the grounds.

"What is that?" exclaimed Mellen. "Some one trying that door."

"No, no," she said. "Come back; it's nothing; I'm afraid; come back!"

He gave no attention to her cry, but hurried towards the door, while she was attempting to rise from the sofa; he had it open, she had heard a muttered curse, an answering imprecation from the passage, Mellen had thrust the outer door ajar and a man just entering the passage with whom Mellen closed instantly in a fearful struggle.

Essie was too much overcome to speak; she knew him; then it was her insane shriek rang through the house.

Mellen forced the man into the room, flung him against the wall, locked the door, and exclaimed in a terrible voice:

"Ah hah! I have you!"

A bell was rang at the front entrance, but no one in that room heeded it.

Mellen sprang towards the man again, but he cried savagely:

"Keep off, if you value your life, keep off."

One of the men had been enough; she knew him; then it was her insane shriek rang through the house.

"I did not come here to fight you, sare," said Ford, calling up a sudden audacity. "It's an honor I did not wish."

"I know who you expected to see; but the woman is gone; you must seek her elsewhere!"

Ford, at Mellen's words, turned to the sofa; no Mellen remembered Elsie's presence.

"No," he cried, pointing to her, "that woman only has the beauty she blood did not run in her veins; if you had struck me there the blow would have been keener."

The man trembled again; Elsie heard both words and laugh, but she could not move; if she had been laid out shrouded for burial she could not have been more helpless.

"So you drove your wife away; out of the house? cried the man. "I guessed as much."

"She is gone for ever, but you shall not live to join her."

"Before now she is dead! Listen to what you have done. Your wife was rescued at an angel. She is dead, and I can tell you so, knowing how it will poison your life. If there was guilt or disgrace in her name it belonged to it but pretty heap of deception on the sofa. Hear that, and let your soul writhe under it, for your blood does run in her veins."

"Liar! Traitor!" cried Mellen.

Again came a violent ringing of the door-bell; steps in the hall; this time the two men heard the words,

"I am pa.sured," muttered Ford; "they've cerered me."

"I will give you up if these are enemies," cried Mellen; "there is no escape."

He took one stride towards the door, but Ford called out:

"You are giving up your sister's husband; remember the whole world shall know it."

There was bitter truth in the tone, but before Mellen could move or speak the door opened and two officers entered the room.

"You have him safe," said one of the intruders as he passed Mellen. "Caught at last, my fine fellow."

Ford started back—put his hand to his breast—there was a flash—a stunning report—he staggered back against the wall, shot through the chest.

"How often do you knead bread?" asked one housekeeper of another.

"How often? Why, I might say we need it continually," the other replied.

CHIT-CHAT WITH THE LADIES.

ARE you afraid of worms? If you are, don't go to Brooklyn for the next two months. That city's churches ought to change its respectable nomme de ville, and call itself the "City of Worms." Worms are never witnessed such a spectacle as the good, cleanly and fashionable Brooklynites, assembled in the sanctuary of a Sabbath morning, after a walk through the wormbowered streets. Rows of ladies in the latest Parisian confabulations, white bonnets and black, pink bonnets and blue, all ornamented with these detestable objects, things that have—perhaps Sutton and I might differ—but things that appear to have legs and hands, one at each side, and a couple of tails joined in the middle.

On this lady's black lace bonnet, with corn-colored plumes, stands a green one, large, bold, of an inquisitive disposition. When the reverend gentleman under this arises also, it looks about, it shakes its head at the congregation; it nods to a friendly worm perched on the blue bloomer of an unfortunate at short, then it lies down and takes a nap, then it once more arises and looks about it, with both its heads erect. All over the church you may see them: on the floor of the aisles, on skirts of dresses and backs of hymn-books—nay, the disgusting things even climb the pulpit and take a peep into the great pit bible, in defiance alike of the sexton and the minister.

Visit a Brooklyn friend—and in this general exodus of the worms there must of your friends will be found now-a-days in Brooklyn—and the best part of the day will be spent in picking you, as though you were dried currants, and after them, when at leisure, you will find a worm in every gather of your dress, one in each gaiter, and several done up in the waterfall on which you prize yourself. Your visit will be a succession of small shrieks, and your dresses will be troubled by visions of monstrous worms. Brooklyn is the worm's own heath, the seeking where they may devour.

Perhaps say that if only the fathers of the worm-plagued city chose to take the matter in hand, they could banish the tormentors by law. If it is true, we wonder they do not do it. Probably they relish worms in their native soil—say better than other Brooklynites do in their tea, where they are frequently discovered, dreadfully scalded, but not dead—such worms never die. What could be done we do know. In other places the cure has more have been driven away by energetic measures. Couldn't Mr. Henry Ward Beecher preach to them and regresent the impropriety of their conduct? Or Dr. Cheever come to church. Couldn't a worm picnic be brought about, every Brooklynite to turn out to essential music and pick worms from dawn to sunset, the one picking the most to receive a gold medal? Can no one suggest anything?

Second Hand Husbands.

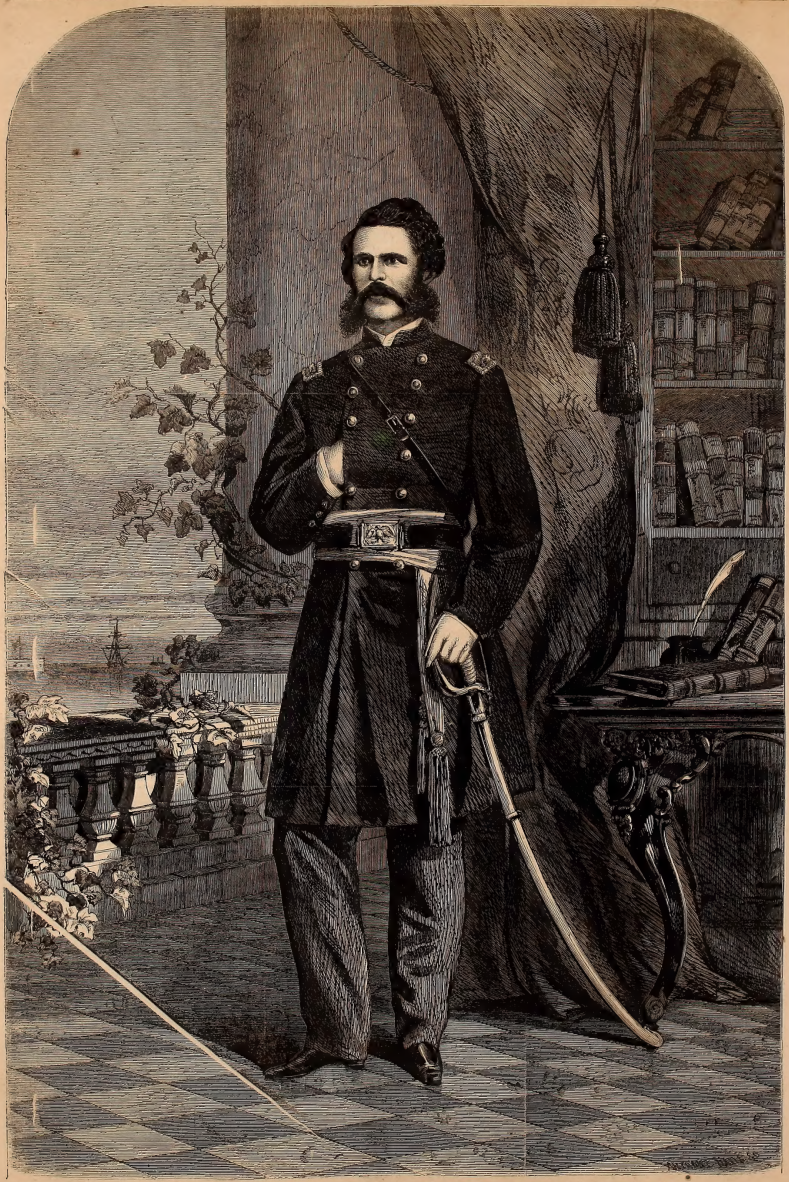
Why is it, we wonder, that second husbands always turn out so badly? It is the most mysterious thing in the world that a number of mature years' experience always makes a worse choice when she selects a spouse than the youngest boarding-school miss who ever eloped with the object of her affections, with whom she had been acquainted but a fortnight. No one ever feels surprised, but a few days' acquaintance suffices to decide on the perfect selection No. 2. After the deluded widow has bestowed her hand and heart upon him the most singular metamorphis takes place. From a gallant devoted lover he becomes a ferocious and brutal husband; his wife's days are spent in regretting the black eye he has bestowed on her arme with Russian salve; her nights in sitting up to see that he comes home safely; she dares not return in his boots; he turns her eldest son out of doors; insults her distant relatives from whom she has expectations; discountenances tea visits; refuses to allow her a pew in church or a visit to the opera; makes away with her money in a most mysterious manner; and caps the climax by eloping with the waiting-maid and all she deluded wife's portable property, leaving her to earn her own livelihood and herself upon the mercy of her relations. For our part, we wonder how any widow with a grain of sense, with such a dreadful example before her in the face on all sides, and cannot unravel the mystery. We should certainly remember the fate of Bluebeard's master's children and second husbands never turn out well.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THERE is little news of interest from the Old World. The armistice still continues between the Germans and the Danes, but would expire on the 12th June. The Conference had met three times, but there had been no visible progress made towards a solution, but the Danish and English papers asserted that Austria and Prussia were pursuing a treacherous policy. The popular feeling in England in favor of the Danes was increasing, and it was expected a motion would be here Lord Palmerston into a vigorous policy against the Germans. On the other hand Queen Victoria remains averse to taking any step against the native land of her late husband and daughter, and the sympathy of all her two eldest daughters, more especially as one of them will, in all human probability, be Queen of Prussia. The Tsar had declared his strengthened the sovereignty of the King of Prussia, who, if he be not discreet, may yet precipitate a war so far as to involve all Northern nations into war, in which case they would very probably purchase the alliance of France by permitting her to take the Rhine. Certainly Louis Napoleon can never expect a fairer opportunity of accomplishing one of the objects of his ambition.

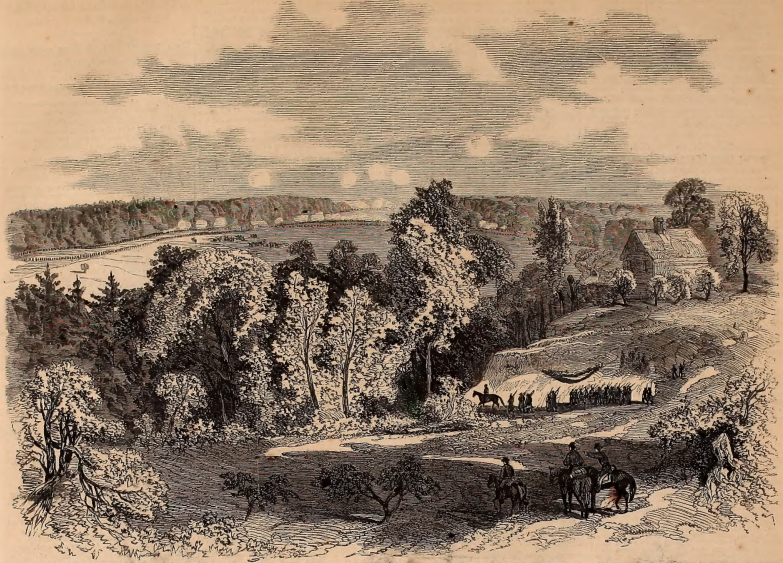
In England there is a lull, both social and political, the chief subject being Gladstone's misdemeanor speech on the Abyssinian question. Gladstone says the mess and pecuniary character of the man, many think: that he had carefully prepared to lend the enhanced guard that he may betray it, or hold it off. It may be, however, that being a plebeian, he may have had inadvertently secret, betrayed a conspiracy, which so many of his class cherish.

POPE PIUS IX. was in a very precarious condition, and his death was expected hourly, but at any time he was in a great effort made by Louis Napoleon to get "a marriageable Princess" to succeed him. In the event of the Pope's death Napoleon said that the only chance for a united Italy was for the Pope's manageable Pope to succeed Pius IX.



Liberal efforts were being made in Vienna to recruit the Austrian contingent for Mexico. It was ostensibly to be sent to Algeria, but it was known the climate was much treble that number.

The Chilean Republicists had suffered a defeat, and the English commander of the Anglo-Chilenos continued to resign his command.



The news from Vera Cruz is to the 21st May. Maximilian had not arrived—great preparations had been made to receive him.

From Peru we hear that the seizure of the Chinchas Islands by the Spanish navy had caused great excitement, and over 100,000 Peruvians had volunteered to defend the honor of their country. The Chilians had also taken up their cause, and sent their fleet to assist the Peruvians. Bolivar had likewise joined them.

From Panama we learn that the French Consul's house had been attacked by the mob, it being suspected that the Spanish Commissioner, who authorized the outrage on Peru, was in it. He had, however, managed escape on board the British mail steamer.

GRANT'S CAMPAIGN IN VIRGINIA.—BATTLE AT JERICHO FORD, ON THE NORTH ANNA, MAY 23.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, EDWIN FORBES.

BATTLE OF JERICHO MILLS,

May 23.

WHEN Grant compelled Lee to leave his strong ground at Spottsylvania Court-house and fall back behind the North Anna, he pushed on to cross that stream and surges him.

Gen. Warren, on reaching Carmel Church, turned into the Spottsylvania and Hanover junction turnpike and proceeded to Jericho mills, or the ford of that name, on the South Anna. No enemy was found there to oppose them and Griffin's division crossed, the water not being deep, though the bottom is rocky and uneven and the current swift.

About four P. M. the entire corps had crossed the river, except the batteries, and was placed in position. Our skirmishers began feeling for the enemy. Nearly two hours had passed. Only occasional exchanges of shots occurred between the skirmishers. The impression grew that the enemy was in no force in our front, and that he had calculated on our crossing further down the river, where the second corps was then having its passage disputed, as we knew from the heavy cannonading heard in that direction. Our men were taking matters easy. Some had their arms stacked; many were cooking their coffee. The sixth corps were coming up behind us. Before pushing further it was deemed prudent to await their arrival. Suddenly—a thunderbolt was never more sudden—the enemy assailed our line.

The fourth division for a moment gave way under the sudden shock, but it was only for a moment. They quickly rallied, and were unshaken after.

wards. General Griffin's and General Crawford's divisions met the assault with veteran firmness. As quick as had been the onslaught of the enemy, we were in readiness to resist the attack. For a while the musketry firing was incessant and terrible. Our batteries on both sides of the river opened in a moment. The first giving way of the fourth division compelled Colonel Sweitzer's brigade to swing round a portion of his line on the right to protect his flank. Three regiments of General Bartlett's brigade—the 1st Michigan, Lieut.-Col. Trowe; 44th Michigan, Major Elliott, and 83d Pennsylvania, Lieut.-Col. McCoy—were sent to his assistance, and, with the batteries on the right, rendered successfully the efforts made to flank us.

Here the 44th regiment, marching by the flank, and a rebel regiment marching also by the flank, and getting for the time, but the latter only for a time, but yet until they had captured Col. Brown, commanding brigade, and a large number of other prisoners.

Only with darkness closed the contest, and the corps had achieved splendidly. Of the battle all to itself, and there could be no disputing the gallantry of the troops and brilliancy of the victory.

COL. L. C. BAKER,

Special Agent of the War Department.

THE following extracts on page 188 represents one of the most remarkable men in his vocation that has been developed by this war; and though we are pleased at having an opportunity of presenting it to our page, we doubt the policy of giving the roguish contractors and public peculators, of whom the Colonel has been an unremitting scourge, such a favorable opportunity of studying with advantage the lineaments of the man whom it is their interest to avoid. Art, however, can have no scruple as to notoriety; so the Secret Government-agent will have his place in the gallery among other celebrities of history.

Col. Baker was born in Central New York, in 1826, of old Revolutionary stock, and early developed those traits of sagacity and courage which were destined in maturer years to make him famous. He grew to manhood in the West, whither his father had transferred himself; and being of the necessary age when the war broke out, soon after he came of age, sought the more exciting occupations of the cities of the East. He was engaged in mechanical business in Philadelphia, for a long time, but finding that too slow for his enterprising nature he yielded to the prevailing fever for the North-West coast, and went to California in 1851.

The Vigilance Committee of San Francisco attended Col. Baker for the first opportunity to exhibit those peculiar qualities for detecting roguery and tracing crime which have since carried him to the head of his profession. He was one of the most prominent as well as efficient members of that remarkable organization, and such were his services, that when the committee disbanded, after having purified Californian society of its evil elements, the leading members of the body came to demand that Col. Baker should be received from them into the regular Police Department of the city.

It is not our purpose to detail the remarkable discoveries and captures which signalized the career of Col. Baker as Agent in the Police Department and on the Pacific Coast. It is sufficient for our purpose to say that he served four years without a break, and that, notwithstanding the excitement of a position calling into requisition the highest abilities, as an ominous of the war and went to Washington, to tender his services to the Government. The first impulse was to raise a company of infantry, but being introduced to Gen. Scott, with letters recurring to his services in San Francisco, the old veteran determined to employ him in a secret agent to the War Department, and in a little while entrusted to him the most ample powers.

After a series of successes, which cautious history does not even yet permit us to relate, Col. Baker was ordered, just previous to the first battle of Bull run, for the audacious enterprise of visiting Richmond as a scout, and bringing us news of the whereabouts and numbers of the enemy. In his first attempt he came near, however, he was intercepted by Hostlemann's pickets and sent into Washington a prisoner; but his next effort, which was made a fortnight later, proved successful. He crossed the Potomac by the way of Fort Tobacco, and was soon captured by the troops of Gen. Benham, and sent to Beauregard's headquarters at Manassas. Beauregard, not entirely crediting Col. Baker's protestations of friendly, transferred him, with a list of others, to Richmond, where he was temporarily incarcerated in an embankment, until the so-called President of the Confederacy could find time to give him an audience. By certain representations which Baker had contrived to have laid before Jeff Davis this privilege was at last accorded to him, and he turned the interview that followed to such good account that he parted from "the presence" on parole, and soon afterwards obtained the further permission to leave the city and go down to Fredericksburg. Having thus possessed himself of full information of the rebel strength, he endeavored to return; but, unluckily, after having visited the vicinities of the forts on the river, and thereby learned the value of the position, he was captured by a rebel scouting party and turned back. In the darkness of the night, however, he again effected his escape, reached the bank of the Potomac, found a boat, in which he sculled across, and on the second day afterwards laid before the Scott a complete map of the defences and troops of Richmond. Fredericksburg and Manassas.

On the return of Gen. Scott to private life, Baker, to Gen. Scott, due to the recommendation of Baker himself, was for permanent employment as a secret agent of the War Department, and he has consequently remained in the service of that department ever since. To enlarge the sphere of his usefulness, Col. Baker was created a Provost-Marshal of that department in September last, and to give him dignity as well as authority with his subordinates, he was raised to the flattering rank of Colonel of the army of the United States army.

It is not only against traitors in arms, Confederate spies and insidious traitors in the heart of our community that the talents of Col. Baker have been brought to bear, but corrupt officials, dishonest quartermasters, peculating clerks and rascally contractors have also felt the fatal inclusion of his inexorable shrewdness. We could enumerate numbers who are now expiating through his development the penalty of their offences; and it would not be too much to say that he has saved over a million of the public money, but he is still actively engaged, and we leave his full record to some future time, satisfied at the present to refer to his likenesse as that of an officer whom the loyal may admire, and whom it will be advisable for the dishonest and disloyal to avoid.

AFFAIRS ON RED RIVER.

The Fleet above the Rapids.

THE retreat of Banks from before Shreveport has been attended with difficulties, losses, panic and triumph, which the participants will not soon forget, and which even amid the absorbing interest attendant on the operations of Gens. Grant, Butler and Sherman deserve illustration, and we, therefore, use some of our sketches sent on by our special Artist. The position of the Union fleet above the falls was one of great danger, and we sketch it as it appeared before the gallant Gen. Bailey.

The banks of the Red river are 15 feet high at boating stage, and are generally lined with cotton-wood trees. Back of these on both sides are cultivated lands, generally producing cotton. The dam was made just above Alexandria.

These falls here interrupt navigation for three quarters of a mile. They are not, however, a body of water running over precipitous rocks, but water boiling through broken ones, the descent being gradual. There was at the time only three feet of water here.

Capture of the John Warner and Destruction of the Covington.

To extricate all the vessels was, under the circumstances, not to be expected. The rebels succeeded, on the 4th of May, in blowing up one of the ironclads, as seen in our engraving, and in capturing the transport John Warner, after almost completely destroying her and her passengers by a terrific fire of artillery and musketry from the shore. She was on her way down from Alexandria to Fort de Russy. An officer thus describes the affair:

The Warner was the largest and strongest of the four that we had on the expedition, and was provided with bales of cotton around her engines, pilot-house and quarters. She had a pilot-house at the bow, and also one behind to protect the rear, and we had rather envied her apparent safety.

Just as she passed the bend around the plantation, three batteries opened upon her, one from the rear and in front, and one from the side. She was soon completely riddled, and drifted helplessly down, a tow for a thousand muskets.

The gunboats attempted to return the fire, but it was found almost impossible to elevate the guns sufficiently to reach the rebels, as the banks of the river were steep and high, while the rifled Parrotts of the rebels—captured from us at Manchester—were plunging through the decks, which did fearful execution. The Covington was soon completely disabled. Her escapings were a murder shot away and wheel shattered. The pilot-house was demolished, two or three of the guns rendered useless, and many of the men killed.

In the meantime the Warner had struck her flag, and the Captain of the Covington sent some men to burn her; but the officer whom he sent on board of her was completely covered with dead and dying that he couldn't do his duties and returned. The Covington was finally abandoned by her crew and set fire to. She blew up in a few minutes.

The other boat, the Signal, was not much more fortunate. She was disabled after about an hour's fighting, and finally surrendered. The few that escaped from the Covington and the Signal, with the gallant Lieutenant-Commander Fleming, floated up the bank, and many were shot in making the attempt. The two captured were then brought overboard, and reached the shore. Two of the pilots escaped, and all but one of the officers of the Covington escaped. Most almost all the officers of the Onio regiment, and a large number of the men were either killed or wounded. Some escaped into the woods, and such as were not recaptured by rebel scouts were either picked up by our boats or made their way to Alexandria.

THE BATTLE OF RESACA, GA.

WHILE Grant has been steadily driving Lee in on Richmond, with stubborn fighting as well patient strategy, Sherman has been equally successful in forcing from before him Johnston, the ex-pet of the rebels.

On the 14th of May he was in face of Resaca, a place situated in the Great Bend of Coitoma river, with the western portion of the bend hovered the east. Across the neck of the peninsula thus formed, extend continuous lines of rifle-pits, covering the solid fortifications, especially about town. Both their flanks rested upon the river, and the line of retreat was completely protected by these fortifications. By the night of Friday our army was in position around the rebel works, except Howard's division and Wood's and Stanley's, which had occupied Dalton the day before, and were sweeping down the line of the Alloona and Western railroad to form a junction with the rest of the army.

On Saturday, the 14th, skirmishing began early in the morning and continued incessantly throughout the day all along the line.

Immediately in front of Gen. Hooker's position in the line was a hill commanding the road to Resaca, down which it was to pass. Our country was very thickly wooded—so much so that the rebels could not see our movements. Butterfield's division was ordered up to do the work, supported on the left by the 33 division of the corps (Geary's). The ridges was very dense, and but little could be seen of the rebel position, although it was known they had a battery in an earthwork and a strong line of rifle-pits. Butterfield moved to the attack with Ruger's and Candy's brigades, Geary moving to his left.

The charge up the hill was impetuous and grand, and was met by the rebels with a furious fire of grape and canister, musketry, and a storm of lead from their small arms. Part of Gen. Ward's brigade entered the works, grappled with the gunners and struggled for the guns. For a few minutes there was a fierce handto-hand struggle, when the remaining, powder-grimed men, the rebel gunners standing manfully for their pieces, the rebels were compelled to abandon four pieces and retire to another line of works.

AN ADVERTISING PUZZLE.—The following address will puzzle the commonest geniuses of Lindley Murray, and would have sent poor old Cobbett into hysterics, or apoplexy from the London Times:

"Wanted, at Tunbridge Wells, a young person, to wait on two ladies, who can work well at her needle, and is willing to make herself generally useful in washing at table. None under two years' character need apply. The wash is seen in town by applying at Mr. Barker's, 3 Bury street, St. James, on Tuesday, after 11, and Wednesday before two."

We have read this advertisement over at least 50 times without arriving at any satisfactory conclusion, as to whether the young person, or one of the ladies, or the "wash," or Mr. Barker, including the young person, is expected to work well at the needle. How long is their character required? Are they "under" or "None under two years' character need apply." What on earth is washing at table? And why "seen in town?" does not mean that any one possessing a two years' character, and who may consequently be said to be suffering under the affliction, need apply? "The lady in town." "Seen in town" which lady? One of the two ladies, or the young person, or whom? "On Tuesday, after 11, and on Wednesday before two." Which is what two?—ante-meridian?—post-meridian?—morning, or night? How would you like it? In conclusion, we should feel extremely obliged if the advertiser or advertisers, he, she, or they, would consistently answer the following queries: Who?—which?—what?—when?—and where?

A COLLEGE student being examined in Locke, where he speaks of our relations to the Deity, and is asked: "What is meant by 'our' neglect?" he answered, with much simplicity, "Poor relations, sir!"

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

THE HORRORS OF INDIGESTION.—You complain of your stomach, unfortunate dyspeptic: but ought not your stomach to complain of you? Possibly the pepsin you endure are simply the stomach's method of taking revenge upon you for neglecting and abusing it. Perhaps you have never made an effort to improve its condition, but have taken the other alternative, continuing it with unwholesome and incongruous food. Have you ever tried HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS, a proper diet and regular meals? The Bitters in a week would put your digestive organs in perfect order, regulate the flow of bile in accordance with the laws of health, and produce just as much appetite action as would be necessary for your good; and when you were once started right, punctual and regular dieting, with a little of the Tonic now and then, would keep you so. If you have neglected these means of cure, don't blame your stomach for its rebellion. It is merely nature's effort to relieve itself, and if you do not help it you may be indicted for suicide. Diarrhœa, Cholera, some other violent and dangerous disease. There is such a thing as being too late in these matters. HOSTETTER'S BITTERS will cure Dyspepsia; but Dyspepsia may engender diseases which defy all restoratives.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

Literary Agency, Established in 1862.

The subscriber has, for more than 20 years past, been at the head of reading and preparing manuscripts for the Press. At first the labor was one of kindness, and unreturned; gradually it changed to a profession, and showed at so much time, that a small charge in the outset was necessary to defray the expenses. This fee, not exceeding $25, and generally less, commenced with the examination of the critical perusal of a work in manuscript, and the offering of it, if approved, to publishers.

The subscriber continues to receive and read manuscripts in the same manner, giving his candid opinion concerning them, and arranging for their printing and publication, when desired to do so. He makes his charges as small as possible, since his chief object is to aid and benefit authors.

In all cases letters of advice should be forwarded by mail, while manuscripts are sent, prepaid, either through the Post Office or by express, legibly addressed.

Richmond—Gen. Grant's Progress—Patience and Confidence.

An attentive listener among the busy gamblers of Wall street any day during the week past, will bear witness that all of that class of operators concerned in "bulling" gold and stocks are making the most they can of Gen. Grant's detention at the northern outworks of Richmond. What do we hear from these birds of evil omen? Such croakings as these: "Grant is failing out;" "awfully cut up;" "nothing done;" "just where McClellan was when Stonewall Jackson pounced on him;" "Richmond is not Vicksburg, and Lee is not Pemberton," and numerous other flippant, impertinent and suspicious remarks of similar import. Unfortunately too, there are "on 'Change" many ignorant, timid and credulous men, or "lame ducks," as we may technically define them, who are ready to listen to these croaking owls and ravens. Thus "one fool makes many," and the infectious elements of doubt and distrust are diffused from the heart through all the arteries and ramifications of our financial and political system.

There is not the slightest occasion, however, for any apprehension or doubt as to the result of the present struggle for Richmond. The inevitable issue of the campaign—and it is not far off—will be the occupation of the city by the Union army, and the dissolution, capture or disappearance of Jeff Davis to parts unknown. Had the co-operative detachments of Union troops in the Shenandoah valley succeeded in the outset in the part assigned them, and had the James river expedition made thorough work—as was generally expected it would do—in cutting the south side railway connections with the city, we have no doubt that Lee would have been compelled to evacuate the place without a struggle, if possible, and to abandon Virginia in order to subsist his army. But Gen. Grant, on reaching the suburbs of Richmond, found that the chapter of delays and accidents elsewhere had left Lee's communications still open and intact, with his depots of supplies West and South, and that thus he might, at least for a short time, challenge the Union army to the trials of a siege.

Accordingly, Gen. Grant has been reduced, as at Vicksburg, to the deliberate work of regular approaches against Richmond. Recent events, however, we think, will justify the opinion that the city will yet be captured without the tedious labors of a long investment, and without reducing the army of Lee, we apprehend, to the extremity of a surrender or starvation. Gen. Hunter, the new commander of the Department of the Shenandoah Valley, has recently gained a valuable victory over the enemy, and a very important point of occupation, in the capture of Staunton. He has gained the additional advantage there of a junction with the previously detached commands of Gens. Crooks and Averill. We may reasonably conclude, therefore, that with the junction of these officers and their troops, after the defeat and dispersion of the opposing forces of the enemy, Gen. Hunter will unquestionably accomplish the task of cutting off the supplies of the Shenandoah valley and the Lynchburg valley from Gen. Lee, and the connecting canal and railway lines of transportation.

This expedition will thus dispose of the sources of subsistence west and northwest of Richmond, upon which Lee's army and the city largely depend, and will render utterly impracticable another Northern raid by Gen. Lee, should Gen. Grant resolve upon a flank movement, which would place the rebel army between himself and Washington. Having broken up the roads and stripped the country between Richmond and the Shenandoah valley, and thence to the Maryland border, of its supplies, Gen. Grant may move the army of the Potomac down into North or South Carolina without putting Washington in jeopardy from another incursion by Lee. It would be idle to conjecture what Gen. Grant intends to do, although we may safely say that he does not intend deliberately to sit down for a regular siege until he has clearly ascertained that a siege cannot be avoided, and has discovered the strength or weakness of the city's defences on every side, east, west, north and south.

The Richmond journals do not believe the report which was circulated some days ago, in that very credulous community, that Grant was withdrawing to the White House. They remember that when he withdrew from Jackson, Miss., last May, it was only to fall upon the rear of Vicksburg; and so they shrewdly suspect this time that, if he is withdrawing from the Chicahominy, it is only to descend upon the city with crushing force in some other quarter. Such is the strength of his army that he may move by the enemy's flank with impunity, as he has repeatedly proved, and we are sure that he will shortly discover the way to "smoke out" his adversary, and bring him to the test of a ruinous battle to the rebel cause, or an equally disastrous evacuation of Richmond, under cover of the night. The alternative even now presented to Jeff. Davis is, shall Lee's army be sacrificed in the effort to hold Richmond, or shall the city and Virginia be abandoned to save Lee's army?

We undertake to say that certain movements will soon be accomplished by Gen. Grant, which, if they do not compel Gen. Lee stealthily to evacuate the city, will leave him no other alternative but to fight his way out, in order to obtain subsistence for his troops. The late battles, which have disclosed among his killed, wounded and prisoners, the soldiers of Breckenridge from West Virginia, of Beauregard from Charleston, of Hoke and Pickett from North Carolina, of Finnegan from Florida, and some from Joe Johnston in Georgia, betray the exhaustion of the reserves of the rebellion. Consequently, with the fall of Richmond, which is inevitable, as anything in the future depending upon human action can be, the Davis Confederacy must collapse, and the war will speedily come to an end.

Summary of the Week.

VIRGINIA.

The second siege of Richmond now begun by Grant continues without any further development of importance.

On the night of the 6th the rebels made an assault on Gen. Burnside's corps, but were repulsed.

Bowling Green, the county seat of Caroline county, has been burned, in punishment for the firing on a train from the houses.

On the 7th two divisions of the 5th corps attempted to get possession of a bridge on the Chicahominy, but found the enemy posted there in great strength.

Gen. Butler made a demonstration on Petersburg on the 10th. Gen. Kautz, with his cavalry, actually entered the city, but Gen. Gillmore found the enemy prepared, and the strong works too well defended to carry at a rush. Butler's plans had been communicated to Beauregard two days before. It would be well if in these attacks our commanders would take a lesson from Wayne's attack on Stony point. He took precautions to prevent any deserter reaching the enemy.

On the 9th the gunboats silenced Fort Clifton, near Petersburg.

On the 10th the rebels shelled Butler's signal-station at Fort Wisconsin, and their cavalry showed themselves at Turkey Bend.

The rebels made a dash into Wilson's lines, near the Lenny House, on the 9th, and Wilson sent out part of McIntosh's brigade, which came upon Field's division, near Bethesda Church.

Both Lee and Grant are busily engaged in entrenching.

It is rumored that Hancock carried Bottom's bridge on the 11th, but it is by no means certain.

WESTERN VIRGINIA.

The defeat of Sigel has been redeemed by Gen. Hunter, who succeeding to the command at once advanced on the enemy. He came up with Gen. W. E. Jones at Mount Crawford, 12 miles from Staunton, and utterly defeated him.

Jones was left dead on the field, and his successor drew off his army to Waynesboro.

Hunter then occupied Staunton. The fruits of his victory were 20 cannon, many prisoners and stores to an immense amount. He has penetrated so far into the enemy's country that communication with him is difficult, guerillas swarming in his rear.

KENTUCKY.

The guerilla war, renewed by the rebels, begins to develop in its usual forms. The attacks on steamers are now followed by cavalry raids into Kentucky. Mount Sterling was taken on the 8th June, by Gen. Morgan, Cols. Alston and Smith, with 3,000 men, They destroyed the bridges and railroad between Cynthiana and Paris and cut the telegraph. A train on the Louisville and Lexington railroad was also attacked, robbed, and in part destroyed.

They entered the State at Pound gap, and seem charged to destroy as many railroads as possible. Gen. Burbridge has pursued them, and on the 9th came up with them at Mount Sterling, and defeated them. They, however, entered Lexington on the 10th, and robbed many stores, after burning the Central Railroad Depot.

On the 11th, Logan, with 3,000 rebels, attacked Gen. Hobson at Cynthiana, and compelled him to surrender, with the 168th and 171st Ohio—1,200 men. On the 12th Gen. Burbridge came up with the enemy, and after a severe fight routed them, killing, wounding and taking 1,000 men. Morgan's force then scattered.

The rebels besieged Frankfort, but it held out and they abandoned their operations against it on the 11th.

THE MISSISSIPPI.

The attacks, by Marmaduke, on the Mississippi steamers have become at last a regular blockade at Greenville. He has destroyed three transports, capturing the cargoes of two, and has crippled three gunboats, at least, so the Richmond papers say. Accounts from New Orleans state that our gunboats have failed to dislodge the rebels.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The firing on Fort Sumter and on Charleston has been increased by Gen. Foster, who is busily engaged in reorganising his department.

Admiral Dahlgren is also putting his fleet into working order.

LOUISIANA.

The rebels on the 31st May attempted to surprise our pickets a short distance above Morganzia, throwing part of their troops over the Achafalaya, but Gen. Emory drove them back.

GEORGIA.

On the 9th Sherman's cavalry came up with Johnston's forces in a line of hills between Kenesaw and Lost mountain.

NAVAL.

The gunboat Water Witch was captured on the 3rd June, on the Ossebaw sound, by a number of rebel boats, which approached in the dark with muffled oars, and surprised the vessel completely. One negro escaped by swimming a mile, all the rest on board were captured.

CONGRESS.

In the Senate, on the 6th June, after several matters of local interest had been transacted, the Internal Revenue bill was taken up, amendments were adopted approtioning assessors and collectors according to representation in Congress instead of by districts, at the discretion of the President, and taxing incomes between $600 and $5,000 five per cent., imposing a tax of seven and a half per cent. on all excess over $5,000 up to $15,000, and of ten per cent. on all excess over the latter amount. Several other amendments of less importance were adopted, when all the sections of the bill having been acted upon, it was read the third time and passed, there being only three votes against it to 23 in favor. The bill will now return to the House for action on the Senate's amendments.

In the House, there was much discussion on several subjects of no public interest. An attempt to censure the Government for delivering up Arguelles to the Spanish authorities ended in the matter being referred to the Judiciary Committee.

In the Senate, on the 7th, Mr. Sumner presented from the Foreign Affairs Committee a report on the subject of amending the neutrality laws and asking to be discharged from its further consideration, which was agreed to. He also reported favorably from the same committee on the bill relative to consular jurisdiction over the crews of foreign vessels in American ports. A number of petitions asking for the abolition of slavery were presented. The question of agreeing with the House in defining the 30th ult. as the time when the resolution for the temporary increase of the tariff took effect was brought up; but no vote on the matter was reached.

In the House, a bill authorising an additional loan of $400,000,000 for the support of the Government was presented from the Ways and Means Committee, and, after some discussion, was recommended to be reported complete. A resolution was adopted requesting the President to furnish the defence and papers of Gen. Curtis before the military commission in the inquiry relative to cotton speculations within the army lines. The bill to prevent speculation in gold was taken up, discussed for some time, and finally tabled, by 53 against 47. A motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the bill was tabled, and its reconsideration was postponed till Saturday next.

In the Senate, on the 8th, Mr. Davis urged the adoption of his resolution providing for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the administration of Gen. Butler, but finally refrained from pressing the subject, and it was passed over. A communication was received from the President, enclosing letters from the Secretary of the War and the Provost-Marshal-General, urging a repeal of the clause of the Enrollment act whereby drafted men are exempt from military service on the payment of $300, whereupon Mr. Wilson called up the bill, heretofore reported by the Military Committee, designed to meet the views of the authorities on this point.

In the House, there was no business of any public interest.

In the Senate, on the 9th, Mr. Davis offered a joint resolution to restore peace among the people of the United States. Objection being made to its reception, the Chair decided that it was not in order. The bill relative to commercial intercourse between the loyal and disloyal States was then taken up for consideration. The bill to prohibit the exemption of persons from military duty by reason of the payment of money was then taken up. An amendment was offered that all calls for drafts hereafter may be for a term not exceeding one year; that the act shall not, however, extend to any district or sub-district where the quota on previous calls has not been filled; that no person drafted on further calls shall be liable to be again drafted until the present enrollment shall be exhausted, and that when men are furnished by any district in excess of the quota on calls previously made, the term of service of each man shall be considered and allowed to said district in calls hereafter made. After a lengthy argument the first branch of the amendment was adopted by a vote of 23 against 17, the remaining sections of the amendment were adopted.

In the House, the only proceeding of interest was the rejection of the Bankrupt bill by 65 to 64. This most judicious measure is consequently lost for the present.

In the Senate, on the 10th, a joint resolution was offered to the effect that Arkansas had now in operation a State Government, organized upon a true basis and Republican in form, gained by a full and untrammelled vote of the people, declaring that such laws of Congress as stated the people of Arkansas in rebellion should be declared inoperative and void, and ordering that the present organized Government in Arkansas be recognised, on the condition that, except as punishment, Slavery or involuntary servitude, shall not exist in the State. A resolution was also offered for the protection of overland emigration. The bill for the settlement of California private land claims was brought up; the consideration of the bill ceased at the expiration of the morning hour. The Indian Appropriation bill was brought up and several amendments acted upon, after which a report from the Committee of Conference on the Army Appropriation bill was heard.

In the House, the Missouri contested election case was brought up, and after considerable discussion it was decided that Mr. Blair was not, and that Mr. Samuel Knox was, entitled to a seat.

In the Senate, on the 11th, there was much routine and local business transacted, but it was of no public interest, the most important item relating to the new State of Arkansas.

In the House, the Bankrupt bill was reconsidered, but finally postponed to the 2d of December; and after much debate Mr. Tod was declared the sitting member for Dacotah.

TOWN GOSSIP.

It is a hard thing to say of our own people, but we believe it to true, that within the last three years we are becoming so familiarised to death in awful and sudden forms, that our hearts are hardened, and we have become careless to murder, accident and slaughter.

This thought came to us while reading the report of the Berkshire disaster, the burning of which boat on the Hudson hurried half a hundred people into eternity. Several years ago the occurrence would have been town talk for a week, and one could scarcely have gone a block without hearing something about the terrible affair. To-day the matter is chronicled in the press with a few dozen lines, and the eager public turns away from its half perused recital to something more piquant on the next page, where the clash of arms is recorded, and 10,000 men are hurried into eternity or left maimed and deformed for life. Beside these gigantic tales of slaughter, into what utter insignificance does the burning, scalding and drowning of half a hundred wretched humans fade.

The week has been particularly rife, in this city, with a species of crime not especial to this locality, but worthy of notice as offering here the best illustrations. We have reference to attacks upon the police, shooting, clubbing and general knockdowns, and dragging out. The press daily chronicles such affairs, and the public can do nothing less than accept the story as given, and sympathise with the guardians of the law upon their dangers and hairbreadth escapes, without looking deeper into the matter.

The truth is that in four cases out of five where such things occur they are brought on by the arrogance and assumption of these guardians, and could easily be avoided if they would exercise a small grain of firmness or common sense. Policemen are but men, and have certain duties to perform, which differ but little from those of every citizen, especially large employers. The contractor or manufacturer having hundreds, perhaps thousands, of people, under his charge does not find it necessary to go armed with a revolver or to club his employés at every provocation. The same rule applies to the police, and any departure from it only argues that the man is unfit for his position unless he can show positively that the pistoled or clubbed party was a known dangerous character, or too much for him physically.

There is no room in this column to discuss a subject so vital to every citizen, but we can only say that we have had so many flagrant cases brought to our knowledge that we think it full time that revolvers were taken out of the list of police equipments, unless upon special cases of danger, and that every clubbing and beating affair in which a policeman is concerned should be made the subject of an especial inquiry before the Commissioners. Confidence should be instilled in the minds of the people that these men are to protect us, not to shoot, stab and club men on the smallest provocation, or none.

This week gold has touched 200. Amid the clash of battles this announcement has attracted little attention, and yet how fearfully it comes home to the hearths and pockets of all. With gold at 200, no matter whether it be caused by the imperative course of events or by the working of speculation, the whole current of life is changed. The mechanic should have his wages doubled from what it was three years ago, to meet the necessities of gold at 200. Is it so? If not, he is a sufferer, and in poverty, notwithstanding the story of great prosperity. If, when he received $2.00 per day, it would buy more than $4.00 will now, and who will dispute the fact? and now he is receiving only $3.00, he is twenty-five per cent. poorer than he was, and is obliged to stint himself and family to that amount, all because gold is at 200.

There is something deeper in all this than people ordinarily see. This gold is the lifeblood running through the national veins, a subtle fluid not to be tampered with, and indicative of the national health. It may be quickened for an hour by stimulants, but must go back to a steady pulse in time. Bankers, brokers and financiers are schooled to an instinctive knowledge of events and effects. They learn their lessons from a sensitive book—the pocketbook—and consequently their movements during the time of great excitement are well worthy of study. In fact, Wall street is at this moment the best spot on the globe to become posted on the chances for and against us in our great struggle, and to learn the unbiased truth, ungarbled by political newspaper columns, or unmanufactured to suit a market.

From such serious subjects we fly at a bound to the light topics, mechanically persuading ourselves that it is a duty to be jolly, and that if we can't be happy we must be as happy as we can.

Mrs. Wood has produced "Aladdin," and without doubt will continue to produce "Aladdin" for some weeks to come. Let not interested, would-be dramatic auditors fall into the delusion that they are going to the Olympic to see the "Aladdin" of their infantile recollections as delineated by Planché, nor yet the later effort, punsterial and funny, of Byron—not the poet—but understand that the "Aladdin" placed before them is another "Aladdin" of the spectacular nature, done by somebody else unknown to the outside barbarians, and intended to show off fine scenery, gorgeous costuming and stage mechanism of the jolliest sort. Of the last we have some odd instances in the piece, one in which the entire scene, people and all, sinks away, and another where such a perfect conglomeration of flats, sidepieces, furniture, stage and everything else takes place, that for a moment the spectator feels that he is liable to be whisked off with the other traps whether he will or no. "Aladdin" is very cleverly produced, and a little more such care to the general make-up of the American stage as is displayed in it would be a point most devoutly to be wished for.

Wallack's was conscious of an overboiling house during the week on the occasion of a benefit to Moss, the treasurer. It was only natural that everybody should want to testify their half-dollars to one who has worked himself into their suffrages as has the treasurer, but the crowds who came were hardly prepared for the other crowds who came also, and the result was an astonisher on all sides. We take back our prophecy of last week relative to the death of "Captain Bland," and by way of atonement for the premature announcement of his demise, give out that he will offer himself once more to an indulgent public through this week. Good-natured public!

"Bel Demonio" still at Niblo's, and breathless crowds still await the time when Vestvali shall break herself to pieces over the rock.

At the Winter Garden "Fra Diavolo" has everything his own way, and "Thice Married" has become about three score married, to the intense delight of the populace, who seem matrimonially inclined as the warm weather approaches.

Major Pauline Cushman has been a decided sensation at Barnum's, and consequently goes on in the same line for a while longer. She—or he—makes not a bad looking major. We have seen worse looking ones displaying their shoulder-straps upon Broadway, many a time. The lady's experience as an actress, before her debut in the military line, has done away with any little mauvaise honte she might have suffered under, had this been her first essay to the footlights.

Among the new attractions of the east side of the town is the building just erected by the Campbells as a minstrel hall, in the Bowery opposite Spring street. They open on the 20th, and will have the advantage of a fine building, constructed with every attention to sound, ventilation and view that modern theatre-building talent can give them.

At the New Bowery Mr. Lingard has taken bodily hold of one of Boucicault's dramatic attempts, or one that he claims, though its authors are supposed to be legion, and has fitted it for the Bowery stage in most excellent style. The piece will be remembered—"The Poor of New York"—as played at Wallack's old theatre, under Benicland's direction, in the olden time, and was a darkened recess. No doubt it will meet with the same favor under the hands of Mr. Lingard.

Heller struck out a new bill for the past week, promising something to astonish—if such a thing could be—even more than before. Heller's success in New York has been greater than that of any in his line that we see no reason why his music and magic cannot rank as an institution of the city. The summer months are coming, when the capricious public will desert the theatres, and seek some light and graceful entertainment such as he offers, and if the matter of the same can only himself forego the thoughts of Newport and Saratoga, showers of greenbacks will be bestowed. As the performance passes for the week was a magic closet, which he promised should outdo the Davenports, even in the line of producing a live—or dead, we forget which—genius.

Which point he mind?

That a few evenings since, attracted by a modest advertisement in the dailies that a meeting of young men would be held at Clinton Hall, and that Prof. Holcomb, of the 19th street Academy, would address them on the eye, we strolled in to find about 150 ladies, young, middle-aged and elderly, all of whom are presented to us to the fold as nurses, listening to the professor's simple yet learned instructions.

But this not being the subject on which we started to speak at commencing, the Lecture Room, we shall omit it, though first mentioning to those interested that on Tuesday and Friday of these self-sacrificing women will meet, without a fluorine of trumpets, and under the instruction of such able men as Professors Holcomb, Raphael, Richards, and others, study and fit themselves for their duties, and with the aid of the specialists at their own expense, to the field and general hospitals as needed for. And now for the hieroglyphs, or rather the key found in the rooms of the Geographical Society, and then giving a specimen to show the ease of access, and the loosed the circle. The ladies sat at either end, and they loyed and were loyed by. On the table, by the side of the globe, horns, bells, accordeons, flutes, and tambourines beside them, and on the floor, a dozen more. Five minutes passed, lights produced, and there were found tightly fastened to the bottom of each chair a sceptre that if they did it themselves they must be a little superior to the rest of humanity, and that the musicians were found by the operation, had been sold on other's hands, as their ears could hear, and that again the light is extinguished, and instantly all the instruments commenced playing, and the ladies and gentlemen ladies are found bound as before, the hands crossed on the breast, the ropes passed through the chairs at the feet and bodies tied to the chair, and altogether in a position most agonizingly tied that no one person would have liked to have secured them.

The signal was given by the baton, and with a piece of music across marks the instruments, and once more the light is let out. Inscrutably perplexed the ladies might be seen sailing about the room, and the declaration is made that one has a guitar, violin, guitare, etc.

We are selected to be the fingers of the young ladies, which we did with considerable compunction, feeling that gallantry is nowhere beside our search after information, and so the ladies' hands were unbound and unbound. While we then requested to seat ourselves in a chair would have to be taken from them, which was done in the Darkness again, and several hands—how many we cannot tell, but we judge not less than six—ran all over our body and face, taking liberties with our hair and making observations upon how flesh could be found together so on. Then we experienced a tambourine beating a violent tattoo on the top of our head, and a guitar sailed quietly into our lap; a light was called, and the tambourine rested upon our knee, the guitar in the lap, and the while we examined the finger-ring our knots were undisturbed.

The lights were extinguished again, relighted in a minute, and the ladies, who was sitting, bound as before on the table chair and all.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—During the past week the deaths in New York were 481 males, 393 women, 113 boys and 119 girls—a decrease of 8 from the mortality of the previous week, and an increase of 91 as compared with the mortality of the corresponding week of 1863. Of the deceased 6 were murdered, 1 was killed by a fall, 1 died by mortality in the principal diseases were as follows: Consumption, 84; inflammation of the lungs, 37; scarlet fever, 20; bronchitis and phthisis, 11; typhus fever, 10; cancer, 7; deaths from external causes, 44—among which 7 died from old age; 1 person and 1 woman received in baths; 5 drowned, and 11 killed by accidents. The births of the week were 76 deaths, and 96 were buried in Potter's Field.

—The House Military Committee, in pursuance of a resolution of the House, will make such commission an investigation to discover if any and what disloyal persons are employed in the Quartermaster's Department and in the cavalry corrals at Giesboro Point.

—The Legislature of West Virginia, Capt. Grace, from Liverpool and Queenstown, arrived on June 6th, bringing specie, and 471 passengers. Among the passengers for the greenest number ever brought over in one vessel, except by the great Eastern in July, 1863, which had 1,013.

—A committee from the Baltimore National Convention waited on President Lincoln and informed him of his nomination by that body. The President, in a very short speech, expressed his thanks and accepted the nomination. A committee of the National Union League subsequently waited on His Excellency to congratulate him on his renomination.

—The slaves in the counties of Davies, Henderson and Union, in Kentucky, are deserting the plantations by scores, and making their way to the Union lines. The Cumberland Gazette says: "The blacks are entirely demoralized, and cannot be controlled by their masters."

—A land warrant has been decided in St. Louis, by which John Maguire has recovered, after a quarter of a century of litigation, lands in Missouri part of the city worth $500,000, together with the rents and profits which are likely to amount upon the bounds, and will be very heavy.

Southern.—The Richmond Examiner of Tuesday, June 7, has been received at the Navy Department. It contains some interesting items. It says: "Last night the enemy abandoned our left and part of our centre, apparently in great haste. Early followed them in full force, capturing 60 prisoners, who say that Grant has gone to the White House, because his men will not fight. The impression here is that Grant is making his way to the James river, to come over to the south side."

—A bill had passed the rebel Congress to increase the pay of privates, officers and privates $5 per month, for one year. They have also passed a bill to exempt Quakers from fighting.

—The Treasury, in a financial article, says: "For the first time the Confederate Treasury has no money. It is in a state of prostration. All the salaries are unpaid except Mr. Memminger's, the Secretary."

Personal.—Gen. Pemil having been mustered out of the volunteer service, for refusing to accept a command under Maj.-Gen. Canby, has now resigned his colonelcy in the regular army.

—Gen. Butler has sent the following characteristic letter to Senator Davis of Kentucky, in response to the resolution of inquiry offered by the latter in the U. S. Senate, a few days since:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD, June 3, 1864.

GARRETT DAVIS, Esq., Member of the Senate of the United States from Kentucky.

SIR—I have read your resolution of inquiry. You can be no more ignorant than to have every act of my political life, which began on the first Tuesday of November, 1839, and ended on the 19th day of April, 1861, most thoroughly scrutinized.

I will therefore also be brief. Every act of my official life, which began as Brigadier-General of the Massachusetts Militia, April 16, 1861, and ends when this war does, if not sooner, subjected to the like examination. I have no desire to shun the fullest light, except that the inquisition may not be square, that is, one-sided.

Resp. F. BUTLER.

Accidents and Offences.—Another sad catastrophe occurred on the Hudson river on Wednesday evening, June 8th, by the overturning of a sloop in the river, on her passage to New York, and when a few miles below Stockport, by which the lives of four persons were lost in the water's edge. She was run ashore at the foot of the mountain, and all the passengers saved. Between 30 and 40, however, were lost. The freight and live stock were also lost.

—Michael Jameson, a lad 14 years of age, and Wm. Wood, aged 12 years, were arrested June 9 by the Sixth Precinct Police, charged with the crime of incendiarism; has been in the habit, almost daily for many weeks past, of setting fire to buildings and clothing. Lodington & Co., of large quantities of gloves, honey, etc., and on the 9th inst. the premises of Mr. Cole, tinsmith, were discovered to be on fire, and the boys were arrested and committed to the Tombs as a result of the investigation. The boys are confined in the Tombs.

—A young man named Rob, formerly clerk to Booby & Co., banking and brokerage house, in the city, got possession of nearly $7,000 of their money, and spent a great part of it in the gambling saloons of Broadway, and indulging in other expensive luxuries. The age of the defaulter is 19.

—The hat store of Zegalls, in Chatham street, was forcibly entered on Wednesday night, and a large quantity of hats stolen. The principal burglar was a boy of 14 years.

—A youth named George Smith was arrested on the charge of incendiarism, and committed to the Tombs. Large quantities of goods from Fowler & Co.'s store, in Canal street, were found.

—The splendid railroad bridge over the Wabash river at Attica, Ind., was partially destroyed by fire on the 7th inst. The loss of property is nearly $50,000. Three, save one section, was burned. The burned portion, including the trestle work, is about 200 ft. A mile long, and to replace it will cost from $90,000 to $100,000.

—On the 8th inst. eight substitutes for drafted men in Chicago placed a bill of $1,000 each, Wm. Ky, for sale keeping, drugged the guards, and after robbing them of their money, left the substitutes to their fate, however, and didn't retreat until their King had fled.

—The Paris French Senate lately, the Marquis de Boissy asserted that the Prince of Wales was drunk—"as his custom is," when he called on Garibaldi. He also insinuated that Queen Victoria is given to drink. The President of the Senate would not allow the outrageous remarks to appear in the printed proceedings.

—The Paris Figaro says that an unusually large number of wounds received in the late battles in Georgia are in the hands and arms. This is accounted for by the fact that the troops were employed in skirmishing in a great measure, and received their principal wounds in the recumbent posture, and while raising their arms in front of the face. The proportion of such slight wounds is large throughout.

—The Paris Constitutionnel have raised their price to 80 per year and 20 cents per week. The increased cost of paper is the reason given for the increased expenditure.

—English papers are telling a story about the Shakespeare Oak planting at Primrose Hill, London. The Comte de Paris delighted the Britishers by planting the oak himself. He was much pained about during the ceremony. "It is eminently practical country, because, this, exclaimed a cockney Hill! Why, I thought he was Prince!"

—Additional particulars of the recent voyage of the Italian ship Re Galantuomo across the Atlantic show that the passage was a terrible one. The ship sprung a leak, and the fires in the furnace were extinguished, but not before the steam from the water was the cause of steam power and entirely at the mercy of the winds. Everything that could be spared was thrown overboard, and the skeleton of the storm the vessel was saved.

CHIT-CHAT WITH THE LADIES.

WHY do these terrible railroad accidents occur? We suppose every one must ask that question seven times a week; for it is impossible to open a daily paper without finding a record of greater or lesser importance.

People have grown so accustomed to the fact that, if it is not very terrible, they skim over the paragraph as they do the market prices, and forget it much sooner. But now and then such circumstances are forced upon the attention, and as the thought this might have been myself or some dear friend in the train, even the most indifferent begin to wonder whether something could not be done, whether skill and caution might not almost always avert the catastrophe. The late explosion near Syracuse is calculated to make one feel nervous beyond comfort when railroad locomotion is over. Only four miles from its destination, with no sensible reason to be given for any catastrophe, a boiler inside the first passenger engine in front exploded. The engineer and fireman in shapeless masses under the wreck, and the passengers more or less injured, some fatally. A young couple married that morning, both in all probability maimed for life, and the air filled with groans and shrieks from the lips hanging at that instant before.

Who is to blame? Don't throw the blame on ill-used Mr. Nobody.

We appeal to those who understand the mysteries of the intricate machinery, to tell whether there is not some way by which the safety of an engine may be tested, and some method of examination which can be made before each trip, when lives and limbs of hundreds of human beings are in the balance.

If the same skill and care were bestowed our master instead of our servant, it would be wise to discard him, and go back to the slower and safer travelling habits of our forefathers.

Mothers' Boys.

Mothers have cause to watch their boys in these days sharply. Imagine a youth, who, when, though a girl may be a young lady, her brother is certainly only a boy, associates with disreputable parents, and living with them, who could in the most artful manner rob his employers of $1,000 and a certificate of stock for $1,000, and get it in the banks, furnish a club-house, purchase a champagne supper, set up housekeeping with a mistress of his own, and all this at the age when he should astonish many an older sinner! Almost incredible. Yet such an individual was arrested last week, according to the papers.

Taxing Dressmakers as Manufactures.

High time indeed that there should be a protective duties for making dressmakers as manufacturers. If ever there was an article which makes one woman's blood boil, it is that others should be so shamefully used by the lords of creation. Dressmakers, manufacturers Absurd in the first instance, though according to Lindley Murray or Webster, any one who makes anything by hand might be styled a manufacturer. According to the absolute existing state of things, we believe one who never makes up goods of her own, but always those of other people, cannot be a manufacturer. How the law supports such a tax we do not understand.

But if the law does support it, it still remains one of the most meanly barbarous acts on record. A dressmaker, as a general thing, is a woman who finds it necessary to support herself or starve. Sometimes she begins early in life, sometimes late. In the first instance, she generally learns her trade of an established dressmaker who makes her the drudge of the establishment, and allows her to learn as much or as little as she chooses; and after toiling for nothing for a year or two, breaks loose from the bondage, puts out a tin sign,

"Fashionable dressmaking done here," and waits for customers. One and another drop in; she toils from morning until night, hears nothing else from round-shouldered Miss A——, because, her dresses "don't fit in the back" from Miss B——'s, is requested to take a dress to pieces, to make the most absurd alterations; sometimes is asked to wait until Sept. and Sunday bonnet are both deferred indefinitely; and for the wear and tear of temper, strength and eyesight, she gets at the end a pleasant bead and a dollar-bill on the Sabbath, or some occasional evening, pressed from work at the rate of reading by an hour's light.

Such a girl it is, O Man! on whom your tax falls; your shameful, unjust tax, with a weight like lead, robbing her of the time needed for improvement and stifling her to despair. Or your victim is a widow with a dozen children at her knee, and your tax takes the bread from their mouths and the fire from their heartstones.

Look, men, here who spend your money so freely, and look forward to such a long life of carousal, there once were men triumphant in strength and wealth as you are, who lie drinking at the wine vaults of dressmakers. Dressmakers, taxed down to beggary.

Come, of course by industry, or frugality, economy, or good luck," the dressmaker has, in the course of years, attained a sort of independence; has comfortable rooms and even some furnishings, and is at last ready to a competence for her old age. And there broyes, carried by the strength of her youth, and met with your inhuman tax, and bring about anxiety and misery, which may be better imagined than described. Tax dressmakers, indeed! Tax the widow and orphan!

Avarice and yellow Mammon, were at your elbows when you heard that genteel entrance into your minds, good measure.

Shoddy.

The reign of shoddy has done some good to foreign dealers in shawls at least. Another one has ground, mother's beads even here, but shoddy felt obliged to pay new duties, and to a greater range and, therefore, price of its old life not according with its present grandeur. Accordingly, foreign journals tell us that over $1,000, 000 worth of shawls were imported into the United States last year, and that demands still increase. No wonder Shoddy and his wife drive down to Central Park or the gaslight of its own palatial residence, no wonder that the jeweller's hands are full, and those persons grow rich while the widow's feet blister in his paper-soled shoes, and his bare elbows emerge from his worn jacket-sleeves. It is a pity Shoddy can't take those gems into his grave with him, for he will take few prayers and many execrations.

Person's Coiffure.

If Nature had intended girls to have horns as well as nose and sheep, it is our belief she would have bestowed them. But in spite of the hairdresser's not black us, for the latest wrinkle is neither more nor less than an exact imitation of a ram's horn, curving over forehead and temples, and the eye, in a way that would make an uninitiated stranger flee in terror, with visions of Old Nick before him.

We, who know that the effect is produced by "rolls" and "crapes," are not so easily alarmed, but even we have wondered how such ideas must decidedly have been insane. We always expect the wearer of this adornment to low her head and to butt people her; and when there are some who cannot look ugly in anything, others, especially middle-aged ladies, are positively ridiculous, and all only all pretensions to good looks but all elegance and dignity. Hair rolled back is becoming to most faces, but hair rolled up over a horn was never intended to adorn the human face divine.

Late in Life.

Some people continue to sow their wild oats until they have little time to reap the harvest. Last week we saw that the Circuit Court of Albany gave a verdict of $1,000 in damages to a young lady of eighteen, who accused a venerable gentleman, named Thomas Reed, of breach of promise of marriage. The latter is eighty-four years of age, and rather older than the grandfather of the broken-hearted maiden; probably the cruel decision of the court will compensate for his mature heart, though it may not for his property.

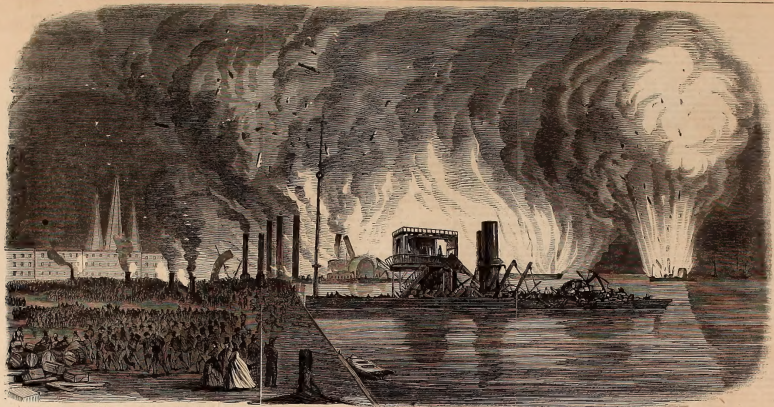
False Hair.

A great deal of false hair is worn now-a-days. Every one must admit that, though no one of our readers ever wears any of course, and the funniest things happen. Apropos of false hair, we call to mind a story of the scandle. "It is no uncommon thing," a friend writes from a battlefield in the West, "to see a 'wig-fall' on the sand, and to miss a bolle from table at dinner the same day, while a messenger is dispatched post haste to the city for some more ammunition. The other day, A——, who has been endeavoring to replenish himself with the rather valuable article, Miss B——, saw her pursuing some dark object along a garden path, and hastening to the rescue, picked up a round ball, and, with a cry, sent all fierce principles which adorn Miss B——'s classic brow, A—— blushed scarlet as Miss B—— screamed in her superioence, and the two have not even spoken to each other yet.

For the matter of false hair we hold a peculiar opinion; the folly is not in wearing it, but in being ashamed of it. Let a lady wear a bush at the crown of her head or a cap because her hair was thin. And if she desires to look well, or to be in the fashion, let her dresses are fashionable. Don't apply to the hairdresser by all means, and say boldly, if questioned, "Yes; my curls are false, but my hair is my own." Only ladies could produce hair enough to dress unassisted in the height of the present fashion. And every woman has a right to every diminishing man also. And when you declare that any one's Ambrosia has produced twelve yards of curls in half a dozen weeks, no one will believe you. Own up therefore, and say outright, "I buy my hair of——," or you do "I buy my pinafore of Nessel."

Spelling.

The schoolmaster is abroad and has not yet signified his intention of returning to those benighted heathens on the "other side of the Bowery." Judging investigations in that neighborhood bring queer things in the way of spelling and grammar to light.



One business street, where the countenances of the merchants are of a decidedly Hebrew cast, is full of the most astounding placards. Behold a few of them:

"Floorin did here in the most exemble manner. Sowing on the smallest reasinable."

"Don't ask no more rest."

"Prunes, Finapples and frootz of all sorteses."

"J. Smith, babinet maker, etc., etc."

A WOMAN'S RESOLVE.

BY ADA VROOMAN.

LAST night my darling said to me,
With flushing cheek and downcast eye,
"You men are always gay, while we Can only sit and sigh.

"We laugh and jest, and lure you on
To say 'I love,' with many a wile,
But oh! beneath the jesting tone,
The glances and the smile,

"Our hearts are sad—a vague unrest
Fills all the pauses of our life—
Not always can a faithful breast,
And sacred name of wife,

"Bring peace and joy; a greater good
Shines out afar on dizzy heights;
A bitter longing stirs our blood,
Through all the days and nights.

"As one within a prison chained,
Who sees his comrades fight and fall,
And weeps to see his share unclaimed
Of that which is for all—

"The right to do, the right to be,
A nobler thing than toy or slave,
A something great and good and free,
Whose rest is not the grave.

"E'en so we yearn—ah! me, you smile,
And I have shown my heart in vain;
But then, I've learnt this truth the while—
You care not for our pain.

"'Tis wiser far by stern control—
By bitter, rigid discipline,
To tutor woman's loving soul
To hopes and thoughts divine.

"'Tis better, nobler, to forego
A bride's delight, that sweet, vague dream,
Than waken up to married woe,
Which has no Lethean stream."

I stretched to her my loving arms—
I gave a pleading look and sighed,
"Come to your home!" She sank therein,
My own, my plighted bride!

BRUISED virtue may flourish best, but it is no reason why we should bruise it.

The Serpent-Woman.

CHAPTER X.

I will deal in poison with thee, or in bastinado, or in steel; I will banky with thee in faction; I will o'er-run thee with policy; I will kill thee a hundred and fifty ways: therefore, tremble and depart.
As You Like It, Act V, Scene 1.

A KEEN contest had commenced between Victor Kingsland and Gregory Grimgrip. The young man "bled" the old one copiously; the latter winced not a little under the process, but submitted to it for the nonce.

Fire and Water.

Victor spent the money thus extorted as freely as if its source had been inexhaustible, like a never-failing water spring. He fell into the ways of the New York profligates with the facility of instinct, and became a general favorite with them; for while he had money he was always willing to "treat the crowd," and when he was without a cent never dreamed of asking them for one. Gamblers, pugilists and the "fancy" delighted in him, for he could fight and play, and gain and lose with perfect sangfroid and goodnature. He revelled with the fastest women, bet on the fastest horses, and seemed to consider the acme of life to be a career of unremitted dissipation.

Old Grimgrip at first had hopes that he would drink himself to death, but when he found that he swallowed with impunity that liquid fire called "Jersey lightning," as if he were a salamander, and preferred this flaming drink as an ordinary beverage to tea and coffee, he relinquished all confidence in this slayer of thousands, and cast about him for quicker means to rid himself of this insatiable young vampire that was feeding upon his life.

"If I must be ruined," said Grimgrip to himself, "I will not allow another to revel in the pleasure of destroying me, but, like a spendthrift, enjoy the wasting of my own substance."

Knowing a powerful and desperate fellow named John McKill, who had already committed more than one homicide with impunity, Grimgrip summoned the murderous bully to rid him of the incubus that broke his rest and emptied his money bags. As he gave the ruffian a handsome earnest, and promised him a munificent reward when the work was done, the proposed assassination was undertaken without hesitation or reluctance, and with a cold-blooded and deliberate determination which augured fatally for the intended victim, McKill dogged his man for several days, and "earthed" him at last in a cellar kept by the bloodhound's brother-in-law, the resort of characters of the lowest, worst and most dangerous description.

Victor was drawn into the place by the sounds of a violin and harp, and the shuffling and stamping of dancers' feet. The apartment was filled with rough men and coarse women, dressed in tawdry finery, and the young man, much amused, looked about him for some minutes ere he perceived a person present that inspired him with any feeling save disgust. At last he discovered a girl who had retired into the corner of the room and seemed to shrink from participating in the vulgar orgies of her companions. A burly, brutal-looking fellow was attempting to drag her to the middle of the floor.

"Come, Moll," said he, "you're mad because you're the last rum-blowen that's left, and I'm bound to have a polker if I have to dance with the devil under the gallows."

"Let me go, sir; I have been dancing all day and night, and am tired to death."

"The poor girl looks tired," said Victor, compassionately; "leave her alone and let her rest herself."

The fellow turned fiercely upon the speaker and exclaimed, with an oath:

"Button your bonebox, Jack Dandy, and mind your own game, if you don't want to put your bowsprit in parenthesis."

"Every man's game," answered Victor, "is to see that no woman is forced to do anything against her right and inclination. If I were the girl I would not dance with such a slubber-degallion as you are at any price."

The ruffian cursed Victor's impudence, and swore that he would not be cheated out of his partner by a "Joskin."

Victor, who had been drinking and was ripe for mischief, told the fellow to take his hands of the girl if he did not want to be sent to a place somewhat warmer than a "ballum-rancum," for a partner.

There was a sharp decision, like the cocking of a pistol, in Victor's tone, that cravened the bully, and made him release the "slamkin," as he called the wearied dancer, with an oath to the effect that she was not worth fighting for. He went to the bar, where he remained for sometime talking and drinking with McKill. The girl thanked Victor for his interference in her behalf, and assured him, apologetically, that had she not been so exhausted as to be hardly able to stand, she would not have refused to dance.

"You have a perfect right to refuse when you please," replied Victor, "and I am only sorry there are brutes so unfeeling as to deny you the privilege. I am afraid you have a pretty hard life among them."

"Life!" exclaimed the girl. "Do you call this life I lead? My companions seem to think it life, but it is so many times worse than death I do not know what to call it."

"Why do you not quit it, then?"

"Because I know no way to get out of it, unless I kill myself, and that I am afraid to do."

Victor, who was familiar with this kind of talk from women of her class, and attached no importance to it, was about to reply to the desponding girl when Jack McKill approached her, and commanded, rather than asked, her to dance with him. The poor creature trembled as the ruffian addressed her, for she knew him too well as the brother of her female tyrant, and a match for her in cruelty and desperation. Before she could reply Victor said:

"This lady is too tired to dance at present, but is engaged to dance with me as soon as she has rested herself."

"This lady," said McKill, mimicking Victor, who employed an Americanism he knew to be so generally in use, "this lady has a standing engagement to dance with me whenever I please."

"And I," replied Victor, with a sneer, "have a standing engagement to beat any dog that thrusts his nose in my way."

The blurting of a volley of violent and indecent epithets at Victor followed this provocation, but in the midst of his scurrility the utterer received the contents of the other's glass in his eyes. He wiped his face deliberately, and then rushed upon Victor, who was ready for him, and with a blow, skilfully planted, knocked him flat upon the floor. All was confusion and uproar in a moment. Everybody present began to halloo or talk at once, and consequently nobody was heard. McKill gained his feet, and, mortified at his unexpected defeat, made another dash at his enemy, dodged his blow, and closed with him. Victor was a masterly wrestler, and could have easily thrown his man, but catching the gleam of a knife in the coward's hand, grappled for the possession of the weapon, and both fell together. McKill's brother-in-law and others attempted to interfere, and a desperate struggle ensued. When Victor rose from the floor and stood on his feet he had only received a slight cut in the hand, but McKill remained prostrate, unable to lift himself, bleeding copiously, stabbed to the heart and in the last agonies of death.

At this conjuncture the police, attracted by the clamor, descended into the cellar, and Victor was arrested on the spot. Mary Lee, as the girl was called whom he had so fatally defended, saw him taken off to the Tombs with heartfelt sorrow. He had shown her the first kindness she had received for many a day, and the last she ever experienced in this world. She took refuge in a little back room, where she remained awhile weeping, but this melancholy indulgence was soon denied her. McKill's sister found her there, and flew at her like an exasperated tigress. Heedless of her pitiful entreaties, she dragged her round the room by the hair, beat her till her face was covered with blood, threw her upon the floor and stamped upon her, and lastly, late and bitterly cold as it was, thrust her, half naked, into the street, and locked her out.

The homeless wretch sought an asylum in several places, but without avail. Few places were open at that hour of the night, and from those that were she was ruthlessly driven by their proprietors, who supposed her to be a drunken, dangerous person. Turning desperate at last, she went down to the river, hurried as fast as her trembling limbs would carry her to the end of a long pier, looked up to the countless stars, all twinkling, cold and bright, and uttering something between a prayer and a bitter murmur of complaint, the very dregs of despair, with eyes shut, for she durst not look at the dark water, she threw herself into the deep tide and quickly sank out of sight, and out of the reach of earthly suffering for ever.

Victor's awakening in the Tombs on the morning after the death of McKill was full of remorse. The acquaintance he had made in New York fortunately included a lawyer of talent and experience, and for him he sent at once. His friend responded to his summons without delay, and as soon as he had heard his statement informed him, frankly, of the danger in which he stood, and the slender chances of his escape, professing at the same time to be willing to undertake his cause and to do the best for him he could under the circumstances.

"What, do you think they will hang me?" demanded Victor.

"There is little danger of that; but it will be hard to save you from imprisonment in Sing Sing."

"I would rather die than live the life of a felon. The fellow first insulted and assaulted me, and then fell upon his own knife. Shall I suffer eternal disgrace on account of the accidental death of such a villain?"

"I hope not. But that depends not so much upon what actually took place as upon what we can prove."

About an hour after his lawyer was gone Victor was surprised by a visit from Gregory Grimgrip, who had thus commented upon the account of the homicide, in which he was so much concerned, after he had read it at his breakfast table, in the morning paper:

"The devil takes care of his own; the fellow has more lives than a cat. Neither poison nor steel will work upon him. Since the blunderer failed, I am glad he made sure work of McKill, for now we shall have no blabbing. If they would only hang my pest, now, I should be cheaply rid of both; but the jury will disagree or bring in a verdict against him of murder in the second or third degree, and the court award him the briefest legal term in the State Prison. Even that will be great revenge; but it would not prevent him from raising a hue and cry that will set the Elfstones and Hapswells on my track. I must double in the course and throw them out, but first will I see if I cannot gag this good-for-nothing."

Victor was inditing a letter as Grimgrip entered, and merely nodded to him without ceasing to write.

"So you are bound for Sing Sing, my young friend?"

"Verily, friend Gregory."

"Well, sir, you seem to feel little regret."

"I beg you pardon, Gregory, I feel much regret for your sake."

"What?"

"That you do not bear me company. It is unnatural to part us; for the fool and the knave have an inherent attraction for one another."

"It is impossible for me to see how they can be separated in you at all, Mr. Kingsland."

"'Tis hard; but you see your face makes knavery look so perfectly hideous as to frighten the very ghost of it out of me."

Gregory's green eyes flashed, but he refrained from replying, thinking to himself:

"The villain has his mother's wit, and hers was as keen as a surgeon's knife."

Victor continued to write, and the old fellow, after a thoughtful pause, observed quietly:

"Though I am not sorry for you at all, I am for your family. The letter you are writing contains, I suppose, large demands upon their sympathy and cash."

"No, Gregory; you are my banker at present, and in the day of adversity I scorn to desert you."

"You will never get another cent from me, unless you show me what you have written."

"You speak as if I could possibly have any objection to gratify your very natural curiosity. Read, friend Gregory, for the matter does indeed concern you nearly."

Grimgrip proceeded to read the letter handed to him, which he found to be a rather lengthy epistle, addressed to Bertram Hapswell, containing a brief account of the dealings of its writer with its reader, since his first visit to the latter's residence, and full particulars of the former's fatal encounter with McKill. Grimgrip tore the letter up in a rage and exclaimed:

"Sir, you have cheated me!"

"How so, Gregory?"

"You have already written to your brother, divulging the secret I paid you to keep."

"I never promised I would not tell it to my brother."

"What, then, did you take my money for?"

"For smashes, toddies, and other like compounds wherewith to drink your health. I beg of you, Gregory, not to torment yourself with the idea that your money has been thrown away, for I have enjoyed it vastly."

"You promised me again and again that you would never—"

"Breathe a syllable touching your secret to human creature, and I haven't, but have written a few, contained in a short letter to Bertram, describing my first visit to your hospitable domicile, and in the epistle you have just destroyed—that is all, on my word and sacred honor."

"You have dealt unfairly with me."

"On the contrary; I have phlebotomised you, because you were dying of the plethora of wealth. You were turning too sour, Greg, and I squeezed you as I would a lemon, and made whiskey skins out of you. You are not a very festive person yourself, Greg, but have supplied the means that have made many a poor fellow glorious."

"You are facetious."

"I am desperate, and desperation always makes me merry."

"You are a plucky fellow, and ought to be sent to California instead of Sing Sing."

"California? You have me there. I have the gold fever in its most exasperated form."

"You may find some of the precious metal in the granite you will have to cut in the State Prison."

"I shall find pity sooner in your harder heart. Did you come here to taunt me? Ye gods! must I be mured up in a cell while such glorious fun is going on outside?"

"Unless you find pity in my hard heart."

"Is't possible? I tell you, Greg, if you'll get me out of this scrape, and pay my voyage to California, I'll bind myself by bonds ten times stronger than a Freemason's, never to meddle with or speak of your concerns again,

> "And all those swearings keep as true in soul,
> As doth that orbed continent the fire
> That severs day from night."

"You must do more than this; you must undo what you have done; unsay what you have said—I mean written—to your brother."

"I'll not eat my own words to please you."

"To please yourself, you mean. I alone can save you. But if you prefer Sing Sing to California, I pity your taste, that's all."

"But how can you serve me better than my lawyer?"

"A lawyer can't save you. McKill's brother-in-law and three of the witnesses in your case are in my power, and will testify to anything I dictate."

"Let them swear to the truth—all I ask."

"The last thing they would think of doing unless compelled."

"I will think over your proposal."

"When I quit this cell, I quit it for ever."

"You are not out of my power yet."

"I am ready to defy you and yours to do your worst, and to give you all the slip. I wish to avoid the sacrifice of forced sales, but am prepared to make them. It is you who are in my power, for I alone can save you from a felon's doom."

"I'll send you your answer to-morrow."

"There is not an instant to be lost; the coroner's inquest will be commenced in an hour, and it would be childish to palter with you a moment longer."

Grimgrip looked Victor steadily in the face, with a determined and savage expression, and then said, sharply:

"You decline my proposal, eh? Then shall I have my revenge and escape you, too. I wish you a long and pleasant sojourn in Sing Sing."

Grimgrip was going, but Victor, seeing that he was in earnest, recalled him, and succumbed to his terms.

> Oh, you panderly rascals! there's a knot, a ging, a pack, a conspiracy against me. Now shall the devil be shamed.—Merry Wives of Windsor, Act IV., Sc. 2.

On Bertram's arrival in London he found letters of importance for him which had long required answers, among them several from his brother Victor, all of them soliciting remittances except the last, far the most important, which contained an account of his visit to Grimgrip's residence. Singular as the conduct of the old miser appeared, and strange as was the apparition Victor had beheld in his house, they formed too slight a foundation upon which to build confiding hope, and Bertram found Elfstone in a state of mind so agitated and dubious that he deemed it best to withhold from him the startling intelligence he had received, till his brother's impressions were confirmed by more reliable evidence. He waited long for further communications on the subject. He would have felt more annoyed and impatient at the delay had he not been used to his brother's habits of negligence, which, so long as money enabled him to pursue his career of pleasure, were indulged with utter recklessness. But there was a limit even to Bertram's patience, and he determined at last to follow his brother to America and ascertain the truth himself. He framed an excuse for leaving Ellingford, but Elfstone would not admit it.

"Leave me now," he said, "and I am lost. I cannot longer lead a life of idle suspense, and shall soon receive my 'Lost Love' from France. It will throw me into a great excitement I know, and if you are not by to sustain me, will, I fear, upset the balance of my mind."

As Bertram believed in the old sculptor's apprehension, he could think of nothing better than to write to Julien St. Croix a full confession of his secret, and to solicit him to take his place while he made his meditated voyage to New York, and cleared up the mystery connected with his brother's letter. St. Croix answered Bertram's proposal promptly, and met his views with ready compliance. When the two young men came together they found a world of conjectural wisdom to waste upon Victor's letter and certain mysterious hints dropped by Madame Nitouche. But Bertram's determination to visit America was not altered by the consultation, and received in the end the emphatic approval of St. Croix.

Bertram consequently started at once for Liverpool, to take his passage in the steamer first bound for the United States. On arriving at Liverpool he put up at the Waterloo, and was about to leave the hotel to engage his berth in the steamer, when he received a telegraphic despatch to the effect that a letter addressed to him, bearing an American postmark, had reached Ellingford, and had already been mailed to him. Bertram received this letter on the ensuing day, which, as he anticipated, was from his brother Victor, but brief and unsatisfactory, dissipating in a few seconds all the hopes the former had entertained of obtaining from America a solution of the mystery he had pledged his word to Elfstone to solve, if it were possible to human research. Victor informed him that he was on the eve of starting for California, with the determination to make money enough to repossess himself of the paternal estate he had forfeited by his extravagance, and to discharge all his other pecuniary obligations. In a postscript he expressed regret that he had possibly raised false hopes as to the discovery of Elfstone's lost daughter, for, upon a closer inspection of the person he had mistaken for her, he was, he said, compelled to confess that every trace of resemblance entirely disappeared.

This communication gave Bertram deep disappointment, which he tried to work off by wandering over the dismal town of Liverpool, with which he soon became disgusted, as indeed he was fast growing with everything. While returning through Lord street he passed a man he thought the ugliest he had ever beheld, and heard a sailor exclaim to his fellow:

"Ben, did you ever see a worse figurehead than that? I would rather sail with Jonah than in a ship with such a mug on board. It would bring foul weather from any quarter it was turned to. I don't believe a shark would swallow such a devil's knot as his face is tied into."

"Why, he came over with us. His name is Grimgrip. He is such a fright that he scared away all the headwinds, and we made about the shortest passage on record. Barber, the second mate, used to swear that old Grimgrip's face would turn a cannon ball or a flash of lightning, yet, would you believe it? he has the prettiest daughter that ever a father was proud on. He calls her Muta, because she speaks so little; but she'd talk fast enough if he'd let her, for the old fellow is as jealous of her as a Turk."

Bertram heard no more, for he had already turned about and was in pursuit of the subject of the sailors' remarks. He failed to overtake him, however, and for days after rambled over Liverpool in the hope of again meeting him. His sudden return to England, the name of Muta mentioned in connection with his, Victor's unaccountable pecuniary independence and dubious retraction, awakened Bertram's suspicions, and rendered him more determined than ever to sift the mystery thoroughly till not a grain of uncertainty remained.

One evening he had lost his way in an obscure part of the town, and was retracing his steps in a blind alley, through which he had attempted to pass, when he came face to face with the object of his search, and saw him enter an old, dingy, dilapidated and forsaken house hard by, a residence most appropriate for so hideous and misanthropical a being as Grimgrip.

Bertram watched the house into which Grimgrip had disappeared for hours. To avoid observation, he retired into the porch of an apparently uninhabited building opposite, and kept his eyes fixed upon the windows at which he hoped to behold the victim of the ogre he had hunted to his dismal den. At last a light gleamed through the dingy panes of the second storey windows, and a face appeared close to one of the sashes. It was not Grimgrip's, though almost as ugly, being old, thin, white and ghastly. This, thought Bertram, is the deaf and dumb housekeeper whom Victor described. The old woman looked up and down the alley, and seeing nothing stirring, retired, and presently the front of the house was black again.

"Now," said the watcher to himself, "if the girl would but try the same experiment, my time and vigilance would not be thrown away."

For this advantage he waited in vain. Presently two rough-looking men came up the alley, and excited his curiosity by pausing opposite Grimgrip's house, and gazing at it, apparently with an interest equal to his own.

*"Tout that casa!" said one in a loud tone, "Scavey where the frumper hangs out."

"A proper ken for such a foxy fogram!" replied his companion. "He's doused the glim, and is off to the land of Nod."

"The first jigger at the top of the dunan is where he lips, and stubbles his swag like a spung. He's a cocum cull and fly, but you see he's got the heavers and we've a hank on him, and 'll bite his ken and suck his honey—for he's as full as a jug—while he's being autumned to his lunan by Sniveling Jimmy.

"Why, does the bloke want to leap the book?"

"No, you see, the antum-bawler decked as

---

*"Look at the house, and note where the sturdy old fellow lives."

"A proper residence for such a sly old rogue. He has extinguished his light, and gone to bed."

"The first door at the top of the stairs opens into the room where he sleeps, and guards his treasures with the jealousy of a miser. He's very sly and knowing, but he's in love, and we have ensnared him, and will rob his house and steal his money (for he is as rich as a bank), while he is being married to his girl by Sniveling Jimmy."

"What, does he want to deceive her with a false marriage?"

"No, but the regular clergyman, perceiving that the old rascal was fifty years older that the girl, refused to marry them without a licence. My mistress was to have been the bridesmaid, and she laid a scheme with Jim. The old fool accordingly went to the church-pickpocket. Jim, you know, is a hypocrite and a ranter, and has been converted, and is to marry them in the night."

"Is the girl so pretty who is to be married to the ugly old moneygrubber?"

"A perfect beauty, but a mere child and idiot. She was coaxing and crying half the day for a trousseau, silk gown, red ribbons, gold ring, white gloves, lace and shoes. She will flaunt in her finery, and if she don't make a perfect picture I wish I may be hanged!"

"What a hideous face the old devil has! Did you notice his huge mouth, his horrible teeth and nose? Ha, ha, ha! Is it not a pity that so disgusting a wretch should marry so handsome a young woman?"

"Oh, that's all made right. Intriguing Ned is his rival, who seduces a fresh girl every month, and will soon have this pretty one for his mistress!"

how the old scrub had half a century more stretchers than the bloss, and wouldn't noose 'em without a tickrum. My jamer was to ha' been bridesmaid, and she put Jim up to the lay. So the old goosecap padded the hoof to the kirkbruzer. Jim, you know, is a groomer and swadler, and has been jampanned, and he's be switch 'em in the darkman's."

"Is the blowen so bleak that's to be yoked to the moose face?"

"Dimber as a white cow, but a chin and cranky. She was mandling half the lightman's and coaxing so bienly for a cart of bang-up togs—squeeze cable, claret dashs, jams, milky fumbles, peak and crabshells. She'll flash her wallflowers, and if she don't make a Jew's eye I wish I may dance at my death!"

"What a bracket may the old Poger has! Did you twig his oven, tombstones and boko? His, ha, ha! It's a pity that such a scrubado should couple with such a bleak mort."

"Oh, it's all plumby. Ranging Ned is his rum prigstar, who breaks a leg once a month, and will soon be pulling in with the ladyfinger."

Bertram now thanked his stars, that he had been taught slang by his brother. Much of this dialogue would otherwise have been unintelligible to him, but he could "patter-flash" well enough to have passed for a "crossman," and understood every word the burglars had spoken. He continued to hold a whispered consultation about the situations of the various rooms in the house, the likeliest places to remain for plunder, the time of meeting, and the plan of procedure; and before they left their position near the window Bertram was completely master of the details of their intended burglary. As soon as they were gone he sneaked out of the alley, and found his way back to his hotel about one o'clock in the morning.

The next day was a busy one with Bertram. He had the police to advise with, and his own schemes to devise, and to him, the difficult task to perform of ascertaining the exact locality of the den in which Grimgrip's abode was situated. In the evening, however, Bertram was at his post opposite Grimgrip's house, now feebly illuminated, and making an abortive attempt at cheerfulness, about as hopeless as the jest of the condemned on the scaffold. Still was it evident that the affair was not without sufficient occasion, and that something unusual was about to happen in its interior. When Bertram saw several men and women go into about Grimgrip's door, one of them knocking at it lustily, he stole over to them and contrived to be admitted into the house at the same time they were. The guests were received by the old dear and dumb housekeeper, who beckoned to the company to follow her, and ushered them into the front room on the second floor.

The marriage guests had not long to wait for the bridegroom. He entered, gorgeously arrayed in a blue coat with brass buttons, a white vest and dark pantaloons. His collar was rigidly in the ascendant, and needlecloth voluminous. His watch chain was glaring and massive; his white hair fortunately dressed, and his whole kid gloves and patent leather boots of excruciating tightness. The old housekeeper regarded him with looks and gestures of admiration, and endeavored to attract the attention of the young girl who accompanied him, to the unwonted splendors of his person. This girl was the bride, and was absorbed in the contemplation of her own costume. She looked down upon her pink silk dress with great complacency, and examined the gold chain suspended about her neck, and twisted it with her white gloved hands with still prouder satisfaction. Grimgrip's face, rendered the more repulsive by his new apparel, wore an uneasy and anxious look, and the bride's was now bright with gratified childish vanity, and now blank with an inanity and a pain even painful to contemplate. Her features, neck and arms were faultless in their snowy whiteness and enlivening symmetry; and at the first glance Bertram caught of her pale and classic face, he mentally pronounced Victor's last letter to be false, and the lovely bride not to be no other than the daughter of the original of Eidstone's "Lost Love."

His heart beat high, and it was with difficulty he restrained himself from snatching her from the ogre so bent upon wedding her loveliness and youth to his frightful senility. He thought he never had beheld an monstrously more insupportable a sight, and slipped out of the room unobserved, that he should betray his rising indignation. After descending the stairs and entering the street door to admit the police, who were watching outside, he returned to the second floor and listened at the front room door to the marriage service which Swelling Jimmy was intoning with extra solemnity. He heard Grimgrip approaching the door, and had barely time to step aside ere two men came out into the passage, and softly shut in the sham parson's enormous nasality.

"Who was that cove that kept so shady and last minded?" asked one of them.

"One of the old gripdist's pals, I fancy, who has hopped the twig for fear he should hash."

"And no wonder, for 'tis like spliced Grim is to a pap-lap, and enough to histe any kid's middle piece."

"All's bob. I'll brush in, while you dub the old cull's figger, and touch his swag."

Bertram, who was crouched down upon the second flight of stairs, peeped over the balusters, as soon as he heard one of the men re-enter the front room, and the other tampering with a door at the end of the passage; and after watching awhile, observed the sudden eclipse of the light that had streamed through the keyhole of the door.

"Who was that fellow who seemed so shy and just went out?"

"One of the old miser's companions I imagine, who has left in haste for fear he should be sick."

"And no wonder, for it is like marrying old Death to a baby, and enough to turn a stomach."

"Ah's right; I'll hurry in while you pick the lock of the old fellow's door and steal his treasure."

"Find me that."

"Kill (or choke) him, and prevent his tongue from giving the alarm."

INAUGURATION OF THE CENTRAL SANITARY FAIR, PHILADELPHIA.

UNVEILED by the noble exertions of New York, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Brooklyn, Boston and other minor cities, and of the highly benevolent and charitable labors of the Sanitary Commission, Philadelphia has come forward with a determination not to stand low in the list of cities which have left their mark.

A magnificent structure on Logan square has been fitted up for the Fair, and every preparation has been made on effective view of the inauguration ceremony, on the 7th of June. Hopes has been entertained that President Lincoln would be present, but Secretary Seward was only able to leave the capitol, he deputed Bishop Simpson to represent him.

The opening ceremonies were highly impressive, though marred by the unfortunate accident, the breaking down of a portion of the platform.

After the firing of a salute, Mayor Henry formally opened the Fair, and a prayer was then said by Reverend Stevens, the building, with its contents, were transferred to the managers, and the chorus sang the Doxology.

The address of Bishop Simpson was marked by his usual eloquence and ability, and his closing words were then poured upon willing ears and hearts by the Governors of the Union, responding to the sentiments.

As the inaugural procession, with the three Governors, moved down the main aisle of the Fair, under the immense standard roof, where every State hung down its colors, the enthusiasm was unbounded, and the scene inspiring.

The contributions to the Fair are rich and varied, the people of the city of Brotherly Love anxious to be worthy of her name and fame in the hour, so that every nook or curve of success may be anticipated.

The Buildings on Logan Square.

Department Store, 100 feet square, with a pavilion of every description of articles. The main buildings are the Art Gallery on the south side, 300 feet front by the length of the square, 500 feet, and 30 feet wide. On the north side the Art Gallery, 300 feet front by same as foregoing; 120 feet for cabinet ware and musical instruments; 60 feet for a saloon; 60 feet for a library, and 60 feet children's department. All of these occupy the south and extend around the north side. The main building, 250 feet by 30 wide have been allotted to New Jersey and Delaware.

On 12th street the department for furs, hats and caps occupies 50 by 60 feet; pianos, organs, etc., 50 feet; booksellers' department, 75 feet; importations, 25 feet; Indian rubber, 50 feet; boots, shoes, etc., 50 feet; carpettings, 50 feet; architectural designs, 50 feet; bridal-veil department, 25 feet; jewelry, 50 feet; wines and liquors, 25 feet; tobacco, 50 feet. All these departments are located on the 12th street front. The building in the square will be located numerous other departments, the principal of which will be the following: No. 500 by 60, used for the exhibition of fancy goods, perfumery, &c. Space will also be allotted to the Army and Navy, and to Post Office in the centre of the ground.

The Horticultural Department, a circular building, 196 feet in diameter, and is furnished with a fountain and a refreshment saloon. Immediately in the same size, and is connected with a kitchen and the necessary outbuildings. Also a floral temple of every 50 feet. Each building there is a winter garden, 50 feet square. The Ladies' Art Rooms, 50 feet square, 50 feet. The Ladies' Art Rooms are in the most substantial manner, and for beauty far surpass those that were used in the New York Sanitary Commission. The main buildings, if placed in a straight line, would extend nearly three miles.

History of the Sanitary Fairs.

The credit of originating the Sanitary Fairs belongs exclusively to the patriotic ladies of Cincinnati. In that city, we find an exhibition for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission of the Union, opened three months since, and which netted the handsome sum of $80,000. New in turn, Boston held a similar fair, and almost doubled the receipts of the Chicago, the amount realized being $100,000.

Cincinnati next entered the lists, with the Great Western Sanitary Fair, and beat them all by $100,000, the total sum realized being $345,000. Albany, Brooklyn, Buffalo and Cleveland each opened Fairs for the benefit of the Commission on the 22d of Feb. last, which were highly successful. The receipts of the Albany exhibition is set down at $32,000; Brooklyn realized $400,000; Buffalo, $50,000; and Cleveland, $80,000.

Next in order was the great Metropolitan Fair, New York, which opened on the 30th of March, and the receipts from which, at last accounts, had reached $1,500,000, and the end was not yet. Chicago followed suit, and Baltimore held a Fair in the Maryland Institute, on the 19th of April, the anniversary of the day of the mobbing of the Massachusetts troops, while passing through that city to the defence of the Capital. The receipts of the Fair are in the neighborhood of $38,000, and goods yet remain to be sold which will augment the amount. The Mississippi Valley Sanitary Fair opened at St. Louis on the 11th of May, and thus far the receipts amount to about $200,000, with a prospect of a still larger sum being realized from the sale of articles.

The National Sanitary Fair will be held in the Wheeling Island, latter part of April, and realized about $40,000. The Pittsburgh Fair, which began with the Great Central Fair, in Philadelphia, on the 7th of June, and signs were flattering that the receipts would reach $1,000,000. Other Fairs in different parts of the country are in course of preparation, the principal one of which opened in Philadelphia on June 7.

DESTRUCTIVE CONFLAGRATION
Of Steamboats at New Orleans.

THE rebel emissaries are constantly in the midst of the people who are loyal to Government, and seek especially in the Border States and reconquered territory to carry fire and destruction by every act of the incendiary. The greatest loss inflicted by them has been in the recent fire at New Orleans.

On the night of May 27th a fire was discovered in the ladies' cabin of the steamer Black Hawk. Lieut. Smith, commander, saw a man run from it, but was unable to overtake him.

By the time Lieut. Monsater reached the cabin, the whole of the upper deck was in a blaze. The wheel-house was partially burned. The Meteor, lying along side of the Black Hawk, took on board coal, and the flames spread with such unusual rapidity and burned the Meteor's wheel-house, pilot-house, and the Black Hawk, Tiger and Tide, Belle Creole, Belle Lee, Fawn and Rose, all lying in the rear of James. It appears that it was through the most culpable negligence that the Empire Parish, Belle Creole, Belle Lee, Fawn and Rose were burned. Even then a few buckets of water might have saved her.

The scene which followed was awful, one by one, floating out into the stream. In a few moments the Empire Parish was enveloped in flames, and presented a skeleton remaining. The chimneys of the Empire Parish, belonging to the Fawn, Rose, another steamer, took place to avoid their fall.

The schooners moored at the Bayaune tier took fire from the Empire Parish and floated out into the stream. The scene from the levee was sublime. The lurid glare of the flames, lighting up the horizon and reddening the Mississippi for miles, presented a magnificent spectacle. As the burning steamers left their moorings the assembled crowd on the levee looked like rafts of fire, and presented a scene of rare picturesqueness.

The fire is thought to have originated in the Crescent City Cotton and the coast parishes, interrupting, as it does, a large intercourse of trade.

The total loss, which falls on the Government, is about $300,000.

THE BATTLE OF RESACA.

WE continue this week our series of sketches of Sherman's campaign, and among others a view of the battle of Resaca, on the 14th ult.

The battlefield, which lay 15 miles from Dalton, was a succession of open and intermediate, ravines, densely wooded, and almost impervious to the eye or foot of man. On the summits of the ridges the enemy had formed formidable breastworks, with artillery planted on the commanding positions. A consultation was held by the Generals, and Generals Thomas, Howard, Sedicki, Sickles, Williams, Geary, Ruger and Hooker, all attended, and a plan of operations was arranged the plan of battle.

While the columns of the 20th corps were in motion, and with quiet yet energetic movement entered the forest which lay before them, the rebel batteries and infantry seemed heavy with silence. The divisions of Williams, Geary and Butterfield, of the 20th corps moved as nearly as they were able, and the work of blood began. The rebel infantry was heavily with musketry and musketry, but our men advanced steadily in columns of battalions, and with a fierce determination to meet the enemy flying from their first lines of works to the rear, and there to make a momentary line. Immediately in front of Butterfield and Geary was a battery of rebel artillery, and this was in the strongest of all scrubby oaks and protected by an earthwork. It annoyed our troops.

Directly behind it, within 60 paces, was a redoubt, on a ridge of ground which commanded the whole field and gunners. To capture this battery was very desirable, and the 20th corps determined to capture it by the both divisions. The contest was sharp and bloody. Our troops were obliged to lie down behind the crest of the base of the parapet, but as they showed their heads over the crest to reload, the guns they were shot down by the men in the ritepits behind the batting. Our troops have been accustomed to fighting in a standing parties, inaccessible to either without almost certain death. The men were obliged to load with the muzzles of the guns as they protruded through the embrasures, and fire in the same manner. Many were obliged to undertake to approach.

Meanwhile, under and around the fort were constantly Col. Cobham, of Geary's division, as brave an officer as ever drew sword, and remained in the front line for several hours, until darkness approached. Col. Cobham secured the guns of all redoubt, and with a little less than a regiment of men, and with as little loss as could be expected in the circumstances, and made an opening sufficiently wide to let the guns through. Ropes were attached to them, and some time after midnight they became ours. Our artillery was brought up, and moved with vigor, and their whole force retreated under cover of the night.

KINGSTON, GA.

AFTER the battle of Resaca, Sherman, with his whole force, pushed rapidly forward, and took all the more cultivated portions of Georgia, leaving the mountainous districts to the guerrilla warfare of the rebel cavalry. Kingston is a place of some importance on the Etowah river. It has also a railroad connection. It was occupied on May 18 by the 4th corps, which drove Cleatham out. Here Sherman established his headquarters temporarily, and placed his hospitals here. After the battle of New Hope, the wounded in great numbers were sent to this point.

BATTLE OF BUZZARD'S ROOST, May 8.

AMONG the strongholds selected by the rebels for the defence of Atlanta against the American army was Buzzard's Roost, carried in spite of all their endeavors on the 8th of May, by the indomitable courage of Sherman's men, full of the consciousness of a just cause. It is a high, rocky elevation, on Mill creek, a branch of the Oostanaula between Ringgold and Dalton.

Our advance engaged in some very heavy skirmishing, which lasted for several hours. At first our lines were slowly forced back by the vastly superior numbers of the enemy, who resisted with a stubborn desperation our attempted advance. From out their long lines of concealed ritepits they showered their leaden messengers of death with terrible effect upon our heroes. A charge was finally ordered, and then ensued one of the furious encounters that can only occur in a hand-to-hand conflict.

The difficulties to be contended with may be judged from the fact that the enemy had their entire columns advancing too distant to reach with rifle, sent rocks flying down the mountain side, so as to crush them in their course through they were passing in order to get within reach of the rifle and bullet iron, and hurl our forces back over them. They drove the rebels from the fortress, leaving only the dead and wounded in their ritepits.

THE BATTLE OF COAL HARBOR,
June 1st, 1864.

COAL HARBOR, the scene of a recent battle in the campaign of General Grant, is already familiar to those who have followed the operations of the war, as the point where Stonewall Jackson first struck in his flank movement against McClellan before the Seven Days' Fight. Virginia names are rather elusive, and this one is no exception. Coal Harbor presents to the traveller a view simply coal nor a harbor: it is an unquoted rustic hamlet, comprising two or three houses, with barns, outhouses, &c.

On the 1st of June, the enemy were in heavy force between Coal Harbor and Gaines's mill, in a strong position on the skirt of the pine woods, and on a knoll, and defended by ritepits and earthworks.

Against this position the army was to be reinforced around Coal Harbor, and the 18th on the right, along the road, supported by the cavalry on the left. The woods were 200 yards wide, and by a strip of open ground.

At 4 P.M. the order was given to charge the rebel works, and the 18th advanced under a terrible fire of grape and canister, and of musketry. Some of Longstreet's rebels pell mell from their works through the woods. Cobham's infantry rallied at last, again and again brought up, but failed to regain the lost position.

The loss on both sides was heavy, but we took many prisoners in the rifle-pits. Among the killed was Col. McConihe, of the 169th N. Y.

The 6th corps marched up gallantly as the 18th, and Rickett's division carried a line of breastworks, sustaining a loss of over 1,000, but inflicting severe punishment on the enemy, and taking full 600 prisoners.

Rickett's division was composed of the enemy's works, and held them.

On the 3d of June, Rickett an order thanking him for his gallantry.

The 6th corps advanced at the same time, and was severely engaged.

BATTLE OF BETHESDA CHURCH,
May 30th.

EARLY on the morning of the 30th the 6th corps (Warren's) advanced across Telopotamy creek, a sluggish, narrow, shallow stream, with precipitous banks and marshy borders. Col. Harding, of Crawford's division, pushed forward to reconnoitre along the Mechanicsville road, but meeting the enemy in force, fell back. At two P.M. the enemy stacked Crawford, and he, in accordance with his orders, formed a line of battle was formed, Griffin on the right, Cutler in the centre, and Crawford on the left. Gen. Burnside's corps was on the right of Warren's. At six P.M. the enemy assaulted our left, but after small was made to retire. They advanced in two lines of battle and heavy skirmish line. In front of Griffin their approach was in such dense cane solid shot and shell from the angry mouths of s score and more of heavy guns.

Firm and unshaken as a wall of brass stood our men. In front of Cutler's battle strewn, and the ground was barren by shell and canister. Col. Hardingwas wounded in the arm. Special praise is due to the artillery, Lieut. Walcott's, Co. G, 3d Mass. artillery, and Lieut. Cowan's, Co. E, 1st N. Y. artillery, which have been in position, opened responsive to the enemy's cannon.

Meanwhile, the fighting on the left had become intense our troops hurled him back. Upon Gen. Crawford's division the enemy poured in solid columns and great force. The enemy sought to turn his left, but here each time was repulsed with sudden attacks and ready fire. Again men coolly waited to return the fire. It was a most beautiful sight. The enemy's lines were seen, staggered and fell back. Lieut. Rittenhouse's battery, Co. D, 5th U. S. artillery, Lieut. Matthews's, Co. M, 5th U. S. artillery, Lieut. Walcott's, Co. G, 3d Mass. artillery, and Lieut. Cowan's, Co. E, 1st N. Y. artillery, which have been in position, opened responsive to the enemy's cannon.

HAWE'S STORE, VA.
Headquarters of Lieut.-Gen. Grant.

THE war has brought into prominence and endowed with immortality many insignificant spots in Virginia. Names, hitherto unknown to the country at large, and unwritten, except in the privately printed histories of the first families of Old Dominion, have become famous. At Hawe's store, which was Grant's headquarters after crossing at Hanovertown and pushing down to Spottsylvania Court House, are the magnificent hamlets, or rather houses, which in the South are dignified with the name of villages. We give a picturesque view of the troops throwing up entrench ments at the spot on Sunday, May 29th.

HOW A SCOTCH SERVANT LASSIE BECAME A BARONESS.

ROMANCE is not confined to novels, but is occasionally wonderful to hear of, yet here is an instance. The fine family of the late Emperor Nicholas was founded by one from the cradle by English nurses and governesses, until the Russian language is mastered by a strict military scale, and has been decorated with the order of St. Andrew, ennobled and enriched. Some nine-and-thirty years ago she came a servant girl to Russia in a Scotch trader's family, who turned her adrift in St. Petersburg. A lucky chance procured her the situation of undergovernmaid in the Emperor Nicholas's family, where she was placed about the person of Nicholas to teach him to speak English. His attachment to her was so great that when he married he raised her to the head of his household, appointing her to the rank of Baroness in the military gradations of rank, until she became a General.

STANZAS WRITTEN IN DEJECTION.

BY THE GREAT CHINESE POET, LI-TAI-PE.

THE sun of yesterday which leaves me,
No earthly skill can woo to stay,
To-day's pale gloom which chills and grieves me,
No human arm can hold away;
The birds of passage, ever flying past,
In countless flocks stream down the autumn blast,
I mount my tower to gaze far off, and fast
Fill winecups from the waning jar.

The mighty bards, long dead, seem rising
Around me in this lonely place,
I murmur through the old songs, prizing
Their matchless vigor, truth and grace—
I too feel powers that will not be controlled,
But cannot rival here the great of old,
Till to pure skies upsoaring, I behold,
More closely, each unclouded star.

Vainly our swords would cleave the river:
It keeps its ever-living flow;
Vainly in winecups, mantling ever,
We strive to drown the sense of woe—
Man, in this life, when stormy fate grows dark,
Must let her billows rock his wandering bark,
Give the wild waves their will, nor pause to mark
Too keenly how they foam afar.

The Gulf Between Them.

BY ANN S. STEPHENS.

CHAPTER XLIII.—CONTINUED.

For a few instants there was wild confusion; the servants rushed in, the wounded criminal was lifted up, but during all that time Elsie lay on the sofa quite unnoticed, not insensible yet, but helpless as ever, so blasted by the shock that mind and body seemed withering under it.

Ford sat on the floor in gloomy silence. In spite of his refusals they made an effort to staunch the blood which was trickling down his shirt bosom, but he said in a low, quiet voice:

"It is useless. I have cheated you at last—I am a dying man. It was my last stake, and I have lost it."

The change in his face proved the truth of his words; even the officers, inured to scenes of suffering and pain, recoiled before his stony hardihood.

One of them spoke in explanation to Mellen.

"We don't know what he wanted here; we have been on his track for days; he has committed a forgery, and was trying to get off to Europe."

"He's bound on a longer journey, that you cannot stop now," said Ford. "Mellen, I have something to say to you—better send these men away unless you want our secrets discussed before them."

After a few moments the men went out and left Mellen alone with the suicide—in his madness Mellen had not yet heeded Elsie's presence, or the dreadful state she was in.

"I am dying," said Ford; "I may live the night out—it don't matter! You are glad to see my blood run—that's natural enough! Man, man, the torment I go to isn't so bad as that I shall leave behind for you."

"Say quickly what you wish," exclaimed Melles, forgetting even his hatred in the dreadful spectacle the man made, his garments red with blood, his face pale with the death agony, distorted with baffled rage and hate. "I believe nothing you say—you cannot move me."

"So be it," said the man. "These fellows have tied my hands—put yours in my coat pocket—you'll find three letters and a paper."

Mellen obeyed, shuddering to feel the blood drops warm on his fingers as he drew forth the package.

"Read them," said Ford, briefly.

Mellen opened one after another of the epistles and read—they were in Elsie's writing—they proved the truth of the villain's words. The smaller paper was a marriage certificate.

Mellen staggered back with one heartbroken cry.

"I have touched you," exclaimed the man; "you believe! There lies your precious sister in a dead faint—here I sit, dying, a criminal, but your brother-in-law none the less—stoop down, I want to whisper something."

Mellen bent his head soothingly, though his enemy was dying.

"It is a fair certificate you see, but I was a married man all the time."

As Ford whispered these words a fiendish smile covered the lips on which death was scattering ashes.

Mellen started forward with a wild impulse to choke the ebbing life from his lips, but he whispered hoarsely:

"You can't fight a dying man—you'll only put me out of this cursed pain if you choke me."

Mellen stood transfixed.

"I'll tell you the story," continued Ford; "novels always have dying confessions in them—hear mine. I tell you because it is too late to remedy what you have done—your wife is gone—I believe dead."

Mellen could not speak; he felt about blindly for support and sank into a chair.

"I always hated you," Ford went on, and the hatred of a life burned in his voice and convulsed his face. "When we were boys together I swore to pay you off for your wealth, and your insolent kindness, your infernal condescending generosity. I took away the woman you loved—I cheated you out of money—that was something, but not enough. I came back to this country just after you sailed from Europe, and even before I ever saw the woman who became your wife, or your sister, I had formed my plan—it succeeded. I met that girl—I made her love me—made her mad for me—that makes you wince. But mind me, I would not have married her after all but that I thought she had inherited half her old uncle's property. It would not have been worth while. Then came your turn to laugh if you had but known it. I was taken in—sold. The creature had not a cent, and no hope of one if she offended you. It was a hateful position, especially as I did not care for the pretty fool after the speculation failed, and what's better, she soon got over caring for me, just as the other did, and wanted to be off her bargain. I had given her a glimpse or two of my way of life. That did not frighten her, but the poverty did. This little sister of yours has luxurious tastes, and understands the value of wealth uncommonly well. But she had told me just how far you had made your wife independent in means. It was a pretty sum, and I saw a way of getting it. Elsie had told me a great deal about your wife, and I had made my own observations, to say nothing of certain wires that I had laid in the basement region of your house. The little goose yonder really believed that you had married that glorious woman only as a companion for her—that you did not love her in the least. I knew better; she was a woman to adore, worship for ever and ever: and you are no fool in such matters, I know that of old. Your wife adored you; I can say this now that you have killed her, but that little witch had convinced her of the story she told me, and it was breaking her heart, for that woman had a heart. To save you from trouble and the creature that you worshipped even in her presence from disgrace, I knew that she would give up everything, even her life, which you have taken at last. I told Elsie the truth, that I had a wife living in Europe, though it was impossible for any one to prove it against my will. The very day that I told her this I managed to convey some of her letters to me—fond, silly things they were, into your wife's room. Then I sent Elsie home.

"The girl was mad, went into hysterics, made an insane effort to kill herself, took poison and heaven knows what else in the presence of your wife—I knew she would, and set her loose for that purpose. These tragedies were kept up till yout wife took a vow never to betray Elsie's secret, and to shield her from all harm with her own life if needful. I heard this and knew that my money was safe. Your wife came to me, for I was nor permitted to enter the house. There was a woman! I swear the only creature of the sex that I ever respected. She was firm but grand in her generosity, ready to sacrifice everything so long as it took Elsie out of my power. I gave up more of the letters, reserving these three for use, unknown to her. She raised all the money in her power at the time, but I kept the certificate, resolved not to sell that without demanding the last cent she possessed. In telling my grand secret, I had been cautious to keep all possibility of proof to myself. They knew that my first wife, your old lady love, was living, but had no means of proving the fact or even that I had ever been married to her, otherwise my position might have been dangerous; as it was, those two women were like flies in a spider's web.

"Our child, your nephew, was born, and died, fortunately for us all. They were obliged to trust me a little then. Your wife summoned me to the house, for she was afraid to claim help from any other human being—I went, and with my own hands buried it under a cypress tree in your grounds. That heroic woman stood by and watched. She would not trust me out of her sight, fearing that I might attempt to see Elsie, whom she guarded like a mother bird when hawks are near. Noble soul. It was all useless; I had no wish to see her, and as for her, I dare say she was glad to get rid of me even at the bitter cost she was paying.

"Well, after this I got a little money from your wife now and then, under threats of claiming my wife, which always brought her to terms. But one day a new idea came into my head; I found out that you were coming home just as the steamer which brought you was on the coast. That your will had been made, leaving all you had to be equally divided between your wife and sister. If you should never reach shore Elsie would be worth claiming in earnest. But with that news came a letter from my wife; against my commands she was following me to this country, just when her presence was certain ruin."

The man broke off in his narration here, evidently convulsed with more than physical pain, specks of foam flew to his lips, great drops of agony stood on his forehead.

"Brandy; give me some brandy!" he cried out huskily. "Some brandy, I say."

Mellen poured some brandy into a glass and held it to his mouth. He drank eagerly and sank back to the floor again.

"What's the use of talking about that? I would have saved her at the last and tried hard enough, but the storm was too much for me. After all that, you baffled me and got on shore; the fiends must have guided that pilot boat. I got frightened too. It was not a part of my programme to go down with you."

"Wretch!" said Mellen, struck with a sudden idea, "you were the person who nearly lost me among the breakers."

"Yes," answered Ford. "We both had a narrow chance, but the risk was worth running—that is, if your will really was made—but when you once touched shore all hope for me was over. I must leave America; I sent word to your wife that I must have twenty-five thousand dollars or claim my wife.

"She was trying to get it; she gave me the bracelet as a bribe for delay, one night when I came. Now you have the whole story. I came here to-night because I had not heard from her, and had no idea that she was gone; now I believe she's dead. I thought I would see that girl there. Now, then, Grantley Mellen, are you satisfied? You have driven your wife away, you could believe her guilty, and pet that frivolous thing! Tell me if my revenge is not complete!"

Mellen ran to the door and opened it.

"Come in," he cried to the officers. "Carry that man away! Take him to the lodge; he shall not even die here."

"As you will," cried Ford. "Good-bye, Mellen. Take care of your sister, and if you can, forget your murdered wife."

He could not walk, so they carried him down to the lodge, and there, while waiting for a doctor to come, he sat looking death in the face with the same desperate bravado that had marked his conduct all the night.

CHAPTER XLIV.

SHRIEK after shriek from Elsie roused Mellen. She was raving in horrible delirium, and when assistance arrived it proved that she had been seized with brain fever, and there was scarcely hope of her recovery.

Standing there by her bed, this thought must have been a relief to Mellen; but he did not forsake her, his pride was utterly crushed. He longed to cast himself down by her side and die there.

The next morning, when nurses and physicians arrived, Mellen left the house. He was going out on an aimless search for his lost wife—the woman who had given up her last hope for him and his.

He learned at the lodge that the wounded prisoner had been carried to the village by his own command; that he was alive still, but could not last more than another day; that his name was North, and he was well-known among the sporting gentry who came to the shore tavern.

Mellen hurried to the city and commenced his task. He sought for Elizabeth in every place where there was a possibility of her having taking refuge, but without avail. He used every means in his power to make some discovery, but they were ineffectual.

When night came he returned home, only to hear Elsie's mad shrieks and laughter echoing through the desolate house, to pass the night with those sounds ringing in his ears, and that terrible remorse tugging at his heart.

The next morning he started again on his errand. He was told in the village that the man was dead. The story had gone abroad that it was a daring burglar, and that the officers had surprised him breaking into Mellen's house. He had found no strength to tell his story, so fear of open disgrace perished with him.

In the madness of his grief Mellen had forgotten that Tom Fuller was his guest. The young man's chamber was in another wing of the building, and he heard nothing of the wild turmoil that distracted the family. Tom was not a very early riser, and when he came down in the morning, sauntering lzaily into the breakfast-room, expecting to see Elsie there in her pretty blue morning-dress and flossy curls, he found the room empty, no table spread, and no human being to greet him.

"Well, this is strange," said Tom; "but when Bessie is away things will go to sixes and sevens, I dare be sworn. And Elsie isn't well, poor darling! Hallo! there goes Mellen, riding like a trooper! What on earth does all this mean? I am getting hungry, and lonesome, and——"

Here Tom gave a jerk at the bell, and cast himself into an easy-chair.

'Dolph presented his woe-begone face at the door.

"What's the matter, 'Dolph? Isn't it breakfast-time? Where is your master going—and—and—Well, 'Dolph, can't you tell me why Miss Elsie isn't down?"

"Miss Elsie, oh, sah, she am sick."

"Sick, 'Dolph! You don't say that?" cried Tom, starting up, with his face all in a blaze of anxiety.

"Yes, I means just dat, and nothing else."

"No, no; not very sick, 'Dolph," cried Tom, trembling through all his great frame, "only a little nervous, a headache, or something of that sort."

"She's just ravin'—crazy—ask Vic if you don't believe me. The doctors come in before daylight; I went after em myself. Robbers broke into de house last night, sah, and frightened our sweet young lady almost to death."

"Robbers, 'Dolph!"

"Yes, sah. A gemman, too, as has been a visitor in dis 'dentical house. Marster catched him in de act ob takin' out de silver, and de gemman—robber, I mean—felt so 'shamed ob himself dat he up and banged a bullet straight frough his own bussom, afor Miss Elsie, too!"

"Poor thing; precious little darling," cried Tom; "Mellen's left her all alone, and Elizabeth away; dear me! 'Dolph, 'Dolph, what was that?"

"It's her a screaming."

"What, Elsie, my Elsie?"

"Yes, sah; dat am her."

"'Dolph, I say, cried Tom, in breathless anxiety, thrusting a ten dollar gold piece into the negro's hand; "'Dolph, would it be very much amiss, you know, if I was to take off my boots and just steal up?"

"Well, I doesn't 'zactly know; de fair sex am so captious 'bout us gemmen; but Vic is up dar, and you can ask her, she knows all 'bout de 'prieties. Smart gal, dat Vic, I tell you; loves Miss Elsie, too, like fifty."

"Does she?" said Tom; "here's another gold piece, give it to her, with my best regards, 'Dolph."

'Dolph pocketed the gold piece, and that was the last time it saw the light for many a day. Tom took off his boots and crept upstairs in his stocking feet, holding his breath as he went. Vic came out of the sick room, and the young man's grief softened her so much that she allowed him to steal into Elsie's boudoir, where he sat all the morning listening to the poor girl's muttered fancies, after heaping Vic with gold pieces to leave the door open, that he might catch a glimpse now and then of the beloved face, flushed and wild as it was. Generous, noble-hearted Tom Fuller; he had been really hungry when he came from his own room, but all that was forgotten now, and there he sat fasting till the shadows slanted eastward. Then he saw Mellen riding towards th house at a slow, weary pace, which bespoke great depression.

Tom arose and went downstairs, urged to meet his friend by the kindest heart that ever beat in a human bosom.

"She's better, I am quite sure; she slept two or three minutes; so don't look so downhearted," he cried," seizing Mellen's hand as he dismounted. "But where's Elizabeth? I thought you had gone after her."

"Elizabeth, my wife," answered Mellen, lifting his haggard eyes to Tom's eager face. "She is gone—lost—dead. My friend, my friend, I have murdered your cousin."

"Murdered her; now I like that," said Fuller; "but where is she? not gone off in a tiff. Bessie wasn't the girl to do that any way; but as for murder, oh nonsense!"

"Fuller, you are her only relative, and have a right to know. Come out into the grounds, the air of the house would stifle me."

They sat down together on a garden chair within sight of the old cypress.

"I have been a proud man, Fuller, sensitive beyond everything to the honor of my family, but never knowingly have I allowed this feeling to stand between my soul and justice. Your cousin has been terribly wronged since she came under my roof. It is now too late for reparation, but to you, her only relative, the truth must be known. I will not even ask you to keep the facts secret. I have no right."

"Look here, old fellow," said Tom, wringing Mellen's slender hand in his; "if this is a lover's quarrel between you and Elizabeth, don't say another word. Lord bless you! I can persuade her into anything, she knows me of old. Besides, I am glad there is something that I can do to make you both goodnatured just now, for as like as not, I shall be asking a tremendous favor of you before long, and this will pave the way; tell me where your wife is, I'll take care of the rest."

"Tom, I believe—I fear that she is dead."

The solemnity with which this was spoken appalled Tom.

"Dead!" he repeated, and the ruddy color faded from his face. "Dead—you can't mean it."

"Listen patiently to me if you can," said Mellen, sadly. "This must be told, but the effort is terrible."

Tom folded his arms and leant his now grave face to listen. Then Mellen told him all; the anguish, the deception, the anxiety which these pages have recorded so imperfectly. There was but little exhibition of excitement, Mellen told these things in a dull, dreary voice that bespoke utter hopelessness. He was so lost in his own misery that the signs of anguish in Tom's face never disturbed his narrative. When he had done Tom Fuller arose, and stood before him, white as death, but with a noble look in his eyes.

"Mellen, give me your hand, for you and I are just the two most wretched dogs in America at this minute. I loved her, Mellen, O God help me! I love her as you did the other one. Great heavens, what can we do?"

"Nothing," answered Mellen; "I did not think another pang could be added, and my soul recoils from this. Could she prove so base to you also?"

"Base; look here, Mellen, you don't take this in the true light. It was all my fault. I forced myself upon her; I—I—"

The poor fellow broke down, a convulsion of grief swept his face, and he walked away. Directly he came back, holding out his hand.

"Come, now let us search for Elizabeth," he said.

"It is useless; I have searched."

"But come with me—it was not in town you should have looked; Elizabeth would not go there."

Mellen arose and walked towards the bay. In passing a clump of rosebushes Tom stopped to extricate a fragment of silk from the thorns.

"What dress did she wear that night?" he inquired, examining the shred in his hand.

"I remember well, it was purple," answered Mellen, without lifting his weary eyes from the ground.

"Come this way, for she has been here," said Tom. "This path leads to the fishpond."

They walked on, Tom searching all the thickets he passed vigilantly, and Mellen looking around him in terror lest the dead body of his wife should appear and crush his last hope for ever.

"She has been this way," said Tom, when they reached the pond. "See, that tuft of cat-tails has been broken. No, no, don't be afraid to look; see yonder where the bushes are swept down; she she went away towards the shore."

Mellen groaned aloud. This was his most terrible fear. They walked on, taking a path that curved round the bay, and leaving the shore tavern on the right, went down to the beach. It was now sunset, and a golden glow lay upon the waters till they broke along the beach like great waves of pearls and opals drifting over the Sound together, and melting as they fell. Near the two men was a winrow of black seaweed, on which great drops of spray were quivering. Something in the appearance of this dark mass arrested Tom's attention. He went up to the pile of weeds and kicked them apart with his foot; something compact and heavy lay underneath. He took it in his hand, gave the weeds that clung to it a shake, and held it up. Mellen came forward, his white lips parted, his breath came with pain. He reached forth his hand, but uttered no word.

It was the woollen shawl that Elizabeth had worn that night.

She was dead! That fiendish man had spoken the truth—Mellen believed it now. Elizabeth was dead, and he had killed her—that noble, grand woman, so resolute in her sacrifice, so determined to save that girl, to preserve him from the hardest shock to his honor and pride, she had offered herself up to death, body and soul.

Those few moments of conviction changed him more than many years would have done. The pride and anger which had helped to aid him in that first grief were gone now—he was the wronger that first grief were gone now—he was the wronger —searching for the wife he had driven forth to perish. And she was dead.

No clue—no hope!

He did not touch the shawl, but leaving Tom Fuller, went back and sat down in Elsie's room, with the sick girl's delirious cries smiting his ear, and terrible images rising before his eye of Elsie both—dying, dead—drowned and dashed upon some lonely beach, with her cold, dead eyes staring blankly in his face.

Tom dropped the shawl in a wet mass at his feet, and walked away without attempting to detain or comfort the stricken husband. He too believed Elizabeth dead, and had not heart to offer consolation. Indeed, the pang of sorrow that this conviction brought took away his strength.

He walked on, over the wet sands of the beach, ready to cry out with the anguish of this sudden bereavement, when he came in sight of Caleb Benson east in the window on the sand.

"Is that you, Mr. Fuller, and alone? I'm mighty pleased to find any one from the Cove—most of all you."

"Do you want me for anything particular?" asked Tom in a husky voice; "if not I—I'm engaged just now."

"Well, yes; I must tell you," said the old man. "I've bin to your house twice—once in the night—I thought mebby I'd see the young gal."

"What is it?" asked Tom, in the impotence of his grief.

"She made me promise not to tell—but what-ever's wrong, you're her cousin, and can't be hard on her—because of the awful sick."

Tom caught his arm.

"My cousin—are you talking of my cousin, Mrs. Mellen?"

"Why yes, sure enough, though she never will forgive me for telling you."

"But where is she? Where is she?" shouted Tom. "How did you find her? Who got her out of the water? Great heaven, old man, can't you speak?"

"Well, this is the way it was," answered the old man, slowly, and eagerly, or morning, for it was night on to daylight, I was eating breakfast with the young one, when on one 'em got scared by a face at the window looking in on us as we eat. I just got one sight of the face, and kinder seemed to know it. So up I jumps, and on with my great coat, and out into the fog. Something gray went on afore me, and I followed, for sometimes it looked like a woman, and sometimes not. Down it went, making a bee-line for the beach, and I after it like split, for it traveled fast, I can tell you. The night had been kinder rough, and the waves dashed high, considering that the storm wasn't nothing much to speak on. But the woman, for I could see that it was a woman now, went right straight on, as if she made up her mind to pitch head forred into the sea and drown herself the first thing.

"This riled me up, and I went on arter her like a tornado, now I tell you. But just as I was reaching out both hands to drag her back from one of that same roaring along it broke, and the undertow sucked her in right afore my face. Now some folks might a hollered in arter her, but I knew better than that. We should both on us have gone to kingdom come and no mistake if I had. Not a bit of it! I planted myself firm and waited. Sure enough the second wave arter that came tearing along, tossing the poor crettur up and down like a wisp of straw, and pitched her nearer right to my tracks. In course the next wave would have dragged her out to sea agin, but I got hold of her shawl and held on to had her both, but the darned thing gave way, and I had just time to drop it and make a grab at her clothes, when it came crushing over us all. But I held on, and planted myself firm, so it only dragged us both a foot or two and went leaving off. Then I got a fair hold of the lady and dragged her up the beach out of harm's way. But I really thought that she was dead; the daylight broke while she lay on the sand, and then I saw who it was, and the sight of her cold face drove me wild. I took her up in my arms and carried her home. There was a good fire burning, and my darter is used to taking care of sick cases. So she wrapped her in hot blankets, and worked over her till the life came back."

"And she's alive—doing well," cried Tom, "at your house; old Benson, you're—a—a—trump. If I hadn't given away every gold piece I had in my pocket, you should have a double handful—by Jove, you should! But never mind, just come along, I want to see one splendid hug, and then for the Cove. No, no, that won't be fair after all," thought the generous fellow, "Grant must have the first kiss—she must tell her—"

The thought of what must be told her went through the young fellow's brain like a screw of fire, but he dashed into the path which led to Piney Cove, calling back to Benson, "Don't tell her anything! I am coming right away.

Breathless, eager, forgetful of his own great sorrow, Tom cleared the distance between the shore and Piney Cove with enormous strides. As he crossed the lawn almost at a run, leaped up the steps two at a time, and found Mellen lying upon a sofa in the balcony, with his face to the wall.

"Get up, old fellow, get up and shake yourself," he cried, seizing upon Mellen and turning him over as if he had been a Newfoundland dog in the wrong place; "I've found her—by Jove, I have!—she's at old Benson's. Isn't he a brick? She's well—she, she isn't quite that according to the latest accounts, but by all that's sacred, your wife is alive!"

Mellen started to his feet, bewildered, wild.

"Thomas Fuller, is this true?"

"Do I look like a man who tells lies for fun?" said Tom, drawing himself up.

"Have you seen her—is my wife truly alive?"

"Yes—no—no—I haven't seen her—was in too great a hurry for that. But she's there at Benson's tavern, just as sure—as sure—as a gun."

Mellen brushed past the kind fellow while he was hesitating for a comparison. His saddle horse stood at the door—for he had been too excited for any orders regarding it. He sprang upon its back and dashed across the lawn, through the grove and out of sight, quickly as a fast horse could clear the ground. He drew up in front of old Benson's house, leaped off and rushed in.

"Where is she?" he cried, to the frightened woman who met him. "Oh, Mary—where is she?"

A cry from the upper room answered his words; he dashed into the apartment. There, on the humble bed, lay Elizabeth, pale and changed, but alive—saved!

She was covering back in deadly affright—putting out her hands in wild appeal.

"I'm going away," she moaned; "don't kill me! I can stand it—I'll go—I'll go."

He fell on his knees by the bed, he was telling the truth in wild, broken words.

"Only forgive me, Elizabeth; only forgive me!"

She could not comprehend what he was saying at the moment; when she did, her first thought was of the child—his sister.

"Elsie! Elsie!"

"She is ill—dying perhaps. Oh, my wife! my wife! Try to speak—say that you forgive me."

She was too greatly agitated for words then, but she put out her hands with a gesture he understood. He lifted her to his breast and folded her close to his heart. She lay in their passionate clasp with a long sigh of content.

"God is very good," she whispered; "the new life has come."

There, in that lowly room, Grantley Mellen held his wife to his heart, and the last fire of his old wrong, impetuous nature went out for ever in thankfulness and tears.

TERRIBLE ACCIDENT ON THE HUDSON.

The Burning of the Steamer Berkshire.

As the Berkshire, a new and fine boat of the Hudson Steamboat Company, was on her way down the river, and near Hyde Park, on the evening of June 3, about half-past ten, an alarm of fire was raised. The scene that followed defies description. The passengers, who had retired to their cabins, rushed out in terror half-clad, to find the boat enveloped in flames. A terrible lamp had exploded and spread its liquid fire over a bale of hay. In a few moments the masses of bay which covered the deck were in flames, and though the pilot, Mr. Benjamin Rigby, acted manfully to his post and endeavored to run her ashore, the fire gained rapidly, and she struck at last full 50 feet from the shore. Many in their panic jumped into the water and were drowned, but the masses of combustibles prevented many, especially ladies, from even attempting this.

As unknown passenger, whose name did not transpire, states that he left Catskill in company with a friend, and took passage on the Berkshire for New York. After retiring to rest he awoke in the night to suddenly hear a cry of fire. Jumping from his berth, he ran to the companion-way and ascended the steps, intending to go out on deck, but on opening the door the smoke rushed through the apartment with such violence and fury as to drive him back. Concluding in an instant that he had to get out of the cabin or be suffocated, he made another attempt to reach the deck and succeeded this time in gaining one foot out, when he observed the flames of a flame directly in his pathway, utterly doing away with all possibility of escape. He again retreated to the cabin, which by this time was so filled with smoke as to render it an impossibility to breathe in it. He made one attempt to get out air din.

Grasping the wood work, he entered an anteroom, in which was a window, through which he could see a dim light. Running to it, he broke the sash, and was assisted against a boy who was also endeavoring to escape. Seizing him, he very carefully through the window and dropped into the water. His friend, he believes, was suffocated to death or suffocated in the cabin. He furthermore says that he was the first one that made any attempt to escape from the cabin, and he is positive that after he retreated from the companion-way the second time nothing could get out of the cabin alive. There being quite a number in their berths in the cabin, it is feared that this gentleman's statement is too true.

Among the scenes, says a survivor, which I witnessed, I should mention one which particularly excited my interest. A little boy, 10 or 12 years of age, whose name I afterwards learned was Potter, was among the passengers. After the loss of his grandmother, an old lady of 60 years of age. They were asleep in the ladies' cabin when the fire broke out. The old lady awoke first, and immediately aroused her grandchild from his slumbers. Hastily dressing, they vested was on fire, and they must flee for their lives. The two rushed out of the cabin together, and the old lady, who had proceeded forward until the flames drove them back and cut off their escape in that direction, they were obliged to retreat to the cabin, where they rushed into one of the staterooms. The boy pulled open the sash and smashed in the glass in an effort to break open the sash and window of the adjoining room. His little shoulder was thrust out against the window, only succeeding in smashing out the glass. He took the window down, then opened the sash and got out of the window on deck, and, seizing the lady as they passed through the cabin. The old lady's clothing caught fire, and her grandchild could not get through. The boy jumped into the water, refusing to let go of her until he could get out safe. The flames approached him, however, in such a manner as to render his position perfectly horrid, and his grandmother finally commanded him to leave her and save himself, as he could not hope to be rescued. The little fellow left her side with the utmost reluctance, and swam ashore, and reached the shore in safety. He wept most bitterly, and was the object of pity from every one. He was generally thought the poor old woman was burned in the vessel, as she was not heard from since.

The total loss of life was nearly 90. Many bodies have not yet been recovered, and some are beyond recognition.

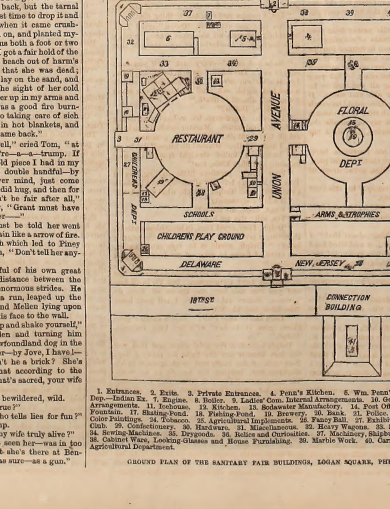
BOOK NOTICES.

HAUNTED HEARTS. By the Author of "The Lamplighter." Boston: J. E. TILTON & CO.

This is Cumming as an artistic reputation by her previous works of fiction, and in this sustains it. The scene is laid in New Jersey, and the life of the epoch adopted is well drawn. Her plot is a dramatic one, although not sensational, but in the best sense of the term. Her heroine, Agnes, is well drawn, and excites the sympathy and interest of the reader to the close.

Her style is graceful and natural, and few will be disappointed who take up "Haunted Hearts."

STUMBLING BLOCKS. By GAIL HAMILTON. Boston: TICKNOR & FIELDS.



Miss Hamilton is as amusable, as smart and as sprightly, in this field as in any she has yet cultivated. She agrees with all sensible in the evangelical school of New England. But she is thoroughly independent in her views as the effervescence of her own brain, and does not let criticisms upon what she regards as prevalent errors in this respect with a burden which adds materially to the spice of her book

WAX FLOWERS AND HOW TO MAKE THEM. Boston: J. E. TILTON & CO.

This neat volume gives full instructions on the art of modelling wax flowers. It is copiously illustrated, and its clear and simple directions will enable persons of common ingenuity to master the process without additional aid.

MOORE'S IRISH MELODIES, as arranged by Sir John Stevenson and Sir Henry Bishop, by Oliver Ditson & Co., of Boston, in a very elegant form. For accuracy, elegance and arrangement this edition is unrivalled. Their edition of the popular operas now being performed in this country is considered as the standard one in the country, as it contains the original libretto, with an excellent translation. They now issue this form of music, both vocal and instrumental, original and selected, of a very high order.

PHOTOGRAPHS.—The photographs of the famous patriot-orator, Daniel Webster, Statuary, are some of the finest studies we have seen. We admire more especially that in which, with head bowed and disheveled hair, the noble woman is on her knees appealing to Gen. Hugo for the release of her seducer from hanging to shooting. Fortunately the rebel chief was prevented carrying out his murderous design by the advance of the Union troops, who rescued the heroic woman. This photograph is effective as a work of art, and reflects the greatest credit on Mr. E. M. Howell, the operator of the Negative Gallery. Mr. Howell is very assiduous and will present the lifelike look which Mr. Rowell's portraits almost invariably possess.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Conference now sitting in London to arrange the Danish difficulty has come to the conclusion of a compromise. Denmark will retain the Danish part of Schleswig-Holstein, while the German part will be left to the people, whose plebiscite will determine their fate. This decision will much reduce the actual kingdom of Hamlet, but, as the London Times very coolly observes, all that England wants is that the entrance to the Baltic shall remain in her hands. Both parties are dissatisfied with this decision, but Denmark is the weak to continue the unequal struggle, while the German Powers have been forced into acquiescence by the threat held over them by Bismarck, that if they do not agree King-land will offer an armed opposition to Prussia, and blame as her boundary.

Great interest is current in London that Garibaldi's visit to England was cut short by the necessity of getting him out of the country, for the downright love of England, who having conceived an overmastering passion for the brave widower, wanted to marry him. This aristocracy wishing to save its order the spectacle of such a misalliance, therefore persuaded him to leave the kingdom. The conduct of the duchess is not so much to be wondered at, since a British peeress of high degree has received nearly 2,000 volunteer offers of marriage from brave-loving ladies of all nations, but the reply has been: "My heart and hand are in the grave of Arta."

Whether the public mind is intent on the American and Mexican questions. The chances, however, of any recognition of the Southern Confederacy are very remote, since Earl Russell has put the rebel cause here de rather by pronouncing Gen. Lee the British Government. In every respect a better feeling towards the North is evinced in both countries, both people are watching the armies of Grant and Lee with the greatest anxiety.

The health of the Pope remains in a very precarious state, but although he is not known, as he reports, ever to set forth for state reasons, and to keep down the insurrection in the Italian people, he will be a long time master for unity.

The French papers accuse the Russian Cabinet of intriguing in the Danubian provinces, and a large Russian force is concentrated on the Pruth.

The cholera remains in its usual discontented state. The Spanish Government announce that their troops have quelled the rebellion to blow up the fortifications of Cortu, when they numbered 2,000 men, and Gen. Serrano is despatched to their aid as favouring a Government as the Spanish must not run the risk of having a strongpoint built by their constant foe.

The war in New Zealand is practically over.

In China the Taepings still urge their usual rebellion against the established order.

The Japanese and Europeans have come to an amicable understanding with the Tycoon and Mikado, against the insurrectionary Prince; but how long it will last none can tell, since the semi-civilised barbarian is the most uncertain of all men.

SOMETHING ABOUT BANKNOTES.

In a recent number of an English paper we find some interesting facts respecting the notes of the Bank of England. The paper on which the notes are printed is made by the hand in the Portal mill-yard firm. It is made in sheets 16 inches long by 5 inches wide, on each of which there are to be printed. The sheets are then cut in two, when each note has three rough edges and one smooth one. The peculiar quality of the paper has been found the best preventive against counterfeiting. The engraving of the notes has been imitated, but the imitations lack the genuine by the detection that was taken a few months ago had to be sent by the Bank of England to the Bank of Ireland, and that the bank with a record of every note issued. Every note presented at the bank for payment is marked off these ledgers on the day following, the date of payment being stamped on the note and in the ledger. The paper which a note chance to be passed it would be detected the next day in passing the desk.

About 21,000 notes are presented daily for payment. They are examined by tearing off the corner and punching, and then laid away in boxes, to be kept 10 years. At the end of that time the notes are destroyed, by furnishing the number, date and amount, it can be produced in duplicates. Once a week the paper which have completed their 10 years of rest are taken out and burnt.

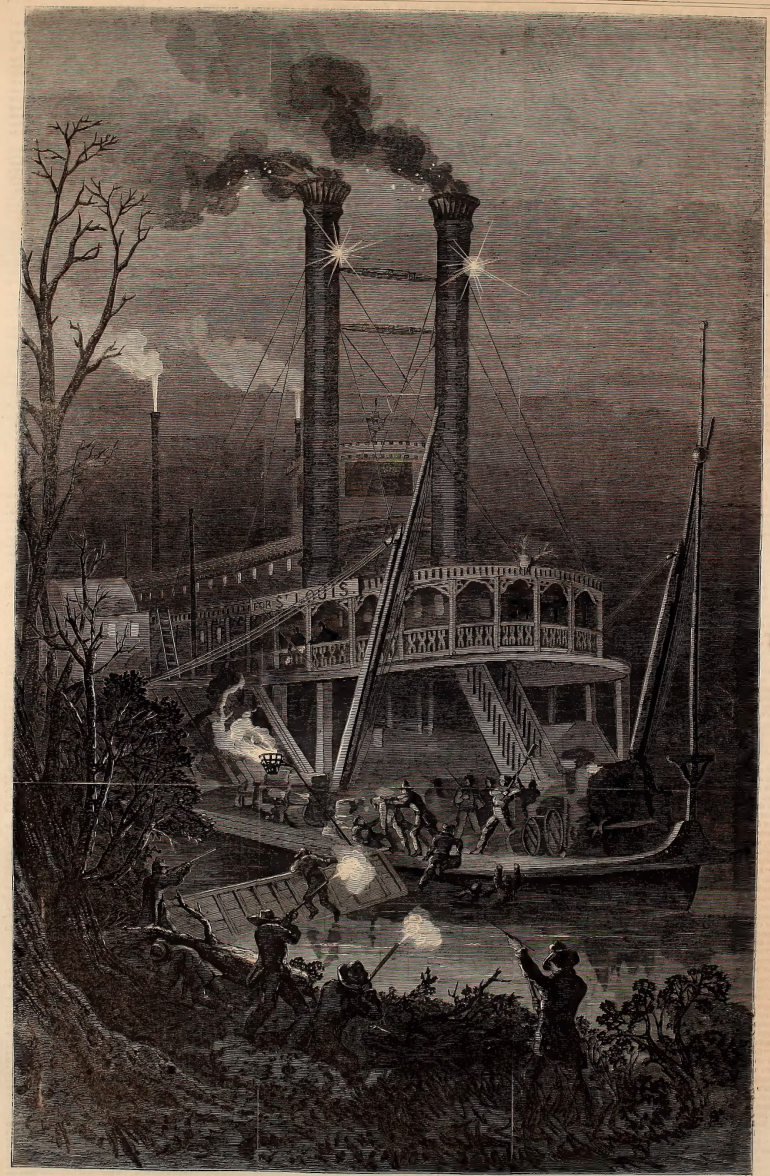
Banknotes are subject to many mishaps; they are burled, burned, washed by mistake, and lost.

Not many years since a laborer, in taking down a lodgeroom came across a small box buried in the soil. Upon examining the contents they were found to be banknotes, the property of a robbery which had occurred so long previous as to be almost forgotten. It is supposed that the box, being discovered by officers of the law, hid the box where it was found, and were perhaps hurried off for some other emergency, and so their secret died with them.

It is not an uncommon occurrence for notes to be thrown into the fire along with waste paper and burned. They are sometimes, too, used as lights, as shades, &c, etc.

Notes have been blown into a river, and although the song has it:

> For a guinea it will sink,
> But a one pound note will float,



five pound notes will not.

Notes sometimes are left in pockets and washed into a complete wad. But the bank will redeem them, provided they contain as much legible data as is possible to identify them.

A rural lord of a grazier who, having returned from market, was counting his money. The wind took one of the notes out of the window, and it was swallowed by a pet lamb. The animal was killed by the butcher, and the note found in the stomach. It was in a very much mutilated condition, and it was of course quite discolored, but being all there, the grazier got his money.

When a note is irrecoverably lost, the usual practice is—if the note be under £100—to make the loser wait five years, after which time application for payment will be entertained. But with notes of £100 and upwards, a sum which is not considered lost by persons in trade, the name of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England for twenty years. During this time, the dividends, as they accrue, are paid to the loser, and at the end of the term the stock is transferred into his name.

AN ARTIFICIAL TONGUE.—A French surgeon describes how he removed from a patient the whole of a tongue affected with cancer, by means of what he terms emboitures en étoiles. He perforated the tongue with a number of fine cauterising arrows (fleches), so as to cause all the affected portion to slough off in one mass. His patient, after the removal of the tongue, could neither swallow nor speak, but performed both these functions after being supplied with a quite-perfect tongue of her natural size.

THE EGG A MINIATURE UNIVERSE.

THE following remarkable passage occurs in Professor Agassiz' Methods of Study of Natural History:

"One can hardly conceive the beauty of the egg as seen through the microscope at this period of its growth, when the whole yolk is divided, with the dark granules on one side; while the other side, where the transparent halo of the vesicle is seen, is brilliant with light. With the growth of the egg these granules enlarge, become more distinct, and under the microscope some of them appear to be hollow. They are not round in form, but rather irregular, and under the effect of light they are exceedingly brilliant. Presently, instead of being scattered equally over the space they occupy, they form clusters—constellations as it were—and between these clusters are clear spaces, produced by the separation of the albumen from the oil. At this period of its growth there is wonderful resemblance between the appearance of the egg, as seen under the microscope, and the firmament with the celestial bodies. The little cluster of constellations are equally divided. Here and there they are two and two like double stars, or sometimes in threes or fives, or in sevens, recalling the Pleiades; and the clear albuminous tracts between are like the empty spaces separating the stars. This is simply true tha such is the actual appearance of the yolk at this time; and the idea cannot but suggest itself to the mind, that the thoughts which have been embodied in the universe are recalled here within the little egg, presenting a miniature diagram of the firmament. This is one of the first changes of the yolk, ending by forming regular clusters, with a sort of network of albumen between, and then this phase of the growth is complete."

TERRIBLE ACCIDENT ON THE HUDSON—THE BURNING OF THE BERKSHIRE ON THE RIGHT OF THE 8TH OF JUNE.

THE CUERILLAS ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

THE defeat of the ill-advised expedition of Gen. Banks up the Red river has let loose the large rebel force which the danger had enabled the Confederate authorities to collect, and the predatory movements of the Southern Arabs on the floating caravans of the West. At Lebanon was captured and burned by part of Marmaduke's forces, the crew and passengers being all carried off as prisoners.

They are even so bold as to disregard the gunboats which patrol the waterways. The Mississippi, though occupied by the Monarch and R. C. Adams, of the Marine Brigade, was attacked by a part of Marmaduke's command stationed at Columbia, Ark., and completely riddled.

Our relation of the capture of the other vessel will show that the dangers of travel, which seem to thicken on every hand, can still be augmented by the horrors of war.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

THE following piece of elegant poetry, written by an Arkansas editor shortly after being married, shows what is the duties of the institution:

There is not in this wide world a happier life
Than to sit by the sidewiggle and tickle your wife;
Taste the sweets of her lips in a moment of glee,
And twist the cat's tail as she jumps on her knee.

"YOU always lose your temper in my company," said an individual of doubtful reputation to a gentleman.

"True, sir; and I should not wonder if I lost everything I have about me."

SOME of our friends in the army write us rather tough stories. For instance, we are assured that Harry ——, of the —— Massachusetts battery, recently saw a rebel general officer and three of his staff on a promontory about a mile distant. Harry immediately sighted a piece and took off four legs, one each, from the rebel colonel. This is tough.

EQUIVOCAL verses gained great favor in the days of vindictive political and religious quarrels. Verses contrived so as to express two different meanings, according as they are read downwards or across. In the following lines were run in, there are many who might be decoy'd by the first reading:

I love with all my heart The Tory party here
The Election part And hateful do appear
And for the settlement I ever have denied
My sentence gives con- To be an Jones's aide
Most righteous in the cause To fight for such a king
To fight for George's rule With England's ruin bring
It is my wish and heart In this right hand
Though none will take my part Received to live and die.

Und likes to flirt and tribe,
I do not vant to come too close,
To dat ugly Minnie Ribe.

I thinks I am not made to be
Val vimin calls a "hero,"
For ven dey sides of blut and wounds
My blut it turns to zero.
In de "Home-Guard," ver ish no fights
I likes it best to stay,
Mitout de rebels come up North,
Und den—I runs away!

A Story of the Yazoo Valley.

BARNABY, THE SANDHILLER;

OR,

THE PLANTER'S RUSE.

BY DR. J. H. ROBINSON.

ILLUSTRATIONS BY DARLEY.

Price 25 Cents.

This story, from the fertile pen of that world-famous portrayer of American character, Dr. J. H. Robinson, is now issued complete in one volume. The scenes are novel and startling, and unlike the hackneyed and vapid contributions to the literature of the war. "Barnaby" increases in interest as the deeply-laid plot develops.

Mailed free of postage on receipt of price.

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

THE COMPLAINTS OF THE SEASON.—"Take care of the Pounds, and the Shillings will take care of themselves," says the old adage. Take care of the stomach and ills immediate tendencies, and the rest of the system will, as a general thing, take care of itself. At this season what we all want is vigor—a replacement of vital force that have been lost during the winter months, and must be obtained through the stomach, the great controlling organ, which communicates every thrill and sensation of the body sympathies. No other medicine in the world has been tested so severely and so satisfactorily as HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS. In fact, it is the only preparation that will cure with entire certainty all forms of indigestion. The proprietors can say this without being charged with egotism, for the statement has been made over the signature of some of the most eminent men in this country, who have seen fit to allow their names to be used in the public prints for the purpose of authenticating a great fact, important to every one who suffers from indigestion, Liver Complaint or Disorder of the Bowels.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

Literary Agency, Established in 1842.

The subscriber has, for more than 20 years past, been in the habit of reading and preparing manuscripts for the Press. At first the labor was one of kindness, and performed gratuitously. But it became a burdensome, and absorbed so much time, that a small charge in the nature of a pecuniary fee became necessary. This fee, not exceeding $25, and generally less, compensated him for the careful and critical perusal of a work in manuscript, and the offering of it, if approved, to publishers.

The subscriber continues to receive and read manuscripts in the same way, giving his candid opinion concerning them, and arranging for their printing and publication, when desired to do so. He makes his charges as small as possible, since his chief object is to aid and benefit authors.

In all cases letters of advice should be forwarded by mail, while manuscripts are sent, prepaid, either through the Post Office or by express, lightly addressed,

Gen. Grant on the South Side of Richmond.

In the transfer of the Army of the Potomac from the pestilential swamps of the Chickahominy on the north to the south side of Richmond, Gen. Grant has executed another of those masterly flank movements for which he has become so pre-eminently distinguished. The immense labors required, the difficulties overcome, and the dangers avoided in carrying out this enterprise, may be inferred from Gen. Grant's brief but comprehensive report of the movement. He says: "Our forces drew out from within 50 yards of the enemy's entrenchments at Cold Harbor (north side of the Chickahominy), made a flank movement of about 55 miles march (a vast army, with all its artillery and trains), crossing (by pontoon bridges) the Chickahominy and James rivers —the latter 2,000 feet wide and 84 feet deep at the point of crossing, and surprised the enemy's rear at Petersburg. This was done without the loss of a wagon or piece of artillery, and only about 150 stragglers were picked up by the enemy."

This is, indeed, a difficult, delicate and hazardous flank movement, most admirably accomplished. Had not Gen. Lee, from his rough experience in this campaign from "the Wilderness" to the defences of Richmond, been too severely crippled to justify the venture, he would surely have seized the opportunity for harassing at every step, front, flank and rear, this side movement of his fearless adversary; for we know, from the Richmond journals, that although Lee, in the outset, was completely outwitted, he yet discovered the withdrawal of our forces from his immediate front in season to march out, intercept them, and bring them to a battle, or another series of battles, had he not felt himself too seriously cut up to attempt it. In fact, as a graphic war correspondent accompanying our great Western army in Georgia says of Gen. Sherman, "we may say of Gen. Grant: that from the first dislodgment of his adversary to the present day 'he has played around him as a cooper plays around a cask,' and still tightening his coils around him with every blow.

"RUN BACK, JOHNNIES—RUN BACK, YANKS."

"Out jump the fellows from the rifle-pits, and putting down their guns stretch their cramped limbs upon the grass. Sharpshooters covertly slide down from their perches in the trees and loll about in utter abandon. Trade is quickly opened, and all sorts of commodities are exchanged."—Correspondent of the N. Y. Tower.

THE LULL IN THE STORM.—SEE PAGE 381.

But the exacting reader will naturally inquire what has Gen. Grant gained by this last brilliant operation? Is he not further from Richmond at Petersburg, on the south side of the city and the James river, than he was at Cold Harbor, on the north side? Is not the rebel capital, with the broad river in front, better defended on the south than on the north side? It is not possible, too, that, situated as Gen. Lee now is, between our army and Washington, he may repeat his aggressive programme of 1862, leaving Richmond to the chances of capture, or absolutely abandoning it to secure the prize of our national capital?

We answer: First, Gen. Grant, in moving his army to the south side of Richmond, has transferred it from the deadly malaria of the Chickahominy — a great point gained — to a healthy position; he has secured the broad and and navigable James river as his base of supplies; he has secured the junction of Gen. Meade's grand army with the fine army of Gen. Butler; he has secured the active co-operation of Admiral Lee's powerful squadron of ironclads and gunboats; and, above all, he has secured a position from which he can readily and effectually cut off the rebel capital from every variety of subsistence through which the city is fed from North Carolina and Georgia. This movement against Richmond, in fact, very much resembles that splendid flank of last summer down the Mississippi, and around from the south to the rear of Vicksburg; and it covers the same design and the same overwhelming advantages of cutting off the city from its remaining sources of reinforcements and subsistence. Gen. Grant is now between Lee and Jo. Johnston, as he was last June between Pemberton and Johnston; and now, as then, he has each so completely tied up that neither can attempt to relieve the other without hazarding the ruin of both.

Such are the positive advantages gained by Gen. Grant in his new position. They are so comprehensive that the defences of Richmond, on every side, may be omitted from the estimate, inasmuch as those defences will amount to nothing the moment the city, with its defensive army, is cut off from its extensive subsistence. Dependent upon the scanty stores within the city's encircling earthworks, Richmond, with its population of say 20,000 souls, Lee's effective army of 75,000 men, and his sick and wounded soldiers to the number of perhaps 25,000 more, have to be fed. We think it will soon be made manifest that this is one of the fatal weakness of the rebel capital, and that Gen. Grant has thoroughly comprehended it from the beginning of this masterly campaign.

As for any apprehensions of another Southern venture by Gen. Lee, we think they will be dismissed by the intelligent reader upon the simple statement of the facts, that the railroads between Richmond and Washington have been so thoroughly broken up that it will require months of labor to repair them; that the country between the two cities has been completely eaten out by the two great armies of Meade and Lee, and that the supplies of the Shenandoah valley, left behind by Lee in his last instursion against western Maryland, have been disposed of from Martinsburg to Staunton, 150 miles, by Gen. Hunter. Furthermore, between Hunter, Averill, Crook, Pope and Sheridan, the region west of Lynchburgville and Lynchburg has now little or nothing to spare for the army of Lee.

To sum up the military situation at Richmond in a few words, Gen. Grant having stripped the country north and west of the city of its army supplies, having cut off its communications, it only remains for him to cut off and occupy the roads which run southward from the city, in order to bring out Lee into the open field, in which he will be beaten, or to compel him to abandon the city, and by starvation in order to save his army. Remembering Vicksburg, we still look towards Richmond for another glorious addition to the honors of the Fourth of July.

THE travelling public need scarcely be reminded of the great advantages of the People's Line of Steamboats between New York and Albany. To those with whom speed, with its discomforts, is not so vita lly important, the sail up or down the Hudson on the St. John or Hendrick Hudson has attractions that outweigh the short additional period of time required. It is one of the best managed lines in the country, and none that have ever had business transactions with the gentlemanly agent, Mr. T. C. Smith, can fail to appreciate either that gentleman or the line of which he is the agent in New York.

PERRY DAVIS'S
VEGETABLE PAIN KILLER!

THE UNIVERSAL REMEDY
FOR INTERNAL AND EXTERNAL COMPLAINTS!

At the period there are but few of the human race unacquainted with the merits of the Pain Killer, but while some exist it as a liniment, they know but little of its power in easing pain when taken internally, while others use it internally with perfect success, but are equally ignorant of its healing virtues when applied externally. We therefore wish to say that this equally successful whether used internally or externally, and it stands alone, unrivalled by all the great remedies of Family Medicines, that its sale is universal and immense. The demand for it from India and other foreign countries is equal to the demand for it at home. It has become known in those far-off places by its merits—the proprietors have never advertised it or been at any expense in its introduction into foreign lands.

Summary of the Week

VIRGINIA.

Gen. Grant, after attempting to force the passage of the Chickahominy on the 3rd, and testing the strength of Lee's rebel army, has come to sit down and attempt a siege with the pestilential swamp of the Chickahominy between him. He is once more moved to compel the foe to come out and fight.

On Sunday, the 12th, the 18th army corps, under Gen. Smith, marched to White House and embarked. Wright's and Burnside's corps crossed the Chickahominy at Jones's bridge, and marched to the James river by Charles City Court House and Warren's corps crossed at Long bridge, and marched to Wilcox's. The whole army was thus in the great celery field between the rivers, on the James, and thrown over at Powhatan point. The enemy had not anticipated the movement. Lee's army was still massed around old Malvern hill on the 15th, and made no effort to molest.

On the 15th Smith pushed on, and Hinks's negro brigade carried and held Malvern hill, Petersburg without waiting for Brooke's division.

On Thursday, the 16th, Barlow's division of Hancock's 2d corps and Gibbon's 2d div. 9th corps moved to attack the rebel lines, but Burnside was himself assaulted, and Barlow lost several hundred of his men before he could get his works. Griffin's brigade of the 9th corps, however, carried the lines before them, and the enemy under Longstreet's brigade carried other works. Barlow's colors were retaken and Potter's rebel brigade captured, with nine pieces of artillery.

This victory was not purchased without loss, and among our serious losses was Major formerly Brig.-Gen. Morton, Chief Engineer to Gen. Burnside.

On the 17th the rebels made a furious attack on the works held by the 1st Michigan sharpshooters, in which, though we took 240 prisoners, the enemy finally got within the works, which they held till morning.

On the 18th the 5th corps gained the railroad to Norfolk, but Griffin and Crawford failed to carry the rebel works.

On the 19th, at 4 A.M., Burnside carried the works before him on the left, taking 500 prisoners and six pieces of cannon.

WESTERN VIRGINIA.

Gen. Hunter destroyed over $3,000,000 worth of rebel property at Staunton, two large cloth factories, a boot and shoe factory and foundries.

An expedition to Waynesboro destroyed several railroad bridges and tore up the track.

KENTUCKY.

On the 13th Newcastle was occupied at sunset by a force of 200 rebels, under George Jessie. They were desperate characters, hastily collected, and began at once to commit outrages. The same day captured Bardstown on the 18th.

On the 19th, at 4 P.M., a force of 80 made a raid into Princeton in Caldwell county, but were attacked by 12 soldiers of the 35th Kentucky, and after losing two killed and several wounded fled.

The defeat of Morgan by Gen. Burbridge at Cynthiana on the 12th was absolute; his force was completely routed and Morgan, with a small party, pushed with all speed for Pound gap.

GEORGIA.

The rebel Wheeler, with his cavalry, has been cutting Sherman's railroad lines. At Calhoun they seized six cars of grain on the 10th, but retreated before Gen. Hovey, who was at Adairsville, could come up. They placed, however, a torpedo on the track towards Resaca, which exploded under the train, hurling the locomotive six feet from the track and tearing four cars into splinters. At night Wheeler returned and tore up part of the track.

On the 14th Gen. Polk was killed.

On the 15th Blair's corps stormed the enemy's works, and drove him back, and on the 18th Johnston drove back his flank and abandoned all his works in front of Kenesaw mountain, holding that mountain as the apex of his position, with his flanks behind Smyrna and Moses creeks.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The rebel Gen. Samuel Jones, commanding at Charleston, has placed five general officers, prisoners of war, in close confinement in that city. Gen. Hunter has transferred to Gen. Foster five rebel Generals to be similarly placed.

ARKANSAS.

Gen. Steele is at Little Rock, which is fortified. Col. Clayton holds Pine bluff with 7,000 men well entrenched. There is a force at Duvall's bluff. The rebels under Fagan are at Princeton, 45 miles from Pine bluff; another force is at Camden, and 3,000 at Washington. Marmaduke is on the Mississippi at Columbia, attacking the steamers.

On the 7th, Gen. A. J. Smith, with part of the 16th army corps, landed near Columbia, and Marmaduke retired.

CONGRESS.

In the Senate, on the 14th June, the greater part of the day was spent in discussing the new loyal State Government of Arkansas. The Consular system was agreed to. Various unimportant alterations in the Enrollment bill, which were laid over.

In the House, Mr. Stevens made a report from the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing amendments to the Military Appropriation bill; carried by 90 to 58. The Senate bill was then taken up, and Mr. Schenck introduced a bill repealing the $300 clause, and providing that hereafter no payment of money shall be accepted as a release from the performance of military duty. Mr. Gerfield introduced a joint resolution that no State declared to be a rebellion by the President is entitled to appoint electors of President and Vice President, and that no vote cast from any such State shall be received or counted until both Houses of Congress by concurrent action, shall have recognized the Government in such State. Laid on the table—yeas, 104; nays, 33. The Bounty bill took up, the consideration of Mr. Latham, offered Monday of last week, proposing a suspension of hostilities, and for the appointment of a Board of Commissioners for assembling a Convention of delegates from all the States, to adjust all difficulties between the North and the South on the basis of the Constitution. The House refused to allow a vote of yeas and nays on rules for the introduction of the resolution. The House then proceeded to the consideration of the House bill to repeal the Prize-Money law. After some debate the bill was laid over.

In the Senate, on the 14th, Mr. McDougall proposed a resolution declaring the cessation of monarchies on this Continent, but objection being made to its present consideration it was laid over. The Bounty bill was ordered to be printed.

In the House, the bill to prevent speculation in gold was passed, after an amendment which will necessitate the return to the Senate for concurrence.

In the Senate, on the 15th, Mr. Powell's bill to prevent military interference in elections was defeated by 20 to 8. Various bills of private interest were passed.

In the House, the entire day session was taken up with the consideration of the Senate joint resolution to amend the Constitution abolishing slavery and making for ever prohibitory slavery throughout the country. After a long discussion, and to be undone by various motions, the question was put on its decision, when it was voted for—yeas 93, and against 65. It thus fell 11 yeas short of the two-thirds necessary for its adoption. Subsequently it was carried at one time of calling the yeas and nays on this question, and the vote was the largest one that has been taken. Mr. Wilson, of Odell, of Brooklyn, is the only Democrat who voted for the amendment. Mr. Ashley, of Ohio, who originally gave notice that he would move a reconsideration of the vote, and the matter will probably be postponed till next session. In the evening the Senate's amendments to the Internal Revenue bill were discussed, and most of them agreed to.

In the Senate, on the 16th, the time was occupied by discussing the Tariff bill.

In the House, the consideration of the Senate amendments to the Internal Revenue bill was continued from the previous day, and all the remaining ones were acted on, the session being prolonged till 11 o'clock at night. The amendment adding salt to the tax on whiskey and hand was agreed to by 73 against 62. That striking out the duty of five per cent. on the proceeds of gold and silver mining was also agreed to. A number of other Senate amendments were concurred in, and a committee was ordered to confer on the disagreeing amendments.

In the Senate, on the 17th, the bill for the speedy punishment of guerillas was taken up by Mr. Wilson. Mr. Davis opposed it. The Tariff bill was then proceeded with, and several amendments made.

In the House, there was no business of importance transacted.

In the Senate, on the 18th, the Northern Pacific Railroad bill was reported by Mr. Harlan. The joint resolution declaring the Arkansas Government a republican was passed. The bill to encourage and facilitate telegraphic communication between the Eastern and Western Continents was taken up and vigorously discussed during the remainder of the session. No conclusion was reached, however.

In the House, a bill was reported by Mr. Alley establishing the seat of government of the District of Columbia, appointing a commission to settle claims for war losses in the District, and was passed. A bill was also passed chartering another street railroad in Washington, from which the present line will be excluded on each side. The bill giving substituted rank to the warrant officers of the navy was also passed. The joint resolution giving relief to Capt. Jefferson, by taking the contract off his hands for building the Monitors, was passed. The House refused to concur in the Senate's amendment to the joint resolution that the President be authorized to invite to the Government of Great Britain that it is the wish and intention of the Government at the close of the present rebellion to liberally accommodate all of 1817 in respect to a naval force on the lakes at the end of six months. The question of the site for the new navy-yard was postponed until the next session of Congress.

TOWN COSSIP.

STRAWBERRIES! The glorious, golden, royal-purple fruit is with us. Strawberries, the first yield of the woods and fields to the hands craving for relief from the monotony of winter's food. Strawberries, the very epitome of gossip, and yet so seldom the theme of the poet's song. Not the deep blushing rose so modestly veiled in its sea-green leaves, so quietly awaiting to be plucked and borne, perfuming with its spicy juices of its life, to the eager lips of a thousand lovers?

Strawberries! but we will come down from the stilts and dismount from the scientific. Without pretending in the advent of the strawberry to city people that the dews of the country can be bottled up for the first real palatable promise they have of the coming summer. The dweller in the country, whose mind is daily preoccupied for this fact by the springing of the grass and wayside flowers, and the bursting buds of the trees, is not so startled into a new life by the ripening of the little berry. They hail it only as the first fruit of spring, and, if their patch be large, are more or less indifferent to its yield, and the anxiety only is for what the coming fruit will fetch which made up into homecooked preserves, and duly delivered at the Thanksgiving market. For the benefit of these we offer the opinion, or rather the fact, that this season the coveted fruit is both poor and dear. The weight of the year's crop has been wrecked little hastes, rarely holding over a gill, from cents to the common ordering, bringing the luxury to the modest price of about 75 cents a quart. So far the season has been against them, the weather lacking that hard-working sun them love and ripen for us. A hot, sunshiny days will not only double the supply, but will no doubt improve the flavor that the strawberry lover's mouth cannot do less than water at the mere anticipation.

While these strawberries we must tell that every year, at the office of the Agriculturist in Park Row, an exhibition is held of the fruits which farmers, market gardeners and cultivators their choicest varieties. As the gatherings of this display do not take much room in comparison to the size in which the annual experiences goes, they invite the editorial corps to eat of the gorgeous assortment and speak in the press their views. Many hundreds know of the annual show, where thousands might. It is past for this year, and the best of the fruit is over; but we may say there strawberries that would have made the fabled feat of making two bites of a cherry look for shame. We say there, also, two or three, but plaintiff of the fruit, the smallest of which was larger than a pigeon's egg, and the largest, equal to, or fact, any other pears, which is that the dog days leaving Newcomen, the Mayor has a proclamation together in the innocents, and has even curl-dressed. Herod by beginning like the Nile, and ending like a mountain, during the blood, money to be 50 cents per head, and Washington to be 50. Now, only think of it, any country war he made so to operate that it would take off old Newcomen's head and leave it to the tender mercies, about the corners from Canal street to 8th, on Broadway, or to the poverty and sadness of Bowery. Jeval every lady that passes, we would willingly disburse a dollar apiece for the unmentionables, and have to sacrifice the job. If these cars cannot be disposed of in the same way by a sale of part to some two, then we create a rope, the pound, 50 cents and the drowning vat.

Still, as a sequence of Newcomen's death be that the coming week recruiting reconnoissens in New York, and the official and fashionable circles, the latest shows of the draft by anything for men with a $300 last, while the attempted raid of the Confederates on the city of Portland, which they have she could keep 500 of her men, having crept into the city, and then, by a ruse, effectively effected the escape of the whole party, and that without losing sermon, answered that she did not propose to let them have the men, and that if they tried at them so often that they now do not intend to do so. Now, we are unfortunate enough to have—being somewhat behind the scenes—we have the whole proposition perfected and ready to be finished almost as soon as the paper is in the hands of the public, and that is that there will be no draft in this city on it, and that in default of the men and recruiting, the Government may spite of all threats, and the result that the rebels' city of the land will be drafted for 500 men, and 500 to not be drafted should produce but $300, let us double it, let us do it, and then we shall have not only saved the city, but somethings to the Provost-Marshal come and smash us awake. Meanwhile, the draft of 500 men is going on, and Washington and on street corners: all men who cannot live happy and quiet at home; all whose imaginations have developed a change of diet and scene; and all, who, in short, have a little money to spare, are invited good to the community in which they live. From the last class above the army might be raised two full regiments.

One of the most miserable exposures ever made in connection with the villainies of the city has received an airing during the past week, in the account of doings perpetrated by the trustees of the Fourth Ward School. These men, whose names we shall assist in handing down to infamy, are Jeremiah Coughlin, James White, Daniel Insley, John H. Lester, Charles Kelly and Felix Murphy, who have been tried and found guilty of the meanest system of robbery ever perpetuated upon earth. These men, elected by the people as the guardians of their children, have been convicted of cuabbling Sergeant, making White their manager, and appropriating from the miserable pittance allowed the teachers from 20 to 40 per cent., as the price of their situations. No question was made as to the ability of the victim to fill his or her position, no examination to know whether they were capable of being placed in authority over the scholars, but only a response from them whether they were willing to pay the black-mail; if not, there was the alternative—go! The father who struggled to support a large family on a salary of $900 was obliged to pay $300 of it to these bloodhounds. A poor, deformed girl, who had, somehow, without possessing beauty as a lure, got into a $300 teachership, was obliged to give up $75 of the pittance, as bribe money, that she might be allowed to live!

And yet these men are suffered to go out and mix among the people, with no other punishment than a loss of their places! Certainly virtue is its own reward!

Among the incidents of the week was a mass meeting, at Union Square, of the Early Closing Association, a combination of clerks and workmen in stores to obtain more time from their employers, by forcing them to close the stores at an early hour in the evening. We should be glad to see such a movement successful, not because we have any faith that those emancipated from labor would use the time for improvement, but simply because we believe in shortening the hours of labor as much as possible, and giving to the laborer all the recreation that is consistent with the obtainment of a living; but at the same time we hazard a doubt of the success of any movement of this kind that is not based on first principles. The trouble among the clerks is that there is more labor than there is demand, and so long as this exists so long will employers have it in their power to dictate how many hours they shall labor, and at what price. There is but one cure for a trouble like this, which is for 50 per cent. of the said clerks to shoulder the musket and march forth, or if they have a constitutional distaste to this mode, let them withdraw into other channels of employment and so relieve the overburdened branch.

The fact is, the public have but little sympathy with the movement, for the reason that they have little sympathy with the movers. A drygoods clerk, or a clerk in any department of labor where a woman might be employed, is looked upon with unfavorable eyes, and we cannot help thinking that, as long as his ambition goes no further than usurping a woman's labor, he deserves to suffer, not only by long hours but by short pay.

The week has been one of little sensation in the dramatic line. All has been lovely and serene, but nothing startling. No new play produced, no addition to the old ones, and we verily fear, as a seeker after sensations, that we shall have no better report to make for weeks to come.

The Olympic is still running "Aladdin," and as far as judgment can be rendered on the nightly crowds, will continue to run it for a month to come. Certainly, New York will be many years older before she will see again such gorgeous scenery and costuming. There is but one thing that should have been done, which is a re-writing of the piece, and the introduction of some light matter that would have cast original interest about it. We do not mean to make a burlesque of it, nor yet to detract from the working beauty, but something might be done with the dialogue that would make it far more acceptable to present day taste.

We are glad that the management of this house, possibly acting on the suggestion we gave a few weeks since, has placed this notice at the head of its programmes:

"The haste manifested by many of the audience to leave the theatre immediately preceding the termination of the performance, renders the conclusion perfectly inaudible to others desirous of hearing and understanding it, and Mrs. John Wood feels confident that her wish, that all will retain their seats till the fall of the curtain, will meet with consideration."

This notice is good, and we are glad to see that it had some effect, but a universal adoption of our suggestion that the doors be closed five minutes before conclusion, and no one suffered to pass out, is the only plan. Will not Mrs. Wood assert her prerogative and enforce it?

On Friday night we dropped into Wallack's to see "Ernestine" and a "Pretty Piece of Business," and were pleased to hear a very clever hit from Mr. Floyd on this point. A few moments before the conclusion of the last piece the audience, as usual, started to its feet for a race out. It was part of Mr. Fisher's final speech to say, "I have something to tell you," when Floyd interpolated, "Go on then and say it, don't you see how patiently the audience is waiting?" The people were appreciative, but it did not stay them in their flight, or cause them to push or squeeze a bit less in getting out.

Niblo's will run "Bel Demonio" for three weeks longer, and then Lucille Western tries her fortunes at this house. The Florences close their engagement at Winter Garden on Saturday, and on Monday Dolly Davenport took a benefit, offering, among other attractions, Heller, who juggled away the seven senses of the audience, and left them crying for more. At his own place Heller has been more than successful, and certainly he deserves it. Among the numerous professors of his art, who have tried their fortunes in New York, he is, without question, the greatest, to say nothing of his pleasant way on the stage, his witty and humorous allusions, and his really superb playing on the pianoforte.

Barnum is still doing the patriotic with Major Pauline Cushman, and has no reason to complain of the public response. Mdlle. Ernestine has fastened firmly on the affections of the Barnum-o-nians, and deserves their favor, for with the exception of Annetti Galletti, who is dancing in "Aladdin" at the Olympic, she is the best danseuse on the American stage.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The Grand Jury have been instructed by the City Judge to co-operate with Mr. Oakey Hall, the District Attorney, and see what judicial action ought to be taken against the parties who seized the World and Journal of Commerce, for publishing the bogus proclamation.

—— The Hoboken ferryboat to Canal street, N. Y. has been discontinued, in consequence of some disagreement with the New York Aldermen about the piers. The Genghis Khan arrogance with which that branch of the Hapsburg family, known as the Stevens, treat their unfortunate serfs, the Hobokenese, is the wonder of the 19th century.

—— The Irish papers speak of the emigration to America as partaking more of a panic than deliberate choice. From the small port of Sligo alone nearly three thousand persons have sailed in five weeks for the United States.

—— There was a ratification meeting of the Lincoln and Johnson Baltimore nomination at the Cooper Institute on the evening of the 15th of June.

—— A Chicago jury lately awarded $10,000 to a man who had a large quantity of cotton burned while it was passing over the Illinois Central railroad.

—— The peach crop of New Jersey will be far above the average this year. The yield promises to be larger than for many years past. Berries of all kinds will also be abundant.

—— Inspector Boole invited several reporters to inspect the state of the roads on the 17th of June. They were handsomely entertained, and everything went off well.

—— The anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill was observed on the 17th of June, to a limited extent, down East. That battle was a miserable skirmish, if measured by the doings of to-day; yet Carlyle said of it: "On Bunker Hill Democracy was announcing in rifle volleys death-winged, under her Star banner, to the tune of Yankee-doodle-doo, that she is born, and whirlwind like, will envelope the whole world."

—— A large outdoor meeting was held in Union square on the 16th of June, to advocate the early closing movement. It was addressed by Dr. Cheever, Greeley, Parson Beecher and other eminent men.

—— The old issues of fractional currency are being mutilated by dishonest parties, who peel off the figures and neatly paste them on the $1 and $2 notes. Some of the latter have thus been altered to $50. The United States Treasury does not redeem fractional currency thus mutilated.

—— The Supreme Court, general term, affirmed the decision of Judge Barnard, legalizing the appointment of the new Tax Commissioners, so that the old board may now be set down as fairly defunct. There is no resort now for Messrs. Brown and Williamson short of the Court of Appeals; but it is not at all likely that the matter will ever reach Albany. The question may be considered as finally disposed of.

—— Philip Tieman, of Cincinnati, has again challenged Kavanagh to play for the championship of American billiards. The challenge has been regularly made and the deposit placed in the hands of Messrs. Phelan & Collender. Mr. Kavanagh has signified his readiness to play any time in September next, that a suitable hall can be provided.

Southern.—The Petersburg Express of the 13th of June, just after Gen. Gillmore's abortive attack on Petersburg, thus grandiloquently praises Gov. Wise: "Gen. Wise has ever been for defending the city of Petersburg. His brigade has lost 400 men in the fights around the town. When placed in command here, he proclaimed he would hold the place or fall with it. His defence on the 9th proves him to be as good as his word. The hero of Charleston will stand by him, so let none fear. We'll trust in God and fight." Recent events make this somewhat farcical.

Military.—The Army Appropriation bill, which is now a law, equalises the pay, rations, etc., of all troops, whether colored or white, except in the matter of bounty. On this point, it says that every person of color who shall hereafter be mustered into the service, shall receive such sums in bounty as the President shall order in the different States, and parts of the United States, not exceeding $100.

—— The 16th New York Volunteer artillery, commanded by Col. J. J. Morrison, headquarters at Yorktown, Va., is the largest regiment ever recruited in the United States, and has men in the following places: At Yorktown, 1,140; at Williamsburg, 735; at Gloucester Point, 147; at Bermuda Hundred, 270; putting up telegraph, 50; with 148th New York volunteers, 46; with 1st New York mounted rifles, 272, transferred; with 85th New York volunteers, 45; with light batteries United States artillery, 22; with army of the Potomac, 201, transferred; making a total of 2,928 men and 53 officers.

Personal.—The Rev. Sella Martin, a colored person, and formerly a slave, gave an interesting account of his experiences in England. He was very severe on the aristocracy, but said the people were in favor of the North. Among the remarkable circumstances connected with his history is the fact, that his preaching converted his former owner. He is a very fluent speaker, and his discourse was listened to by a large audience with marked attention.

—— Charles G. Leland is said to be preparing a volume on the "derivation and history of American slang phrases."

—— Señora de Avellaneda, a Cuban poetess of celebrity, is at present in this city. She has won a distinguished name in cotemporary Spanish literature by her lyric and dramatic poetry, and by her romances, especially the historical one "Guautemotzin," the heroic defender of Mexican Independence against Hernando Cortes.

—— Edmond About, the well-known French writer, has just been married to Mdlle. de Guillerville, a Normandy heiress, at the Chateau de Roucheralles, near Rouen.

—— Richard Wallach has been re-elected Mayor of Washington, by 971 majority. All the successful candidates profess to be Union men, of course.

—— A dispatch to the Cincinnati Commercial from Dayton says: "That in response to a serenade, Mr. Vallandigham said he didn't believe that there would be any attempt to arrest him, but should there be such a thing intimated he and his friends are prepared for such an emergency."

—— Mr. Charles Holt, formerly of the Janesville (Wis.) Gazette, has become associated with Mr. Landon in the publication of the Quincy Whig and Republican. Mr. Richardson, late editor of the Whig, continues his connection with the paper.

Obituary.—The notorious Bishop, Gen. Leondas Polk, who has just been killed in one of the Georgia battles, was a West Point student. He graduated in 1827, and was ordained a clergyman in 1831, and in 1838 was made bishop of a diocese which consisted of Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. At the commencement of the rebellion he accepted a commission from Jeff Davis, and has been an active rebel. His career as a General was very unlucky.

—— Major Wilson Hubbell, 62d regiment, N. Y. V., (Anderson Zouaves), who was killed at Coal Harbor, was born in Bridgeport, Conn. He was with the army of the Potomac in all their battles, and was a brave soldier and good man.

—— W. B. Leonard, who may be called the pioneer cotton manufacturer in this country, died a few days since of heart disease. The foundations of his first mill, located in Plymouth, Mass., he dug with his own hands. This mill was destroyed by the British during the war of 1812. In 1817 Mr. Leonard removed to Matteawan, and it was owing in a great measure to his untiring energy and great executive ability that the immense cotton manufactures and machine shops of the Matteawan Company expanded from a small beginning to one of the largest interests of the kind in the State. During the 34 years he acted as agent of this company, it continued to pour its wealth in the form of large dividends into the pockets of its proprietors. Of the company, which was composed of some of the ablest and most influential merchants of New York, such as Gardner and Samuel Howland, Philip Hone, John Jacob Astor, etc., not one now survives. Mr. Leonard was the first to introduce into the factories of this country the self-acting mules; was the inventor of the first broadcloth looms; and to his inventive genius the cotton manufactories are indebted for many of their most perfect labor-saving machines. At length, retiring from active business, he returned to the city, and was for many years the agent of the American Institute. Those who remember the brilliant fairs of the Institute, at the Crystal Palace, will remember the courtesy and energy of the moving spirit, who was never weary in working for the development of American industry and genius.

—— Another of the strong men of Secessia is dead. Thomas Butler King, of Georgia, whose name is familiar to all who have known anything of the political history of the country for the last 30 years. Mr. King was one of the most active of the leaders of the Secession movement in his State. He was in Congress several years between 1839 and 1849.

—— The Northamptonshire peasant poet, John Clare, died on the 20th ult., in the Northampton Lunatic Asylum, and was buried in his native village on the 24th. He leaves behind him a wife and several children, and we understand that a collected edition of his poems will shortly be published for the benefit of his family.

—— Mr. Charles Sealsfield, the American author and popular novel writer, died at an advanced age on the 26th of May, at Solothurn, in Switzerland. Sealsfield, whose works are written in German, was for a certain time, in his branch, the "Great Unknown" of German literature, owing to the mystery with which he knew how to surround the authorship of his books. He had made himself a fortune with his pen, and had settled for about 20 years in Switzerland.

—— "The death of the Marquise de Barolo, of this place," says a letter from Turin, "has revived an incident of interest to the literary world. In the house of this lady, Silvio Pellico passed the last 20 years of his life, and at his death left several unpublished writings in her possession. The heirs of Silvio Pellico claimed these works in order to publish them, though without success, but M. Briano, a friend of the author, being now provided with a regular authorization, is preparing to establish the rights of the family."

Accidents and Offences.—A mutiny occurred on the 13th June on board the Emily Augusta, Strickland, while proceeding to sea. The captain was stabbed and the mate knocked down and beaten. A boat's crew from the Revenue Cutter off Quarantine boarded the ship and took the crew into custody. Capt. Strickland is dangerously wounded.

—— Mrs. Miller, the wife of a most respectable man, cut the throats of her two children and then her own, at Fishkill landing, on the 13th instant. Insanity the cause.

—— In Pittsburg, the other day, a little boy, about six years old, becoming enraged at a playmate, his junior by two years, actually punched his eye out with a rusty nail, and, not content with this, the young demon was deliberately proceeding to put out the other eye, when the little victim's screams brought assistance. A warrant was issued for the arrest of the offender, but his parents spirited him off to the country before the officers had time to secure him.

—— Lloyd W. Daniels, a rebel soldier, who violated his parole and joined the rebel army, has been caught, convicted and sentenced to the Penitentiary in Albany for three years.

—— An explosion happened on the 17th June in the Government arsenal at Washington. There were nearly 1,000 workpeople in the building at the time; it is supposed that over 20 were killed.

Foreign.—The Independence Belge, speculating on the chances of Napoleon's son, now nine years of age, ever coming to the throne, recalls the remarkable historical fact that since Louis XIV. succeeded to the crown in 1643, a period of 220 years, no son of any French monarch has succeeded to the throne. Napoleon will not thank the journalist for the unpleasant reminder.

—— On Monday, May 30, Louis Philippe Albert d'Orleans, Comte de Paris, the eldest hope of the Orleans family, was married to his first cousin, the Princess Isabelle of Spain, in the presence of a most illustrious company, including not only English nobility and foreign ambassadors, but many of the representatives of the old historic names of France, who still adhere in loyalty and hope to the fallen fortunes of the Orleans dynasty. The marriage was celebrated in the Roman Catholic chapel at Kingston, where the Duc de Chartres was married last year.

—— There were 36,000 blind people in Great Britain on the 1st Jan., 1864. With very few exceptions they were all of the indigent classes.

—— Garibaldi reached his home in Caprera, after a voyage of four days, in the Duke of Sutherland's yacht. He is about to re-enter the Italian Parliament.

—— The volunteer force of Great Britain now numbers 163,000 effective men. It is the intention of the Government to increase it to 250,000.

—— The Spaniards are contemplating the cutting of a canal around the rock of Gibraltar.

—— The Spanish Cortes have passed a law empowering the Government to make arrangements with the municipality of Madrid for the erection of a colossal bronze statue of Christopher Columbus in one of the public places of the city. It is proposed to inscribe on the pedestal the device of the Dukes de Veraguas, the great discoverer's descendants, of which the following is a translation: "To Castile and Leon, Columbus gave the New World."

—— The Masonic body of Paris was informed, at its last meeting, that the Emperor restored to it the traditional right of electing its Grand Master. This announcement was received with enthusiastic applause, and Marshal Magnan, who held his nomination by Imperial decree, was unanimously re-elected by the delegates of all the lodges present.

—— Mr. Bright, in a recent speech, said that England was "the most merciless of all Christian countries." A prominent English journal admits this saying to be true, and, going back to the historical character of England in this respect, adds: "In the reigns of the Henrys 500,000 subjects and citizens of England alone are computed to have been executed for the mere offence of vagrant indigence. Even in the reign of Elizabeth an unemployed peasant was held liable to seizure and slavery. In the time of James II., only 176 years ago, obnoxious citizens were sentenced to transportation wholesale, and sold by the Court to the courtiers, to be put up at auction as slaves in the plantations."

—— The people of Naples have been sending addresses and giving serenades to the Duke of Sutherland, who is in their city, for his courtesy to Garibaldi. From Gibraltar, on the 3d of May, the Italian hero wrote this letter:

"MY DEAR FRIEND—Having read in the London journals that you and your friends have formed the generous intention to open a subscription in favor of myself and children, I must let you know that it is impossible for me to accept it. It is, however, but one demand the more on the gratitude which I owe to you and to your noble friends for so much kindness.

"Devotedly yours,

"To the Duke of Sutherland. G. GARIBALDI."

Art, Science and Literature.—The expenses of the British Museum for the current year are rated at £96,400, and £47,000 of this are swallowed up in salaries. The additions of books during the past year numbered 36,000, and the average number of readers is 372 a day, each using 11 volumes.

—— The Cornhill Magazine for June contains the last words of Thackeray. "I am sure," he said, in the person of Denis Duval, "I bore but little malice, and, thank Heaven! never wronged a man so much as to be obliged to hate him afterwards. Certain men there were who hated me; but they are gone, and I am here, with a pretty clear conscience, Heaven be praised! and little the worse for their enmity."

—— The "Anecdotal Memoir of Richard Whateley, Archbishop of Dublin," now in the press, will, it is said, especially relate to the latter part of that distinguished prelate's career, presenting his admirers with scraps of his delightful conversation, his maxims, and much of that store of ana which he had accumulated in a long life devoted to religion and literature.

—— The translation of an important work is announced by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., "Mazzini: his Autobiography and Works." The work will be issued in small 8vo., a volume at a time.

—— It is again stated in literary circles that new volume of poems by Mr. Tennyson may be expected before the end of the year.

—— An inventor has succeeded in chemically treating the pulp during the process of manufacturing paper in such a manner that when the paper is impressed upon the uninked types the chemical particles are crushed, and a perfectly black impression is the result. This discards ink and rollers, and will convert a printing-office into a model of cleanliness, instead of what it is now. It will also enable the pressman to print from a continuous roll of paper.

Odds and Ends.—A distinguished English physician has shown the difference in the average time of recovery from sickness between those who have been in the habit of using alcoholic drinks moderately and those who are total abstinents. The number who became infected from the same exposure of those who used the alcohol was nearly two to one of the other, and the time of recovery double.

—— A prize fight came off at Oporto, C. W., lately, between two pugilists from Philadelphia, the one a Frenchman, named Tessot, and the other an Italian, named Cibloni. The contest lasted nine hours, during which they fought 56 rounds. Cibloni was killed outright, and Tessot is in a hopeless condition, having been given up by his physician.

—— "Fancy," Sydney Smith once said, while sitting quietly at the Deanery of St. Paul's with some ladies, when he was told that one of the giraffes at the Zoological Gardens had caught a cold, "fancy a giraffe with a sore throat!"

—— The Nain Jaune (Paris) relates the following anecdote: "At the commencement of the winter two journalists were in conversation at the opera. The one M. de X——, is a bachelor, the other M. de Y——, just married. 'Well,' said the one to the other, 'how do you get along in your new condition?' 'Ah, my dear, there is nothing like being married! You cannot imagine how happy I am. When I am at work my wife is at my side, and at the conclusion of each paragraph I embrace her. That is charming!' 'Now I understand,' was the happy retort of X——, 'why your sentences are so short.' This conversation quickly spread through Paris. From that time forth the articles of Y—— were consulted by the public as the thermometer of his conjugal felicity. During two months the prose of M. Y—— was disjointed and epigrammatic, in shorter periods than are to be found in the earlier writings of Emile de Girardin. All the women grew jealous of Madame Y——. But gradually the periods elongated, and at last Madame Y—— opened the journal edited by M. Y——, and casting a rapid glance over the article signed with his name, cried, 'What! but a single paragraph in the whole article! Poor woman, a divorce will most assuredly follow!'"

—— John Milton's house, situated near the Barbican, London, is to be demolished, to make room for city improvements.

—— A curious story is told of a Massachusetts colonel, who rode out one evening at dusk to establish his picket line. The men on the opposing sides could not distinguish one another, but the rebels had a countersign, "Mobile," and seized everybody who did not say that word, while our men on their part seized everybody who did say it, so that the result was that the rebels took six prisoners and we four, and the colonel established his picket line, though he could not tell exactly where it was.

—— The New Yorkers have quite a zoological collection in the Central Park. Among the specimens are an English rabbit, an American Eagle, two Syrian broad-tailed sheep, a Canadian porcupine, one fox (the ninth), a pair of ringdoves, a pair of swan-geese, four young fawns, three cygnets, two pair of curassaws, two penelopes, a kinkajou, two macaws, five whistling ducks, a "oisota," two trumpet cranes, a fine parrot, a brown gallinule, and South American opossum.

—— The Charleston Courier, S. C., May 24th, has the following queer paragraph: "Two fast steamers were launched from Nantes on the 3d of May for the rebels." This slip of the printer evidently arises from copying somewhat carelessly from a Northern newspaper.

—— When a watch gets out of order in China and stops, they say it is dead, and lose no time in getting a living one—which is one that will go.

—— The Chicago Tribune calls the letter in which Fremont accepts the nomination of the Cleveland Convention, "the last will and testament of the late J. C. Fremont." Even in this view it is, in a political sense, something like the last will of Rabelais: "I owe much; I have nothing; I leave the rest to the poor."

—— The Reese River Hotel has the following among other rules for the government of its boarders of the gold-digging persuasion: "Lodgers inside arise at five A.M.; in the barn, at six o'clock; each man sweeps his own bed; no quartz taken at the bar; no fighting allowed at the table; any one violating the above rules will be shot."

—— Indiarubber collars, shirt wristbands and cuffs are now quite the rage in London.

—— A person living in London advertises that he has changed his name from Patrick O'Flaherty to "De Vere," and that in future he will be known as "Albert Henry Benson de Vere." This throws Count de Joannes into the shade.

—— Gold has been discovered in New Caledonia, one of the islands in the South Pacific Ocean.

—— They are making straw hats in Paris without any crown, its place being supplied by two falls of lace, veiling the hair.

—— An eye-fancier in a western journal writes thus learnedly of the mysteries: "It has often been said that a woman with a hazel eye never elopes from her husband, never chats scandal, never sacrifices her husband's comfort for her own, never finds fault, never talks too much or too little, is always an entertaining, agreeable and lovely companion. 'We never knew,' says a quilldriver, 'but one uninteresting and unamiable woman with a hazel eye, and she had a nose, which looked, as the Yankee says, like the little end of nothing whittled down to a point.' The gray is the sign of shrewdness and talent. Great thinkers and captains have it. In women it indicates a better head than heart. The dark hazel is noble in its significance, as in its beauty. The blue eye is admirable, but may be feeble. The black eye, take care! Look out for the wife with a black eye! Such can be seen at the police office, generally, with a complaint against the husband for assault and battery."

—— In his recent work, "Savage Africa," Winwood Reade shows satisfactorily that the gorilla resembles the chimpanzee in travelling on all fours, in building nests, in attacking by biting, in assembling occasionally in large numbers, in its docility when young, and in not differing so very materially from our ancient friend, the ourang-outang. He denies that gorillas beat their breasts as a signal for battle, that they carry off women to domesticate them, or that they ever attack man without provocation.

—— A gentleman, in conversation, remarked to President Lincoln, a short time since, that nothing could defeat him but Grant's capture of Richmond, to be followed by his nomination at Chicago and acceptance. "Well," said the President, "I feel very much like the man who said he didn't want to die particularly, but if he had got to die that was precisely the disease he would like to die of."

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE news received from Europe during the last week is both scanty and unimportant. The armistice between Germany and Denmark has been extended for another fortnight, and the probabilities are that the question may be so patched up as to avoid a general war. The position of England is so peculiar and embarrassing as almost to paralyze her action, and indeed render her advocacy positively disadvantageous to Denmark—her chief cards are to threaten Prussia with the loss of the Rhine, and Austria with that of Venetia. In one respect the visit of Garibaldi has materially strengthened the British Ministry, as it shows how intensely revolutionary the British nation is.

The health of the Pope remains in a very critical condition, although much reliance cannot be placed upon the newspaper accounts, as all conversant with Vatican politics understand.

The French papers have a report that Mr. Seward endeavored to influence the Papal Government to choose Bishop Timon as Archbishop Hughes's successor, instead of Bishop McCloskey.

Garibaldi has had a warning from some of his friends that Caprera is too exposed a residence for him, and that he might be carried off by Greek pirates employed by Louis Napoleon or the Emperor of Austria. The great Liberator having been returned to the Italian Parliament, he will reside part of his time in Turin. The reception he met in England was very distasteful to Victor Emanuel.

The French papers are very much pleased with the arrival of Maximilian and his Empress in Mexico, and trust it will soon enable them to withdraw from that expensive and false position. The policy, however, of his calling around him such men as Santa Anna, Miramon, Almonte, and other well-known intriguantes, is much canvassed, and pronounced very dangerous. The reception the Imperial pair met with at Vera Cruz is considered rather chilling, and calculated to raise gloomy forebodings.

MESSRS. HALL & RUCKEL, Wholesale Druggists, 218 Greenwich street, New York, among the valuable articles furnished by them, supply the new and popular dentifrice, Sozodont. It is extremely prized, as imparting a delightful refreshing taste and feeling to the teeth, removing tartar and scurf, and reaching in its cleansing course the interstices between the teeth and cavities of all kinds. It has been adopted and recommended by the best dentists in the country, and cannot fail to give entire satisfaction.

CHARGE OF THE CASH BRIGADE

At the Brooklyn Fair.

BY DE TOLBIAC.

Mais, comme l'a dit Molière,
Qu'allaient ils aussi faire
Tous, dans cette galère?

'Cross the river, 'cross the river,
'Cross the river, onward
Up into Montague street
Marched the eight hundred.
"Forward! the Cash Brigade!
Go straight ahead!" he said.
Into the Academy
Marched the eight hundred.

In marched the Cash Brigade;
Think you they were afraid
That by some artless maid
They would be plunder'd?
Theirs, but to go and view,
Theirs, not a thing to do,
Theirs, not to spend a sou,
Thus through the Academy
Strode the eight hundred.

Ladies to right of them,
Ladies to left of them,
Ladies in front of them,
Looked up and wonder'd;
Seeing they did not buy,
None of the chances try;
Nothing would take their eye—
For nil admirari
Thought the eight hundred.

Tables to right of them,
Tables to left of them,
Tables in front of them,
Piled up and lumber'd;
Taking no little space,
Tended with charming grace,
By the crème of the place;
Of none of which the face
Struck the eight hundred.

People to right of them,
People to left of them,
People in front of them,
Weary and hunger'd;
Pushing with all their might,
Seemingly out of spite,
As if 'twere their delight
To cause at once the flight
Of the eight hundred.

"Anything here to eat?"
"Something, I entreat!"
"Anything for a seat!"
"I can't stand on my feet!"
Each of them thunder'd;
No resource but to pace,
This done with charming grace
By every one, until
Into a quiet place
One of them blunder'd.
Then sat they down—but not
All the eight hundred.

Seats all could not beget,
'Gainst resting some were set,
Much marching there was yet
Others pretended;
Thanks to all who did aid,
Thanks to all who then made
Strong efforts to persuade
That these fonds should be stayed—
The good extents render'd;
For it was their intent,
The next hours should be spent
In peaceful merriment,
And thus, in order, went
Went the eight hundred.

What was there else to see?
What should their next move be?
Asked, when the gallery
Left, through the dense crowd, they Slowly meandered;
Hungry as they were all,
Passed by table and stall,
Passed by each "waterfall,"
Through Kitchen, stage and Hall,
Each of them wander'd;
But nought found they for all—
All the eight hundred.

People to right of them,
People to left of them,
People in front of them,
Scrambled and thunder'd;
Hungry ones everywhere,
Pushed the ladies there,
They that had stood so well;
Back, from this splendid Fair,
In contentment rare,
Once more in open air,

Before the Scenes.

Dr. Kent's Offer of Marriage.

March'd forth, in grim despair,
All the eight hundred.

When can their mem'ry fade?
At the wild trip they made,
They themselves wonder'd:
Forget the words they said,
Honor the trip they made!
Honor the Cash Brigade,
Happy eight hundred!

A Visit to a Fortuneteller.

BY LILLIE DEVEREUX UMSTED.

ROSA TEMPLETON sat alone in her room, her face buried in her hands, her heart lost in a melancholy reverie. She was a young woman—only twenty-three—fair to look upon too, and yet she had already endured such suffering as does not often afflict one person in the course of a whole life. Three years ago she had been as happy a creature as ever lived; the idolized darling of a home where her lightest will was law, with two fond parents, a stalwart brother and a sweet young sister to make up the happy family; surrounded by luxury, knowing that all belonging to her were respected and esteemed, herself the reigning belle of the town, a favorite with her young companions and adored by the young men, her position was indeed an enviable one, and she had enjoyed it to the full; naturally of a bright and cheerful disposition, the present had been all sunshine, and the future had seemed all promise. The first shadow came in the failure of her mother's health, but just as this trial began a new delight arose that made even this threatened sorrow for the time seem impossible—Rosa fell in love. She had had a score of suitors with whom she had laughed, and perhaps sometimes flirted, but not one had touched her heart, until she met Robert Marchmont. From the moment when she first saw his handsome, manly face, and looked into his earnest eyes, up to the time when he whispered to her his strong, deep love, it was all a wild delightful dream, and life was such a golden aspect that sorrow and death seemed the greatest unrealities. But almost immediately after her happy engagement a new trouble came in the parting with her lover. Robert was junior partner in a large mercantile house, and at this time there arose a sudden necessity for one of this firm to go out to

South America, to attend to the affairs of a branch establishment, then involved in unexpected entanglement owing to the very sudden death of its chief. Robert was selected for this duty, and very reluctantly found himself compelled to start on a long and distant voyage, with no certainty of the period when he might return.

All now Rosa's sorrows were fairly begun; her lover gone, and the absorbing pleasure of her companionship removed, she woke to a sad consciousness of what she had lost, to a realization of how dull life was after the removal of its best excitement, worse of all to a sudden knowledge of how desperately ill her mother was. It was even so; Mrs. Templeton, while yet appearing about the house much as usual, was suffering under a mortal illness, and before the weary weeks had elapsed between Robert Marchmont's departure and his first letter Rosa wept on her mother's deathbed.

After this the other troubles came quickly. Mrs. Templeton was but taken from the evil to come, and Mr. Ireland, all unsuspected by any one, had been for some time on the eve of ruin, and before six months had past the crash came. The wealthy house of Adolphus Templeton & Co. went to irretrievable "smash," and Rosa, the proud Rosa, now that she was well nigh a beggar, saw that the papers were daily filled with denunciations of her father as a scoundrel, and heard her name honored mean whispered with indignation and contempt. Soon came a period of the darkest misery. Rosa found herself slandered and spurned by her former companions, and knew herself to be an object of dislike or of pity to those who had once loved and esteemed her. The Templetons left their elegant house, and for a while lived in cheap lodgings, where, of course, none of their former friends could or would visit them. Then Rosa struggled on, teaching her little sister, trying to make their poor apartments comfortable, and doing what she could to cheer and encourage her father and brother. But it was hard work. Mr. Templeton fell into more and more despondent state, until his mind at last fairly gave way under the shock, and it was only the horrible relief of a long banning dread when he was discovered one morning dead in his bed, and by his own hand.

Let us hurry over the dark period. Poor Rosa was indeed stricken on every side, bereaved of almost everything that could make life desirable, and yet her sorrows were not over. Her brother Adolphus, who should have been the supporter and stay of the family in this dark hour, had proved himself wholly unequal to the task, and sank down utterly under his burdens. So for weary years Rosa clung to him and tried to restrain him, to keep him back from the headlong path of vice into which she knew he was sinking, but it was in vain. Night after night that poor girl sat up to watch for his return from some drunken orgy, and day after day she tried to stimulate him to reformation. It was all of no avail, he fell deeper and deeper, until his death by the agonies of delirium tremens was a relief to every one but his poor desolate sister.

So the three years wore on, Rosa and her little sister Lily were alone in the world, and almost penniless. The remnants of her mother's fortune which had been left from the wreck, and which had sustained them in this past time of darkness, had all been absorbed in the last two dreadful years, and when the funeral expenses for poor Adolphus were paid Rosa had only two hundred dollars in the world with which to face the future. Had not her sorrows, indeed, been almost unparalleled? Mother, father and brother all dead, two of them by such horrible deaths; wealth, position, honor, all lost; surely she had lived through every trouble enough for a lifetime. Yet she was still young, and as I have said, still handsome. Her face, it is true, had lost the girlish roundness it still retained at twenty, the glad light had died out of her eyes, and there were faint lines on the corners of her mouth that told of suffering; but what her face had lost in softness it had gained in experience, there was something of the calm look of the faithful martyr now in her large sad eyes, and on her brow was the crown of those who can "suffer and be strong."

Rosa's first act after her brother's death was to remove to other lodgings, where two very small rooms would suffice for herself and Lily. They were rooms at out of the way, but they were cheap and they were clean, and had a pleasant look-out. Once settled here, her next step was to seek employment. She had already earned some addition to their slender means by turning one of her former accomplishments to account in coloring photographs, and she now made this her chief employment, earning by it enough to suffice for her own and Lily's small wants, and leave their two hundred dollars for the present untouched.

And all this time where was Robert Marchmont? Ah! you may well ask, for in the answer to that question lay the first drop of bitterness in Rosa's already overflowing cup. She had heard from him regularly during the first year, but after that a strange silence had come, and for eighteen months she had received no word or letter from him. She knew that he was still alive, for he had never returned to the city, but gradually, as the weeks passed away without any reply to her last letter—that letter in which she had told him of her father's death and dishonor, and offered to release him from his engagement—the conviction came slowly upon her to know that he loved her no longer, he had forgotten the lovedream that had been so brief, and was glad to be released from the irksome ties that bound him to the bankrupt's daughter. Here was the sorrow that had told more than any other on Rosa's brave heart, for it deprived the future of all hope. Often and often when she lay awake at night, depressed with care and wellnigh despairing, she would have been glad to die, had not the quiet breathing of her sleeping sister reminded her of one great duty she yet had in life. And sometimes, despite all her sorrow, Rosa's hope would spring up, when she would think that some day Robert Marchmont must return, and at last she might hope to look upon his face again; that face one sight of which she so longed for, that face without which all scenes of gaiety and all places of amusement would have been alike blank.

But recently a new element had appeared in Rosa's life; the physician, Dr. Kent, who had attended Adolphus in his last illness, was a middle-aged man, reserved and cold in manner, but with a good, true heart. He had watched Rosa in her untiring attendance on her wretched brother, her maternal kindness to her little sister. He knew all her past history, and at last there sprang up in his mind a desire to have her for his wife. He had long looked for such a companion as might be fit to share his wealth and his position, and before at last he fancied he had found one. So when Rosa and Lily had been a short time settled in their new quarters, he called one evening, and requesting an interview with Rosa alone, astonished her by his formal proposal. Rosa was taken completely by surprise.

"This is so unexpected," she faltered; "I know not what to say."

"Miss Templeton," replied Dr. Kent, with some severity, for he had supposed that of course she would eagerly accept his proposal, "I am sorry if I have startled you. But, remember, this is a very grave subject. I will take you and your sister to my home, I will try to make you a good husband, and Lily shall be my adopted child—my own."

"You are very kind," Rosa exclaimed, touched by his offer to her sister as well as herself. "But you should not allow me time to consider the matter."

The doctor rose, a good deal offended at this burst of eloquence.

"Very well," he said. "I will give you three days; but, remember, if you really reject my suit I will be blind to it no longer. Madame Rosa, I am sure, will be glad to receive you."

"Certainly not," replied Rosa, rather haughtily, "I am no girlish coquette, Dr. Kent, to trifle with a proposition so momentary; I assure you my decision also will be final."

So the doctor went away, and Rosa dropped her head down on her hands and indulged in a hearty burst of tears. How this wooing, cold as it was, recalled Robert Marchmont's impetuous courtship! how it brought back to her mind that scene she had so often tried to banish, where, almost without words, that first passionate love was avowed!

But now, for the first time, the question arose, what reply should she make to the stern physician? This was the question that she had so carefully averted on the morning of the period when my story opens. She did not love him, no! that she was sure of, and she did not think she could ever learn to love him, she could not deny; despite his neglect, his cruelty, for aught she knew his infidelity, her heart still loved Robert, and she would never win him, and she felt that no other image could ever take the place of that one indelibly impressed on her memory. Was this to be the end? Was she never to be wooed and won? Was Lily to grow up without half decking in the affirmative, yet the moment she contemplated the idea of being that man's wife she could not repress an involuntary shudder, while again she seemed to hear, as in a dream, Robert Marchmont's words of love.

Was Rosa not nearly an hour, lost in sad reverie, her work lay neglected beside her; something it seemed to be as if she could not do anything while this question was before her mind, and yet how should she decide it? How choose between duty and inclination? This was the debate repeating itself in her poor head until it seemed as if she should go mad.

It was still running on when she at last roused herself, and remembering that the important duties should not be neglected, turned to her labors on the photographs. She had brought a package from the artist on the previous day, but still remained wrapped up in a piece of newspaper as she had brought them. She took them up to the window to the strong, clear eye light on a portion of the paper around them. It was one of those advertisements of satrology which fascinate the weak and the ignorant, an attention still lingers in the nineteenth century. It was as follows:

"Madame Beam, Clairvoyant, can be consulted on all important events of life. Advice inviolable in all cases of love and marriage. Terms, to gentlemen, 50 cents. Office, —Seventh Avenue."

Rosa read it as if fascinated, laughed at her own folly in the impression it made upon her, and, at last, with a sudden desperation, started up, threw on her hat and shawl, and went out with the advertisement in her hand. It was a damp, disagreeable March day, the streets were very wet, and as her way lay through the lower part of town, with her veil down, through the long streets that led from her own home to the fashionable quarter, she was not much annoyed by the attentions of her fate. She did not believe in this absurd humbug, of course; she had no reliance whatever upon any such nonsense, but at least it would be amusing to hear what the clairvoyant would say. Twenty-five cents was not much, and, perchance, some ray of light might come to her that would enable her to see her way in this hour of indecision.

Reflecting somewhat in this wise, Rosa reached at last the common-looking door, which bore upon it the name of "Madame Beam." Drawing her veil closer, Rosa rang the bell, and stepped inside; a slatternly servant-girl answered the summons by screaming from the top of the stairs:

"Do you want Madame Beam?"

"Yes," answered Rosa, her heart beating in spite of herself.

"Then walk up here."

Rosa ran upstairs, and was shown into a dingy back parlor, where she was told to wait a few moments. This was anything but imposing; there surely were no mysterious adjuncts to work here. The room was a mere bedchamber, from the odor of a dispidated breakfast that pervaded it, served certainly rather to inspire contempt than awe. The walls were sundry certificates of various handwritings, setting forth that Madame Beam had foretold various matters of life and death, which had afterwards turned out in exact accordance with the predictions. But the handwriting of most of these was decidedly mean, the orthography vulgar, and Rosa turned away with another smile at her own folly.

Just at this moment the dirty servant-girl again appeared, and ushered her into Madame Beam's office. It was a small dark room, containing a couch, covered with a dark calico quilt, two chairs and a table, on which lay a greasy pack of cards. In one of the chairs sat the mysterious clairvoyant, dressed in a forlorn calico dress, an old-fashioned cotton veil. This, then, was the dispenser of life and death, the gifted being who could reveal the past and predict the future. "Sit down," she said to Rosa, pointing to the vacant chair. "Sit right down. Now, I tells fortunes two ways—twenty-five cent way you can read your own hand, and you can ask me anything you like, and I'll tell your fate, past and to come; which way will you have, twenty-five cent way or fifty cent?"

"Twenty-five cent way," answered Rosa, her breath nearly taken away by the woman's rapidity.

"I'm always paid in advance," continued Madame Beam.

"There's the money," and Rosa tossed her the requisite quarter.

"Now cut these cards, if you please?"

Rosa cut the cards, laughing the while behind her veil, and then Madame Beam began as she picked up the packet to run over the various cards with a rapidity of which it is impossible to give any adequate idea.

"You're a very good cards, mum; you've had a great deal of trouble in your past life, a great deal, but you are going to have a great deal of success; your future will be full of good luck. There's no sickness nor death threatening any one that's near to you: and there's a gentleman coming to ask you a question across the water."

At this Rosa's heart beat, and her attention to the woman's rapid utterance was redoubled.

"Cut the cards again, mum," said the clairvoyant, "and tell me about him."

Rosa cut them, and she went on:

"He's a fair gentleman, and his heart is very much set upon you, mum; he is coming a great way from over the water, and he will be here in three days."

"Is that again, mum."

Rosa obeyed, and she began again:

"There's a dark gentleman, a dark man, of a jealous disposition, who also thinks very much of you; you will see him to-morrow, but I advise you not to have nothing of him. Now, mum, let me look at your left hand."

Rosa held out her palm as requested, and on she went faster than ever, and more glibly:

"You've had very much trouble I see here, mum, a great deal of trouble, but you'll have success and prosperity in the future. You'll be married once, mum, and you'll have five children; you'll live to a good old age, and you'll have no sickness nor death in your family, mum. Now, mum, you may ask me two questions."

Then as Rosa hesitated she went on:

"Perhaps you'd like to know about that fair young man, mum. I'll tell you anything about him you wish to know. Perhaps you'd like to know if he loves you, mum, would you?"

"Yes," faltered Rosa.

"Well, then, mum, be good enough to fix your mind upon him, and cut the cards, fix your mind entirely upon him, mum."

Rosa did so, her heart was full of one thought—"Robert, Robert, loves me yet, or will, or was, or has been"—she could not frame those words. The fortuneteller ran them over.

"Shall I say so? Yes to the proposal that has been made to me?" asked Rosa, with a smile at her own credulity.

"Yes, mum, or you'll have a great deal of trouble," responded the oracle, and Rosa left the room to make way for a common-looking man who was about to consult her.

Once out in the street Rosa found her head fairly in a whirl; the woman had spoken so rapidly, she had so much to think, that spite of her own good sense the words had made an impression upon her. She knew to be sure that the story of Robert coming over the water was stereotyped, and the dark man and the fair man pretty sure to be right if a lady had any admirers at all, since they would all range themselves under the denomination of dark and fair; yet still, despite the inmate conviction that it was all humbug, Rosa was sufficiently impressed to come to one decision —she would not accept Dr. Kent. Perhaps the walk in the fresh air and the stimulant to her mind of her recent interview had helped her to look at the question more rationally, but the conviction came upon her with perfect clearness that it was not her duty to marry a man so utterly repugnant to her; and looking above all certainly comfort, she felt sure that the God who made her would not leave her to do this violence to her nature, and that he would surely still sustain her as He had in the past.

So Rosa had decided, and she drew a long breath of relief as she entered once more her rooms and turned with new energy to her task. Nor could she help cherishing the hope that the fortuneteller's words inspired, and while she worked away at her monotonous labors her heart would not help rejoicing as if it had indeed some hope.

The next day, when Dr. Kent came for his answer, Rosa was calmer in a very decided though courteous refusal. He was astonished, incredulous, and finally very angry; so that poor Rosa, while grieving over the mortification he suffered, could not help feeling that she had done well in not trusting herself to this man, who, if he could show so much temper so far now, would scarcely have been a very amiable husband.

So the two sisters went on together as usual, the days slipped by, even the third day that the fortuneteller had said should bring back the fair young man, and no event occurred to prove to Rosa that she had done well. She even began sometimes to fear that she had made a foolish mistake when she realized what she could not but dread, that she had been largely influenced by what that foolish woman had said. Yet, still firm in that reliance on a higher power that had never deserted her, she tried to struggle bravely on.

It was Sunday, a mild, pleasant spring day, rather more than a week after Rosa's visit to Madame Beam, and the sisters were coming home from the quiet church which they were in the habit of attending. Their way lay for a short distance through Fifth Avenue, and there was a hurrying along the crowded thoroughfare which was now anything but the favorite promenade it had been an hour or two had he not veil down, the crape veil she still wore for her brother's death, that it was not so thick but that her handsome features could be seen through it clearly enough to elicit some admiring glances from the gay loungers. But this was a sort of homage no longer pleasing, and Rosa hurried on and had almost reached the cross street leading to her home when a sight met a glance of a face blanched deadly for an instant held her spellbound where she stood. Yes, there was Robert Marchmont! the knee bent, the arm given, though he looked older, and he was bronzed and bearded—he was coming directly towards her, and on his arm leaned a beautiful and elegantly dressed lady.

Poor Rosa, to save her life she could not stir for one wild moment, while all the blood in her body rushed to her heart, and left her face whitening. There was her pride and her dignity? Gone, hopelessly gone for those few seconds. She could not do anything but look at him, look at him on, with wide staring eyes, and he came on laughing gaily until he was close beside her, then his eyes met hers, and his face grew as deadly white as she was. Yes, under the brown skin the strong man grew fearfully pale with the influence of unpreventable emotion.

"My God! Miss Templeton!" he exclaimed, and with a rapid motion, dropping the arm of his fashionable companion, he sprang to her side.

"Rose! Miss Templeton!" he faltered, in a voice husky with agitation, "Where do you live? Only I come and see you?"

Rose answered as well as she was able, giving the number of her house and an assent she could not help giving to the call.

"This evening, then," he murmured, and raising his hat he was gone, and Rosa had walked on alone.

Yes! it was indeed no mistake, it was that Robert Marchmont, true as ever, and Rosa went back to her home with a heart so full of excitement that she utterly baffles description. How long the time seemed to evening, and yet how soon evening came, when once again Robert and Rosa were alone together.

He sprang up the stairs to her room, and then the hand he held to greet him he met her with outstretched arms.

"My love! my darling! my own Rosa!" and Rosa did not shrink as he clasped her in his arms.

"You love me still?" he asked, after the first wild moments was over.

"Yes, Robert, always. And you?"

"You know I have always been true!"

"And why have you not written to me?"

Then came the recital of that journey into the interior and then my long illness, did you not? And I never received your letter until I got well."

"My dear sister-in-law, John's wife; only think that John should have grown old enough to get married while I was away!"

"What, did you return?"

"Nearly a week ago, and I have tried ever since to find you out."

So it was all explained, and they were wonderfully happy, and when Rosa told about her visit to the Clairvoyant, although Robert laughed at her, how thankful he was for her decision.

After this I don't think there is much more to tell; Robert remained in the city would be as a home with him as with Dr. Kent, so Rosa and he were married, and part at least of the fortune they considered lost was restored to them. I am not quite certain if the statement as to the number of olive branches is correct, as I have had no bulletin from the family in the last two years.

POPULATION OF THE WORLD.—A British professor finds that Europe contains 301,000,000 inhabitants; Asia, 730,000,000; Africa, 80,000,000; America, 100,000,000; and Polynesia, 3,000,000—total, 1,234,000,000. Of this whole crowd about 33,000,000 die in each year, which is 87,671 a day, or 61 per minute. Another professor calculates that 36,627,375,000 people have lived on the earth since the creation.

The Gulf Between Them.

BY MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

CHAPTER XLIX.

ELIZABETH MELLEN was home again—home under her husband's roof, for ever at home in his heart. She sat in her dressing-room. The autumnal sunshine came through its windows, with a rich, golden warmth. A hickory wood fire filled the room with additional cheerfulness, which was scarcely needed, for that awful chill had left her heart for ever. A few days of supreme happiness had given back the peachlike bloom to her cheek and the splendor to her eyes. Full of contentment, all the generous impulses of her character rose and swelled in her bosom, till she longed to share her heaven with anything that was cast down or unhappy. The door between her room and Elsie's boudoir was open, and through it she could hear a soft, pleading voice amid a struggle of sobs and tears. Prompted by tender sympathy, Elizabeth half rose from her easy-chair, but fell back again, murmuring:

"No, no, she will best find her way to his heart alone. God help her to be frank and truthful."

Still she listened, and her beautiful face grew anxious, for the sternness of her husband's voice, in answer to those feeble plaints, gave little hopes of conciliation. Directly Mellen came through the boudoir and sat down on a couch near his wife, shading his face with one hand, not wishing her to see how much he was disturbed. Elizabeth arose then, bent over him, and softly removed the hand from his eyes.

"For my sake, Grantley," she said, "for my sake."

Generous tears filled her eyes, pleading tenderness spoke in her voice. Her lips, tremulous with feeling, touched his forehead.

"For my sake, Grantley."

Mellen lifted his eyes to hers—a mist, such as springs from the unshed tears of a strong man, softened them. She fell upon her knees by his side, laid her head upon his bosom with soft murmurs of thankfulness which no living man could have resisted.

Mellen folded her close, and touched his lips to her forehead with tender reverence.

"For your sake, my beloved; what is there that I would not do for your sake?"

"And this forgiveness is perfect," she questioned.

"The fault from this hour is forgotten, sweet wife."

"It was terrible—more terrible than you dream of. When I tell you that she had engaged herself secretly to Thomas Fuller, even your mercy may be qualified."

Elizabeth withdrew from her husband's arms and bowed her lovely face for a moment in sad thoughtfulness. Then she looked up, smiling faintly.

"Elsie is so thoughtless—she does not mean the wrong she does poor Tom—still we must not be unmerciful, so once more let us forgive her wholly—without reservation."

A knock at the door disturbed them. It was Victoria, who came to announce Mr. Fuller, who was close behind her.

"Elizabeth, I've come back. It was no use trying to stay in that confounded city; to save my life I couldn't do it," he said, pushing by the pretty mulatto and closing the door upon her. "Can I see her now—only for once, you know?"

Elizabeth blushed crimson.

"Oh, Tom, you don't know your—"

"Yes, I do know."

"And still wish to see her?"

"Why not? of course I do; because one—infernal villain—excuse me, I won't talk. Where is she?"

Elizabeth, a little shocked and quite taken by surprise, glanced towards the blue boudoir. In Tom strode and shut the door resolutely after him.

Lying upon a couch, over which that pale marble statue was bending with its cold lilies in mocking purity, lay a pale little creature, covered with a pink eider-down quilt, which but half covered a morning dress of faint azure; quantities of delicate Valenciennes lace fluttered, like snowflakes, around her wrists and bosom, and formed the principal material of a dainty little cap, under which her golden tresses were gathered. She looked like a girl of twelve pretending womanhood.

When Tom came in she uttered a sudden cry and flung up her hands and dropped them in a loose clasp over her face, which flushed under them like a rose.

Tom walked straight to the couch, drew one of the fragile gilded chairs close to it, and sat down.

"Don't—don't—go away. It's cruel. I shall faint with shame," she cried, trembling all over.

"Not till you have answered me a few questions," said Tom, firmly. "Questions that I have a right to ask and you must answer."

Elsie drew the little hands slowly from her face and looked at him. The blue eyes—grown larger from illness—opened wide, her lips parted. That was not the lover she had trifled with and domineered over. She was afraid of him, and shrunk away close to the wall.

"Elsie, one word," said Tom, pressing a hand firmly on each knee and bending towards her.

Her lips parted wider, and she watched him with the glance of a frightened bird when a cat looks in at the door of its cage.

"You have come to torment me," she faltered.

"Torment you! I! It isn't in me to do that. Torment! I do not know what it is."

"Well, what do you want of me then?"

"What do I want, Elsie, dear? What do I want? Nothing but God's truth, and that I will have?"

Elsie's eyes grew larger, and the flush of shame left her face.

"I can't—I can't tell you the truth, Tom Fuller, now. Elizabeth, she can say enough to make you ready to kill me, but I would rather die than talk of it."

"I know all that Elizabeth can tell me," said Tom, resolutely.

"What did you come for, then?"

"To ask this one question: Did you love that man?"

A shiver of disgust ran through her and broke out in her voice:

"Love him! No! At first it seemed as if I did; but after I saw what he was and how he lived, it was dreadful, I hated him so."

"But how came you married to him?"

"I don't know; I never could tell. It was when we went on that picnic. He asked me to walk with him. It was good fun to set you all wondering, and I went. He took me down the hill and towards the beach, close by the tavern. We had been flirting for weeks then in New York and here, for he always met me when I went out to walk or ride, or anything; but I never thought of marrying him in earnest, upon my sacred word. Well, that day, just as we came to the tavern, he said, 'Let us stop a moment and get married; there is a clergyman in here.'

"I didn't believe him, and said so. 'Come in and see for yourself,' was his answer. I went in laughing. A gentleman sat in one of the rooms, and Mr. North's mulatto servant, who was sauntering about the door when we came up, followed us in. I don't know what possessed me. Perhaps for the minute I loved him; it seemed to me that I must stand up when the strange man arose. He only said a few words, and before I really believed it was a true ceremony the man said I was Mr. North's wife, and wrote out a paper, which I dropped, thinking that I should be really married if I took it, but which Mr. North picked up, saying I did not know its value."

"The scoundrel! The infamous, double-dyed scoundrel!" cried Tom. "But you didn't love him—you didn't love him?"

"No," said Elsie, shaking her head. "I tried my best to get away from it all, but it was of no use. Then he petted me so, and told me how beautifully we would live somewhere in Europe, and I thought him so rich. But it was my money he meant to use. He thought that half of uncle's property was mine, and when I told him how it was, oh, I won't tell you how rude he became. Just after he told me about that other person."

Elsie broke off here, and covered her face with both hands again. Tom saw the scarlet glow where it shot up to her temples and bathed her white throat, and gave his hands one hard grip in a wild desire to strike something.

"There comes a question," he said, hoarsely; "did you leave him?"

"Yes, yes; that very hour."

"And never saw him again?"

"Never but once; and then I ordered him out of the house."

"Because you hated him so?"

Tom seized both her hands as he asked this question, and wrung them till she could scarcely keep from crying out with the pain.

"Oh, how I did hate him!" she exclaimed, shuddering.

"Elsie," said Tom, "look into my face, straight into the eyes."

She obeyed him, with a look of piteous appeal.

"Did you ever love me?"

Her hands were locked together, she lifted them up with more of energy than he had ever witnessed in her before.

"Did you?" repeated Tom, and a glow came into his face.

"Yes."

The word had scarcely left her lips when Tom flung the gilded chair back and fell on his knees, gathering her up in his arms with a wild outburst of feeling.

"Then I'll be d——hung and choked to death if anything on God's beautiful earth keeps me from marrying you!"

She clung to him, she lifted her quivering lips to his.

"Say it again, just once, darling!" cried Tom, shaking back his tawny locks with energy. "Is this love downright, honest, whole-hearted love?"

"Yes, yes!"

"God bless you, darling! And when was it? about what time did it begin?"

She answered him honestly, but with a faltering voice:

"Oh, Tom, I'm afraid it wasn't till after you got so rich. Don't think hard of it; I do love beautiful things so much—but indeed, indeed I love you more."

"Then I'm glad the old covey left me all his money. I don't care a d——a red cent why you love me, only I must be sure that it's a fixed fact. Now I'll go straight out and tell Bessie."

Elsie turned cold.

"Oh, Tom, she'll never consent to it."

"Won't she! I'd just like to know why?"

"And my brother, he is so cold, so unforgiving."

"Is he? then I'll take you away to a warmer climate. But don't believe it; he's proud as a racehorse, but you'll find him a trump in the end."

"Don't go yet, Tom, I am afraid they will—"

"No, they wont," cried Tom, and away he went into Elizabeth's sitting-room, with tears sparkling in his eyes and a generous flush in his face.

"Mellen," he said, wringing Grantley's hand, "I want to be married to-morrow, and carry her away."

"Fuller, what is the meaning of this?" demanded Mellen, pained and surprised, while Elizabeth stood up aghast at this sudden outburst.

"It means just this, Mellen, I don't care a tin whistle for what has gone before, and I feel strong enough to take care of anything that may come after. Your sister loves me, and I love her, that's enough. I am satisfied, and—there—that's enough. The whole thing is a family secret, and who is going to be the wiser. I only hope they have dug the fellow's grave deep enough, that's all."

"But, Fuller, have you reflected?"

"Reflected! I've done nothing else for a week, and this is just what it has brought me to. So give us your hand."

Elizabeth came up to Tom, put her arms around his neck, and burst into tears.

"That's the time o' day," shouted Tom. "Silence gives consent; now just give us a good brotherly grip of the hand, Mellen, and it's all right."

Tom folded one arm around his cousin, and held out the other a second time. Mellen took it in his, wrung it warmly, and left the room.

"Just go in and comfort her a little, Bessie, poor darling, she's afraid you wont consent."

"Generous, noble fellow," said Elizabeth, kissing him with warmth; "but where will you go? what will you do? It is all so very sudden."

"Do! what on earth can I do but love her like distraction? Go! any place where she can find life and fun, plenty of shopping. Paris, isn't that a nice sort of place for pretty things? I think we'll go to Paris first. But, I forgot, Rhodes's daughter, the old maid, is waiting for you downstairs. Victoria would have told you if I hadn't shut her out."

Elizabeth went down, leaving Tom in the only spot he cared to occupy on earth. She found Miss Jemima in a state of wild commotion, with her riding-dress buttoned awry, and one of her gauntlets torn half off with hard pulling.

"Did you know it? had you any suspicion?" she demanded, confronting Elizabeth like a grenadier; I could think it of your sister, but you—you—"

"What is it? I know nothing," answered Elizabeth.

"They are married, absolutely married; my par and that painted lay figure you introduced to him, that Mrs. Harrington."

"What, your father married to her!" cried Elizabeth; "you surprise me."

"It's a solemn truth, though a disgraceful truth, but she shall never come into the house that shelters me. I'll burn it down first. Where's your sister?"

"She is ill in her room."

"Yes, I dare say. But she's had a hand in this, and I'll pay her for it, or my name isn't Jemima Rhodes. Tell her so, with my compliments. Good morning!"

With this abrupt adieu the spinster took herself off, tugging away at her gauntlet, or what was left of it, and diversifying the movement with a vicious crack of her whip now and then.

Elizabeth smiled and went upstairs again. Thus the great events of the day ended.

In less than a week Tom Fuller was quietly married, and took his wife at once on board a steamer bound for Europe. She had come forth from her sick room greatly subdued and changed in many respects, but able, from her peculiar character, to put a veil between her and the past, which would have been impossible to a woman like Elizabeth.

I am happy to state that 'Dolph's treachery met with its proper reward. Clorinda succeeded in saving her money, and she married the parson, leaving 'Dolph to his shame and remorse. Victoria gave him the cold shoulder, and made herself so intimate with a new male Adonis, who came to the house as domestic, that 'Dolph's days were full of misery and his nights made restless with legions of nightmares.

The house by the sea shore stands up in its old picturesque stateliness, and within the sunshine never fails, and the summer of content is never disturbed; through dark waters and terrible tempests they have come, even in this world, upon the promised land.

THE END.

PROFESSOR S., of Dickson College, is not much given to joking. Occasionally, however, this vein of his disposition is excited, and then his hits are of the hardest kind, and double-edged. One morning, not long ago, he found a horse in the recitation-room. The class had collected, and with solemn countenances awaited the entrance of the professor. He came in, looked around deliberately, first upon the horse, then upon the class, and remarked, at the same time twitching his shirt collar:

"Ahem! You have got a new classmate, I see. I'm glad it's a horse, there were jackasses enough before."

THE SHARPSHOOTERS BEFORE RICHMOND.

THE lines of Grant's advance on Richmond had been pushed so close to those of Lee that a story is told of a captain who went out to set his picket line, and lost six of his men, but brought in four of the enemy, who had blundered into his hands.

The sharpshooters kept steadily at work, their riflepits not being more than 100 yards apart, and in some cases even less. No part of the body could be exposed for a moment. Gradually, however, the fire slackens on both sides, and at last it dies away. After a pause some adventurous one raises his head, and calls out: "How are you, Johnny?" "How are you, Yank?" comes in reply, with a hearty good will, and and the ice being broken a promise follows not to shoot, and out they sally to stretch their limbs and take a moment's freedom. The riflepit and the tree-top give up their denizens, who gradually approach the half-way line, and with the characteristic spirit of the universal nation begin to swap.

Richmond papers and tobacco are exchanged for Northern luxuries, and for a time all is gay banter and friendly intercourse. At last the warning is given, "Run back, Johnnys," "Run back, Yanks." Men regain their posts, and the firing begins, high at first, and evidently with no intention except to warn that the stern reality reigns once more.

RINGGOLD, GEORGIA.

THERE is no more striking proof of the power of the Government ultimately to suppress the rebellion than to view the present field of operation. We give a sketch in this paper of Ringgold, a post village in Walker county, Georgia, and station on the Western and Atlantic Railroad. Yet we give it, not as a place recently captured from the enemy, but to show it as a sort of depot whence men and munitions of all sorts are sent forward to the army under Sherman, which is stubbornly fighting its way to the very heart of the staunchest, most solid, powerful and prosperous of the Southern States. Georgia, whose voice would have killed secession as soon as born, which was apparently too remote from the North to be easily reached, but which has become the theatre of the war.

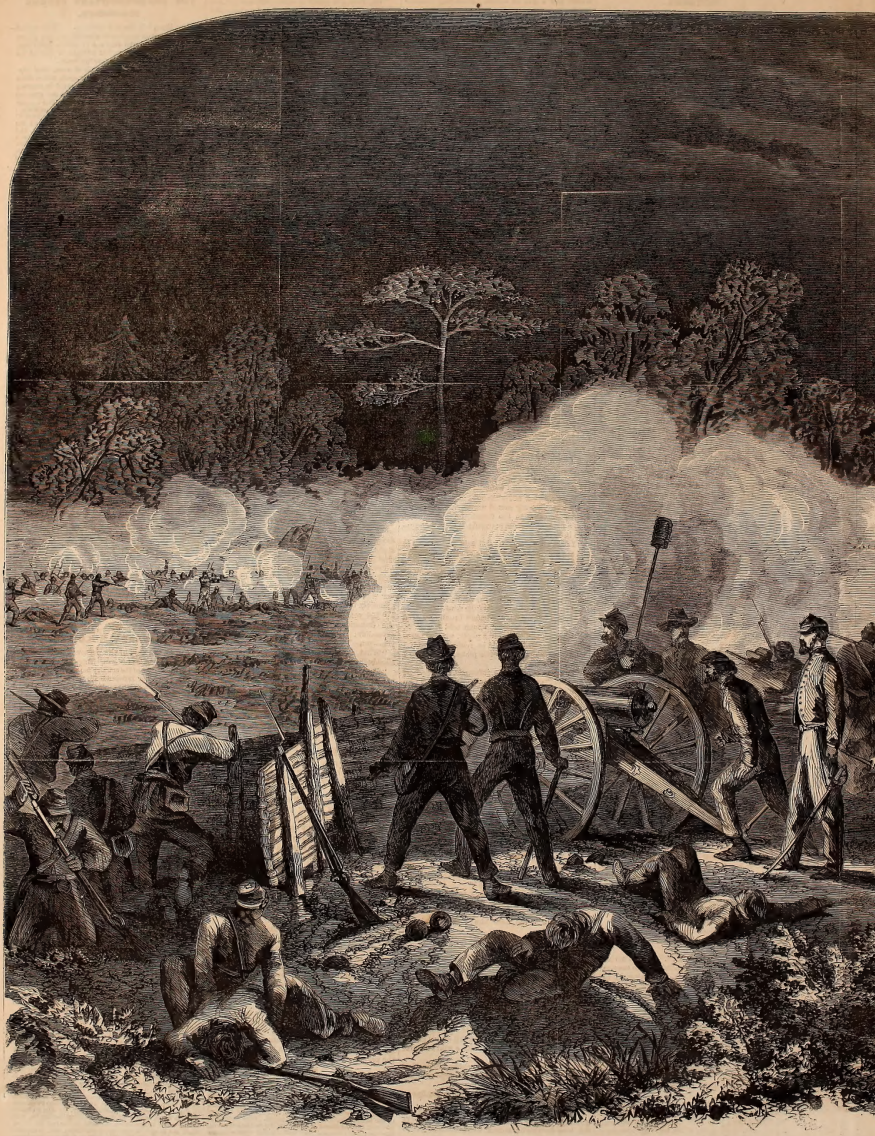
LEE'S NIGHT ATTACK ON SMITH'S BRIGADE, JUNE 3.

AFTER the fearful battle of Friday, when Grant so gallantly attempted to force the passage of the Chicahominy and actually carried some of Lee's works, a lull ensued, and night was fast coming on in a universal stillness. But suddenly, when nearly eight o'clock, and as twilight was just vanishing, Hancock's corps heard in the rebel works just by them the words of command. At once all was in motion, every man at his post, the artillery ready to open on the assailing column. They had not to wait long; over the intervening crest, clearly defined in the gathering darkness, came Beauregard's men, whose last fight was at Olustee. As the line appeared, Smith's brigade, of Gibbons's division, poured in a volley which pierced the darkness like a flash of lightning. Down, down they go in the withering storm of bullet, grape, canister and shell; but they close up and come on; volley after volley is given, but they press on the divisions of Barlow and Gibbons and the left of Wright's corps. These gallant fellows welcomed their antagonists of the morning, and drove them back with terrible loss, but so desperately did the rebels charge that some were killed in our entrenchments and others dragged inside as prisoners.

This repulse of the rebels closed the bloody work of the day, which stands the fiercest action of the war.

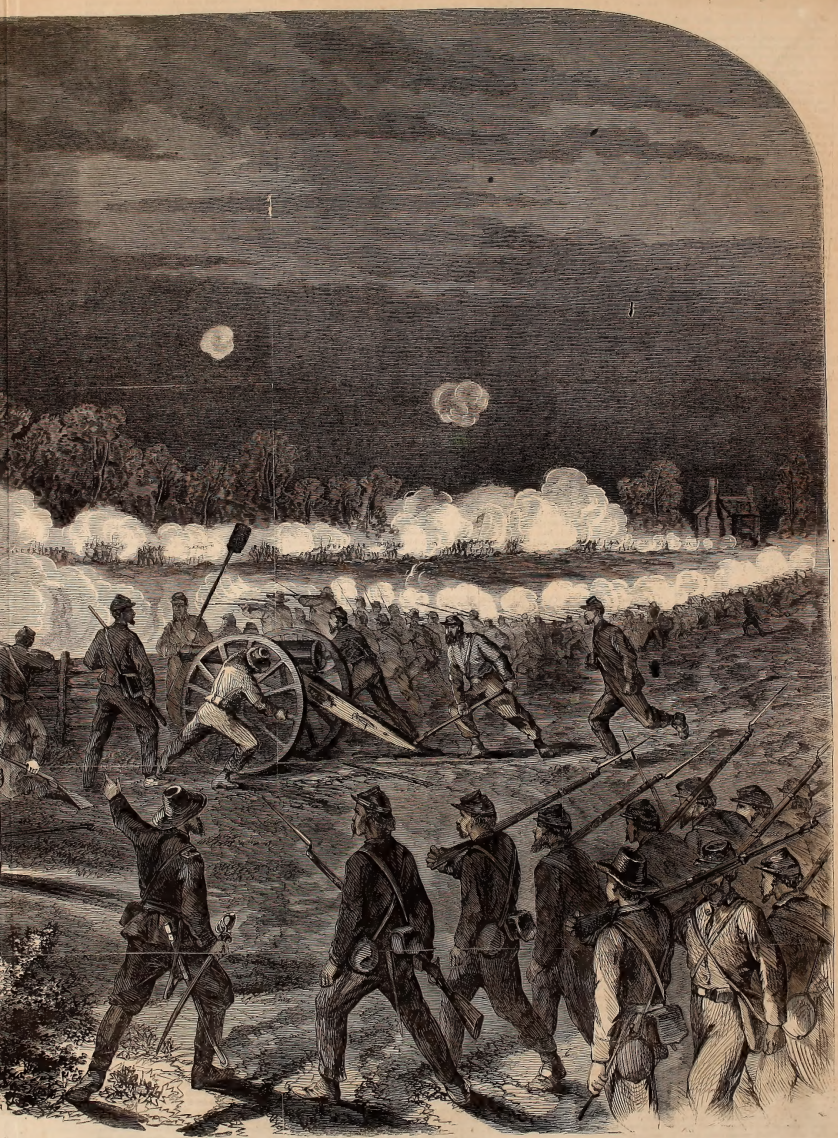
Our Artist within the lines sketched the night attack, and few will look without interest upon this triumphant resistance of the warworn heroes of the 2d army corps.

THE LAST OF THE REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.



AMONG the acts of the present Congress was a resolution tendering to the surviving soldiers of the Revolution the thanks of the country for their services in the war by which our Independence was achieved and our liberty obtained, as well as sincerely rejoicing that their lives have been protracted beyond the period usually allotted to man. A small additional pension was also given to help them in their last days. It might well have been ten times what it was, but it was something.

It was generally supposed that they were 12 in number, and some of our cotemporaries so state. In fact, however, several of them are dead, some had departed, indeed, before the matter of the new pension was mooted.



So far as we can learn all are dead except these seven, and of those some may have closed their pilgrimage already. Amaziah Goodwin, Alfred, Maine, 105; Adam Link, Annapolis, O., 102; Rev. Daniel Waldo, Syracuse, N. Y., 101; Wm. Hutchings, Penobscot, Me., 103; Alex. Marony, Gates, N. Y., 94; Samuel Downing, Edinburg, N. Y.; Lemuel Cook, Clarendon, N. Y.

THE RAIN AND ITS CAUSE.—There are many who argue that wars bring rain in summer and snowstorms in winter, and the same cause is assigned for the recent heavy storms with which we have been visited. During the wars of Napoleon the attention of the French Academy of Sciences was called to the fact that a storm of rain or snow invariably followed a battle, especially if there was heavy cannonading. This is said to have been particularly case in the Russian campaign, which was followed by such snowstorms as never before were witnessed in the south of Europe. Some of the savants declared that rapid discharges of artillery and incessant volleys of musketry produced concussion in the air, and drove the clouds out of their course; while others went so far as to adopt the theory, since advocated by Prof. Espy, that the immense smoke of a battle was of itself sufficient to produce rain. There were sceptics, however, and when the war closed it remained a mooted question. It is a fact worthy of notice that all the prominent battles on the Potomac, especially the seven days' fight before Richmond, have been followed by storms, and that the present battles have been followed by the most severe storms is a fact known to all. It is usual to have showers in the middle of May, but long continued rains are not of the ordinary course of events at this season of the year. The subject is one worthy the attention of the meteorologists, as well as all others who take any interest in the phenomena of the weather.

ELASTICITY OF IRON.—A simple illustration will serve to show two facts connected with iron; the first is its elasticity, and the second the power exerted by pressure of the hand of any person. Make a hoop of one inch square bar-iron about the size of the brim of a man's hat. Let the inside of the hoop be made quite smooth and true. Such a hoop being examined, it would appear that the power even of a horse could in no way alter its shape or form, provided the strain be put to it fairly and equably. Now make a rod of iron of the thickness of a lead-pencil, that shall exactly fit the diameter of the inside of the hoop, so that, when placed in the hoop, it will not fall out, unless the hoop be altered in shape. If, acting in a similar way, we take a child's wooden hoop, with a stick across it in the centre, and then press it at the sides opposite to that of the cross-stick, the hoop will assume an oval shape, and, of course, the cross-stick will fall out. Just so does the iron hoop described act. When any one presses it the rod falls out, showing clearly the elasticity of the iron. The hoop will become oval-shaped with a very little pressure, not greater than that which can be exerted by a young girl.

TO THE SWALLOW.

BY JOHN ANDREWS.

Swallow, cruel swallow! wherefore dost thou come
Glancing in the sunlight, by the gleaming river,
Year after year, unto thy northern home,
While youth and love are leaving us for ever?

Cruel swallow, calling up the memories
Of happy years, of what can never be,
Of friends departed, gone beyond the seas,
And faery days of childhood I never more shall see!

And boyhood's happy hours, all bright and golden,
And love's young dream in halcyon days of yore,
Beside a gleaming river, in summer days of olden,
Like a band of early blossoms, gone for evermore!

Glancing in the sunlight, every springtime coming,
Thou must be some spirit set for ever free,
When the yellow bees are in the meadows humming,
And the golden sunlight floods the earth and sea.

Oh, joyous swallow! gliding on careless wing,
Happy as the summer hours gone for ever by,
Come not, come not back again with the gentle Spring;
Stay within thy southern home, beneath thy southern sky.

For youth and friends can never come again;
And love, if gone, 'tis gone, alas! for ever!
Call not up the memories thou canst not lull to to sleep,
Gliding in the sunlight by the gleaming river.

The Serpent-Woman.

CHAPTER XII.

Tut, I have done a thousand dreadful things
As willingly as I would kill a fly;
And nothing grieves me heartily indeed
But that I cannot do ten thousand more.
Titus Andronicus, Act V., Sc. 1.

You were kneel'd to and importun'd otherwise
* * * and the fair soul herself
Weighed between loathness and obedience, at Which end o' the beam she'd bow.
Tempest, Act II., Sc. 1.

These mothers are too dreadful.
Aurora Leigh.

Marina wandered about Brittany like one fleeing rom the ever haunting presence of a spectre. Her mother's cruelty drove her to despair, and while at the height of her wild and reckless mood, Jacques Renvi crossed her path and employed every persuasion he could recall or invent to entrap her into complicity with his ruthless fraternity. But her constant reply was:

"No; your wickedness once seemed to possess a novelty and daring that charmed me, but it is stale to me now and palls upon my appetite."

"You look as melancholy as a sick brigand, and I would fain do something to rouse you, for you know I love you better than any other being in the world."

"You have a very flattering and terrible regard for me, Jacques, something like that entertained by a lion or tiger for the bespangled girl that enters his cage and displays his points to the spectators, an affection which generally ends in devouring its object. Even now you are much concerned lest I should become the prey of another."

Jacques laughed and said:

"You remind me of the mothers I have heard in their gushes of fondness for their darlings declare that they could eat them; a proof of affection your mother never showed for you."

"And you are kind to taunt me with her coldness. Alas! it is worse than that now, it is aversion. She not only refuses to acknowledge me, but even to allow me to cross her threshold."

"She refuses to acknowledge you or to let you into her house?"

"She does, and drives me from her with reproaches so bitter and unmerited as to make life seem a burden and disgrace to me."

"And why do you put up with such treatment? Why don't you revenge yourself?"

"Upon my mother? I forgot you were not human. No! Would she but acknowledge and receive me, I could forgive all and love her more devotedly than ever."

"She shall do it. I can do anything with her, for she's in my power. I can make her acknowledge half the foundlings in Bretagne if I chose. But what will you do for me, if I set you square with her? Won't you marry me for my trouble?"

"You! I'd rather die first!"

"You are complimentary. But I shall find a way to tame your obstinacy yet, if you love your mother half so well as you say you do. So I am to have no reward if I set you right with her?"

"I will give you a thousand francs for your pains."

"Are you so rich?"

"'Tis all I have; but I will cheerfully bestow it upon you if you succeed."

The bargain was struck between the strange pair, and Marina returned to the residence of Madame Nitouche in the company of Jacques Renvi. Marina was received by her mother with a look of anger.

"Marina returned hither at my instance," remarked Jacques, impudently; "I knew you would be glad to see us both."

Madame Nitouche answered with forced politeness, and Marina could perceive at a glance that Jacques did not boast of his influence with her mother without reason. Both women were, however, very ill at ease, and he, perceiving their embarrassment, said:

"Madame, I have some business with you, and should like a little talk by ourselves."

"Certainly," replied the hostess, and she would have said "with pleasure," but the words died on her lips, and she turned very pale.

No sooner were Madame Nitouche and Jacques alone than the latter broke out with:

"I will not stand your treatment to little Marina. You know that I love the girl, and that is why you abuse her. But that's not my present business; I have come for money."

"I have already given you twice as much as I ever owed you."

"All you owe me? All you possess would not repay me for all I have done for you. Haven't I lost my immortal soul in your service? Consider the deeds I have done at your bidding, of which you have reaped the benefit. Let me recount a few of them."

"No, no!" interrupted Madame Nitouche. "Why should I listen to what I know too well already? Why do you persecute your fellow in crime? Why not act fairly, like a man, instead of harassing to death a lone and defenceless woman like me."

"If I do wrong you set the example. See how you persecute Marina, your true and affectionate child."

"She is no child of mine."

"Are you blind, woman? Why, she is as like you as your own girlhood; and when a more peculiar woman in appearance than yourself is on exhibition I will pay to see the show, whatever the price. Keep this story for simpletons, for you know that I know you better. You are jealous of the girl, no doubt, but do her justice, and I'll be liberal and take her off your hands."

"What do you mean?"

"That you shall own her to be your daughter, receive her as such, and give her to me in marriage."

"Do you love her?"

"Better than booty or than life itself."

"Does she love you?"

"Well—no—not to distraction."

"Not at all, you mean."

Her wonted faint color returned to the cheeks of Madame Nitouche, her eyes brightened, and a sarcastic smile perceptibly curled her lip as she continued:

"I cannot consent to sell my daughter, for such you will have her to be, for nothing. She was educated at great expense, and ought to have a rich husband. On other terms than marriage I could get a fortune for her."

"I have nothing now; but you shall have half the plunder of Uberto's cave when I sack it."

"Have you visited the spot?"

"I have, and doubt not to find all Marina told you about the old hermit's concealed treasures to be no exaggeration. Uberto has, however, the reputation of being a holy man, and looked to me so like the pictures I have seen of the adorable saints that I put off the plundering of his hoard till surer of its worth. His munificent charities have since proved to me its richness, and I have now no scruples."

"An arch-heretic is he!" exclaimed Madame N.; "and to pillage him or take his life would be a better deed than a forty days' penance and pilgrimage."

"Enough; I'll do it. What say you to my marriage with Marina on these terms?"

"I'll do my best to forward it. I pity the girl, however, for the first time, when I think of her marriage with you. I know what it is to be married to a man and hate him; it is miserable life in the body, death in the heart, and hell in the mind. The plain rack is a recreation to it. But this is your affair and hers. I will do what I can to oblige you."

"Say yes or no in the right place, that is all I ask."

Marina found herself suddenly established in her mother's house on a fair footing, was called daughter by her parent, and treated by her with consideration, if not affection. The grateful girl took the first opportunity to thank Jacques for his intercession and to beg his acceptance of one thousand francs.

"I neither want nor will accept any money from you, Marina; I want yourself."

"You want an impossibility, Jacques."

"There is no impossibility to a man like me, Marina, who dares everything and hesitates at nothing. Your mother is wholly in my power, and at my word she dies a shameful death—the death of a criminal. I can obtain pardon and rich reward—both have been offered—by betraying her, and nothing but my love for you, for I have not the slightest regard for her, has prevented me from giving her up to justice. Ask your mother, Pierre Massue, or anybody who knows me right well, if I ever broke an oath taken upon this dagger. Long ago I swore upon it to have you for my wife, and I will sacrifice madame's life, yours, and perish myself, rather than fail to keep my word. By marrying me you save your mother's life; by refusing me, you sign her death-warrant. Again upon this hilt and this blade, too often crimsoned with her victim's blood, I swear to have you for my bride or your mother executed for murder."

It was with the bitterest scorn that Marina saw the villain salute his dagger, and replied:

"I do not believe one word you have said."

"Because every syllable I have spoken is true. When did I ever lie to you? You doubted my power over madame; have I not proved it? Ask her if her life is not in my hands."

"I will this instant, villain."

Marina darted out of the room, and after searching through the house, found her mother kneeling before a crucifix. Her daughter waited till she rose.

"That wretch, Jacques Renvi, says your life is in his hands."

"He speaks the truth."

"He has sworn on his dagger to render you up to justice—"

"Me!" shrieked Madame Nitouche, turning death's hue, and so nearly falling that she was only saved by her daughter's support.

"Oh, mother! mother! is it true? Alas! what shall I do?"

"Did he swear unconditionally that he would give me up?"

"No; but if I do not marry him."

Madame revived a little.

"And what did you reply?"

"I refused to credit a word he said, and came at once to you."

Madame Nitouche looked anxiously at her daughter; her breathing grew quick, her eager eyes began to glare, and she demanded in trembling accents:

"And now you know all, what do you intend, daughter?"

"Is there no safety but in this—this marriage, mother?"

"None, daughter. I have long been in fear of this man and his fatal knowledge. He has already extorted much money from me, and will now take my life if you do not disarm him by marrying him and making our interests almost identical."

"He, it seems, is implicated in the crimes of which he accuses you, and I cannot think he will endanger himself by betraying you."

"I know him too well to doubt him. He is an obstinate villain, fearless of death, and the oaths he swears upon his dagger's hilt are the only vows he never breaks. Besides, he can betray me and escape himself."

"Mother, I love you so much; only love me a little in return, and I will sacrifice myself cheerfully for your sake."

Madame Nitouche, overcome by the brave girl's magnanimity, caught her daughter in her arms, and kissed her fondly.

"You are a noble girl, Marina; my heart can resist you no longer, for you are a far better daughter than I deserve, and I must be a wretch indeed not to love you."

Marina wept for joy and sorrow, and returned her mother's caresses with fervent affection.

"Now must I encounter this villain whom henceforth I shall abhor worse than ever."

"Do not see Renvi again to-day, daughter; let me meet him. Wait till your present horror has passed off, ere you have another interview with him."

Marina retired to her chamber and gave way to the bitterness of spirit with which her heart was bursting. Her agony was intense and profound, and much aggravated by her remorse. It was a keen retaliation, and she felt it to the heart's core, that she who had played the jilt so often with the noble, the rich, the handsome and the good, should be snared like a bird by a common ruffian, whose touch to her seemed like leprous contamination. Marriage with him was too horrible to think of, and death itself seemed preferable. She threw herself upon the floor, wept till her tears seemed to scald her, beat her breast and lamented till morning. The love she bore Bertram still burned in her soul—a pure and holy passion—and had promised to redeem her from the evils of life she had contracted, but now was she plunged again into the abyss of infamy and lost for ever. As the day broke, she exclaimed:

"Oh, God of light! God of love! Source of infinite mercy, save me from the embrace of this murderer, and I will be thine, wholly, holily and for ever."

The morrow came, and with it the ruffian, inflexible and impatient, and thirsting to enjoy the sacrifice. Jacques Renvi had been in a hurry with his priest and preparations, and when Marina saw how near the hour of self-immolation had approached, she threw herself at his feet.

"Jacques, have mercy on me! Why force me to marry you against my will? How can I love you if you force me? If you persist, I shall hate you, but if you allow me to escape now, I shall be so grateful that I may finally love you, and consent freely to our union. By all your hopes of heaven——"

"I have not one."

"By your dread of eternal punishment——"

"I laugh at the idea."

"By your father's memory——"

"He was hung for murder."

"By your mother's honor——"

"She was a wanton and traded in love."

"By France, the land we love——"

"I hate it, for 'tis its law that will judge and condemn me."

"By the God who made you——"

"He made a wretch, why should I thank him for the work?"

"Still you would rather have love than hate. You would not wed the woman who must ever abhor you?"

"Love is a stupid fiction, but hate is a living reality. Give me but beauty enough, and I prefer hate—it is more piquant."

Marina, overpowered by the intensity of her conflicting emotions, scarcely heard the villain's last reply, for her senses failed her, and Madame Nitouche, who entered at this conjuncture, found her in a deep swoon.

"Jacques Renvi, what have you been doing to your victim?"

"I have overpersuaded her a little, but she will come to better tempered. These scenes must be performed, I suppose, and the sooner we get through them the better. After the ceremony is over she will be quiet enough."

"What do you know about woman, Jacques? You understand how to torture and dispatch them, and that is about all. You are too violent and hasty to win their affection, and without that you might safer wed a deadly serpent than Marina. Besides, your hurry is unreasonable. I would not have my daughter wed a beggar, and you have not a sou. Where is the wealth you swore to obtain from Uberto's cave and divide with me, ere you claimed Marina's hand?"

"I see you intend to balk me."

"I see you are a fool and balk yourself. Redeem your promise and you shall have Marina without these scenes which are of your own making. Have I not always abided by my agreement? You have hardly ever kept yours, but I'll make you stand by your last at the hazard of my life."

Marina, who had been gradually reviving under her mother's restorative treatment, caught enough of the interlocutor's meaning to understand that the secret of Uberto's cave had been betrayed to Jacques, and that her marriage was delayed till the robbery of her friend was consummated. The knowledge of this treachery renewed Marina's agitation, and her mother, fancying that the presence of her dreadful fiancé produced this effect, sent Jacques away, enjoining him not to return without the booty he had promised her.

The thoughts of those conspiring against Marina's peace were quick and keen, but hers were more rapid and piercing than theirs. Within an hour after the close of her exciting interview with her betrothed, she had recovered sufficiently to procure and dispatch a messenger to her venerable friend Uberto, in Savoy, with a missive for him, containing these lines:

"Dear and Venerated Father—You are betrayed to a robber who seeks your hermitage to despoil, and if you resist, to murder you. You will know him by the ruddy glare of his deep sunken eyes, the scar of a sabre cut on his forehead and his gigantic proportions. If you become his victim, I shall be his next, for he has destined to a worse fate than death,
Your devoted daughter,
Marina."

Marina waited the return of her messenger, to whom she had promised a munificent reward, with feverish impatience. He performed the journey with almost unexampled speed, but yet to his expectant the few days of his absence appeared as intolerable as a weary age. At last his return, with an answer from the hermit, relieved her suspense. She tore open the note with the quickness of light, and read:

"Thanks to your warning, daughter. Come and behold the fate of my murderer's guest, or of—"Uberto."

Marina set out for Savoy at once. In a few days she arrived at Uberto's cave, just as the sun was setting. She entered the rocky habitation in great anxiety and fear. All was silent and void inside, and her heart sank, chill and despairing, within her. At length she mustered courage to call. A strange echo replied like a response from the dead. She had just given up all for lost, when a door at the extremity of the cavern opened, and she beheld the hermit, pale, awful and majestic.

"Father!" she cried, rushing towards him.

"Stop! he shouted, pointing to a narrow abyss that suddenly opened between them, adding in thrilling tones, "Beware of the murderer's fate?"

She gazed down the murmuring chasm, and saw by the light of a torch the hermit held an object hanging on a projecting rock some fifty feet below. She failed to recognise it at first, but as her sight grew clearer it assumed to her the appearance of a mutilated corpse. A scarlet vest and a long red beard afforded her a clue which enabled her to identify the remains.

"It is Jacques Renvi!" she cried; "God hav mercy upon his soul!"

"Amen!" responded the hermit. "Your messenger did not reach me an hour too soon, daughter, for this villain visited me the same evening that I received your warning. A storm was coming on, and he begged for shelter and food. I gave him both, and he pretended to sleep, but about midnight sprang lightly to his feet, rushed upon me and threatened instant death, unless I unlocked my hoard to him, and gave him all. I gave him the key of this door, which he unlocked and opened, beholding an array of riches which would have startled even an old Buccaneer. He fell back a step, and I sprang this trap, which precipitated him into the chasm beneath. As he fell he clutched at the jagged protruberances of the rock, and struck finally upon the sharp point from which he now hangs, and which it seems broke his back. I let down a rope to him, but he had neither the sense or strength left to grasp at it. I tried to lower myself to him, but found that I was too feeble to effect my purpose, and in the attempt narrowly escaped sharing his fate. In a few hours his moans subsided, soon all was silence, and his soul had fled to its eternal home."

"It was a horrible death!"

"Why did you not keep my secret, Marina? Behold the consequences of your betrayal!"

CHAPTER XIII.

In the silence of the night,
How we shiver with affright.—Poe.

Rather let me see
Death, all, than such a being.
Sardanapalus, Act IV., Sc. 1.

Elfstone's beautiful statue, his "Lost Love," had, after a long delay, been brought from France to Ellingford Hall, England, and was taken to the sculptor's studio, where it was unpacked and afterwards raised by the artist and his friends. The latter, especially St. Croix, feared that his trial would, in the frame of mind in which he was at the time, further unsettle his reason and endanger his sanity. These apprehensions proved to be only too well-founded, for he had gazed long on the statue ere his mind began to wander, and he to address the stone as a living and sentient being.

"Daughter," said he, "your fate is growing sad, like my own. We are both deserted. Instead of the love for which our souls are thirsting, we are compelled to drink the waters of bitterness till our hearts petrify. Where's Bertram, your gay gallant? He is too false and fair and fleeting. Why should the ruthless wanderer triumph in your long pining and heart slavery?" I will emulate the Roman father, and, though it break my heart, will release your spirit from its marble prison house."

St. Croix stood aghast, and knowing Elfstone uncontrollable mood, was utterly at a loss what to do. While he was trying to devise some method by which to divert his friend's mind from the dangerous channel into which it was thrown, a hand was laid lightly on his shoulder, and upon turning his head he beheld Bertram Hapswell, smiling and happy.

"He is going to destroy the statue," said St. Croix.

"I care not; I have found the original."

"See how his eye is kindling with his old madness! What a fatal fire is beginning to burn in his soul! Is it not a shame to witness the destruction of so noble a work of art?"

"Nature excels it; but fear nothing."

While Elfstone was looking round the room for some implements, Bertram took his place beside the statue, clasping it about the waist, and affecting to treat it with the tenderness of a beloved human being.

"Is that woman alive?" demanded a lady, thickly veiled, standing near St. Croix.

He smiled at the simplicity of the question, but did not reply, as Elfstone was at the moment approaching the statue with an ancient partisan in his hand, and the gazers were held in breathless suspense. Bertram, without apparently heeding the sculptor, said:

"The 'Lost Love' is found, and her lover will shield her with his life."

The solemn earnestness of Bertram's tone, credible as the beating of the heart of sincerity, so wrought upon the destructive artist, that he threw away his weapon in an instant, and rushed into the arms of the speaker.

"I have done you injustice, forgive me!"

"Willingiy, but never doubt me again."

"Never!"

Bertram, finding his old friend exhausted by his paroxysm, led him from the apartment, and after soothing him into tranquillity left him in charge of a servant, accustomed to tend and control him in his dangerous moods, and returned to the studio. He found St. Croix gazing at the veiled lady, and the lady with her eyes fixed upon the statue.

"Muta," he said, "you need conceal your face no longer. This is an old friend of your father's, who will be delighted to recognise you."

The young lady submissively lifted her veil, as St. Croix was presented to her. He was startled at the sight of the lovely countenance it revealed to him.

"What a marvellous resemblance," he exclaimed.

"Is it not perfect? Ah, Julien, I have heard you expatiate eloquently upon the recorded wonders of Providence, but never listened to one that transcended in strangeness the story of this little one's rescue from the frightful ogre who held her in captivity. Even you at first mocked the inspiration that impelled me to undertake her recovery, but yet I assure you I was not an hour, not a minute, too soon to save her from a fate infinitely worse than death. Your own eyes afford sufficient evidence to convince you that she is Muta Elfstone, our old friend's only daughter, which can doubtless be legally proved, but it appears to me that her father has been too much excited to-day to endure with safety so thrilling a revelation as this will prove to him."

"You are right, Bertram. Is this young lady's mother living?"

"From what I can gather I infer that she died in America about twelve years ago."

"They took her away from me when I was very little," said a sweet and almost childlike voice, "but she often comes to me at night, when everything is very still."

The young man smiled upon the innocent, and exchanged glances.

"Let us cover up this Lost Love," said Bertram, "and adjourn with the Found one to the drawing-room, where you shall hear her story from her own lips."

Muta watched Bertram narrowly as he carefully shrouded the exquisite statue, and started as she saw him kiss its beautiful shoulder, little weening that its resemblance to hers provoked the salute.

The three young friends spent the evening together, Muta recounting in her simple way the story of her life, and picturing, as well as she could, the dreary years she had spent in the society of Gregory Grimgrip and Espeth, his deaf and dumb housekeeper.

When her tale was told and sufficiently commented upon, St. Croix inquired:

"How old is this Gregory Grimgrip?"

"There is no telling," said Bertram; "he is so ugly that his age does not show."

"He must be more than fifty."

"Or than sixty, perhaps; but he appears to be full of life and energy, and had not the burglars taken him by surprise, he would have rendered a fatal account of some of them. As it was, he almost brought his pistol to bear on me, and proved as much as three strong men and two women could manage. The disappearance of his intended bride must perplex him sadly."

"If he lacks youth and beauty, he does not want assurance."

"You might well say so, if you could conceive what a hideous old creature it is. In aspiring to the hand of the heiress of Ellingford, he has evinced an audacity truly Satanic."

"Do you think he would have advanced her claim to the estate?"

"Doubtless; after Elfstone's death. He is very rich himself, and possessed of demoniacal cunning as well as effrontery. He was, however, recently preparing to make a voyage to Australia or some other distant land, where he would probably have remained in obscurity till he received the news of Elfstone's decease, when he would have returned to England and come boldly forward with Muta as his wife and the heiress of Ellingford. Commend me to Master Gregory Grimgrip for a deep, daring and unconscionable schemer."

You excite in me a curiosity to behold the monster."

I will show him to you, if you will accompany me to Liverpool next week, where I have to meet him to render the Court due explanation relative to the part I have taken in this business."

"Don't go near him!" besought Muta. "He will pay somebody to kill you."

"Is he in the habit of doing that sort of thing?"

"Don't you remember I told you that, after the young man you tell me was your brother saw me on the stairs, I heard Gregory—he always made me call him so—I heard Gregory promise a thousand dollars to a big, rough fellow, if Mr. Kingsland happened to die within the next fortnight. I could not make out what he meant for a long time, but since I have learned it I have been more afraid of him than ever."

"His experience with Victor is not calculated to encourage him to renew such attempts, even if this were a country affording impunity to assassins and their suborners. I have not the slightest apprehension of personal violence from Mr. Grimgrip. He will seek revenge of me by other means, and is, no doubt, already concocting plots against my peace."

Bertram was now sent for by Mordaunt Elfstone, and the three friends separated, Muta being delivered into the care of the buxom housekeeper, who nearly fainted at the sight of her.

"What's the matter, Mrs. Barton?" demanded Bertram.

"Oh, Mr. Hapswell! who is this—this young lady?"

"Whom do you think she is?"

"She frightened me so—I thought first she was my missis come to life again, but if her daughter be living, this is she."

"You have guessed aright, Mrs. Barton, but you must keep our secret till to-morrow, for it is not yet ripe for disclosure."

The old lady was now dissolved in tears of joy, and in her transports unable to restrain her impulse to embrace and kiss her young mistress, whom she had nursed when an infant. Muta, whose nature seemed full of affection, returned her caresses with warmth, and wept with her, she knew not why.

Bertram left them together and sought the presence of his afflicted and venerated friend. He found him comparatively calm and apparently sane in every point save Bertram's marriage with his daughter, as he now called his statue, which would, he said, if it took place on the morrow, have a very tranquillizing restorative effect upon his mind. Bertram could not refuse compliance with his friend's wishes, albeit he dreaded the consequences, and resolved to keep the romantic mummery so close that none of Elfstone's vigilant relations should ever hear of it. He left his prospective father-in-law in a state of high contentment, and retired himself to dream of Muta and the statue, sometimes fancying that both were alive, and at others that both were marble. At last he thought that both were threatened with destruction by the demented author of their being. As he saw the old man rushing at them with his long rusty partisan, he felt himself turning into stone and unable to stir to the rescue. A terrible blow was descending upon the brow of Muta when his agony awoke him.

He had not been awake but a few seconds ere he heard a heavy fall and crash over his head in Elfstone's studio, which caused him to leap from his bed, thrust himself into his dressing-gown and slippers, and run up into the room from which the sounds proceeded. All seemed quiet therein, and the ghostly light of the moon slept tranquilly on the floor. The old sculptor was not in the apartment, and the curtains that shrouded the statue appeared not to have been disturbed. Our hero retired quietly and shut the door softly, and was about to descend the stairs when he paused for a moment and pondered on the strangeness and distinctness of the sounds he had heard, and turned back to make assurance doubly sure. Suddenly and noiselessly he re-entered the studio, and saw, or thought he saw, by the light of the moon which fell upon it, the marble head of the statue thrust out from between the curtains and gazing at him with a frightened and fascinated look. There was no mistaking the beauty of that marble face, and strange thoughts chased one another like lightning through his brain as he stood there spellbound. An awful sense of the supernatural froze his blood and chilled his heart, and as the apparition gradually withdrew, and the curtains fell, hiding it from view, Bertram sank senseless upon the floor. When consciousness came back to him he found himself lying in his bed, and after some minutes' wonderment concluded that he had had a very vivid, strange and painful dream, and lay awake nearly an hour thinking about it. At last he sank again into a sleep, from which he did not awake till late the next morning.

A Natural Curiosity.—A natural curiosity, which completely puzzles naturalists and geologists, is now in possession of Isaac S. Josephi, the wholesale jeweller, on Washington street, San Francisco. It is an irregular hexagonal quartz crystal, about one inch in diameter and two inches in length, pointed at one end, and broken squarely off at the base. Within the body of the crystal, rising from the base like a miniature mountain, and occupying about half the entire length of the stone, is a mass of beautifully crystallized gold, silver and copper, each metal distinctly defined, and all embedded in the stone, which is as clear as glass, in exactly the style of the flowers and other objects in a glass paperweight. This curious specimen of the handiwork of nature, when in an eccentric tone of mind, was found by a miner at Gold Gulch, Calaveras county, some four years ago, and has been carried round in his pocket ever since, until some two months ago, when it was purchased by the superintendent of a copper mine, and sent to the present possessor as a curiosity. Geologists who have examined it declare that nothing of the kind has ever been seen or heard of before, and are utterly at a loss to account for its formation.

A Lady asked a pupil at a national school, "What was the sin of the Pharisees?"

"Eating camels, marm," quickly replied the child. She had read that the Pharisees "strained at gnats and swallowed camels."

POINT BLANK.

You complain that I am narrow,
Going straightly to my aim:
Will you quarrel with the arrow
For the same?

Many a bitter word hast thou:
"Pedant," bigot." Keep thy blame
While that sword, and nail, and plough
Are the same.

I would cleave my world-path cleanly
With an axe', a razor' edge;
Drive my truth through, not more meanly
Than a wedge.

Far is wide, though force is narrow:
Look straight to thy aim!
Crystal, bud, and flame, and arrow,
Are the same.

CHIT-CHAT WITH THE LADIES.

Pincushions.

When feminine human nature wants to bestow a gift, and is uncertain as to what its nature should be, it always pitches upon a pincushion. When it is asked suddenly what it will contribute to any benevolent object, it at once says: "A dozen pincushions." When it has nothing to do with its fingers, it makes a pincushion. Millions of those cushions have been bought for the sake of the heathen—for the sake of young ministers about to be dispatched on missions, lately millions more for the soldiers.

The cushions manufactured for their good would, stitched together, make comfortable mattresses for the whole army, and leave some over for pillows.

Very industrious, certainly. But, alas! not original. Persons go to Fairs, gaze about them, remember with a groan the closets full of pincushions at home, and go away without investing. Young men are stuffed, so to speak, with pincushions—mamas, sisters, maiden aunts and young lady friends bestow them in showers. Old gentlemen are in the same condition—the ladies can make them for themselves—and we would respectfully suggest to the managers of the next fancy Fair, that with an eye to fair returns they publish this announcement: "All contributions thankfully received, except pincushions."

Girls' Friendship.

It is all very well, very charming, very touching, very everything superlative for a long, long while, perhaps. Araminta and Angelina are very like "twin cherries." They sit upon one cushion, and work one flower upon one sampler. They buy their bonnets of one milliner, and wear dresses "just alike." Living two or three blocks apart, they keep messengers going to and fro with little scented billets all day long, exchange rings, kisses, etc., etc. All is perfect—there is no flaw in their love until some day, or evening, they discover a cloud upon the horizon in the shape of an admirer. From that moment rain is threatened—pretty soon it storms. That young gentleman waltzes with Araminta, and Angelina pouts. He sings duets with Angelina, and Araminta wonders at it. Next day Araminta sends for "the pattern of the peasant's bodice," and Angelina, "with her compliments," "would like that book returned." Jealousy has entered in. Rival belles never practise Siamesetwin needlework, one sampler, one rose, one cushion, etc. At the end of three months the once boasted friendship is a dream, and Miss Angelina has only "a bowing acquaintance with Miss Araminta."

Run-Over.

Pray, can any one tell us what the policemen stand at the corners of Broadway for? There are enough of them, one would think, if they are placed there for the purpose of protecting persons who cross the street and become entangled in the whirlpool of wheels and horses' hoofs, from being run over, to effect their object. Yet, despite their presence, accidents happen every day, and as usual nobody is to blame.

A few weeks since, the young mother of three small children was killed almost under the eyes of one of these military-looking sentinels, who probably considered himself rather ornamental than useful, and as you or I may meet the same fate any day, for all the care that is taken of us, it sets us thinking. If the first policeman who allowed any one run-over on his corner were sent—(well, say to the seat of war), in company with the driver who was looking over his shoulder when he crushed his victim, as drivers generally are, we fancy fewer accidents would occur; and meanwhile, give this piece of advice to ladies, young and old—put no faith in the tall policeman who pretends to protect you across Broadway.

The Children in the Country.

Children at least enjoy the country thoroughly.

Papa may find it too far from the grand emporium of cigars and exhilarating beverages—the club, the theatre, &c. Mama may miss her milliner, her shop-excursions down Broadway, and her dearest friend, who knows all the scandal. Miss Rosabella may sigh for society, and wonder how any one can like the country. But the children have no such doubts, no such regrets. They laugh in very glee at every sunrise; there is so much to do in that "lee lang simmer day."

Out in the mould picking "such beautiful flowers"—dandelions and daisies, probably.

Digging with toy spades little gardens, in which flowers, without roots, are planted, making rivers and canals, sailing boats on small pools, enthusiastically called "lakes," climbing trees, discovering such "cunning little mice," or "darling squirrels," laying plots and plans to entrap all the birds, and take them in cages to the city; eating all sorts of berries without being poisoned; chewing sour sorrell; losing themselves, and being found asleep, and not the least frightened; coming in at meal times to eat such piles of bread and butter and fruit, which the good farmer's wife asserts to be "the way of growing young uns," and you, remembering the sickly city appetites of the nursery at home, qualify with "in the country." And doing all with a gusto which sets pa to wondering "How it would do now to buy a place up here," and mama to planning a house with spare bedrooms, and visits from Miss Johnson.

The country, the real genuine country, is the place for children all summer.

Lackadaisical.

What an odd word that is to look at, and how well it expresses its meaning, queer old-fashioned thing!

Did you ever see a lackadaisical woman, some one rejoicing in the fact of untold miseries, griefs that cannot be uttered, &c.? She never had any real trouble; solid grief makes people cold and harsh and sad, but not lackadaisical; the lackadaisical girl wants a shaking, a good shaking by the shoulders, nothing else; she is frequently set up in business on very small stock.

Some young man, for who she never cared, having married some one else after asking her to dance with him twice, is enough. Blighted hopes, broken heart, &c., are the consequences, and until she dies, married or single, the lackadaisical lady glides about with her head on one side, alluding vaguely to the "woes of her youth," and astonishing strangers by floods of tears.

BOOK NOTICES.

The Phrenological Journal, we perceive, begins a new volume. Fowler & Wells, the publishers, are too well-known and their journal too firmly established to require more than the most passing allusion to it. The public has given a verdict in its favor long since.

We have received from Mr. B. W. Hitchcock, 14 Chambers street, "The Illustrated National Handbook," a complete compendium of the political history of the country from the original formation of the Government to the present time, a work of general usefulness that no one can fail to appreciate. It is just such a summary of useful information as every one needs for reference. It seems to be prepared with judgment and accuracy.

"The Army and Navy Handbook," by the same house, is a full and complete guide to the soldier or marine in all matters pertaining to his duties, his obligations and his rights; and just what to do to obtain his rights without the aid of outside assistance, thereby saving much annoyance, time and money. The work also contains everything of interest to the soldier or marine connected with the War and Navy Departments, together with a full and complete historical record of events connected with the war for the Union.

Neighbor Jackwood. By the Author of "Cudjo's Cave." Boston: Tilton.
Mr. Trowbridge has won an enviable position among American novelists, and sustains his reputation in this work. The characters are well drawn; but we will not, we trust, be considered captious in expressing the wish that he had given a few more really superior in stamp. The heroine is what heroines must be, perfection, or nearly that, of course; but the rest are too much below her. The mystery attendant on her is well managed, indeed the solution would scarcely occur till nearly the close of the volume.

The Portrait Monthly. Vol. II., No. 1. New York: T. B. Leggett & Co.
We have so recently called attention to this work and its merit that we need not here enlarge. We can only express our satisfaction to see its new volume opening so auspiciously. The number opens with the gallant Gen. McPherson, and closes with Col. Cross, 5th New Hampshire, who not long since fell in battle, thus closing a gallant life.

THE VALLEY OF DEATH IN JAVA.

The destructive agency of carbonic acid gas on animal life is well exemplified in certain places where large quantities are evolved from the earth. The most striking instance, however, is the celebrated valley of Java, which, if an animal enters he never leaves. The following interesting account is given by the eye witness:

We took with us two dogs and some fowls to try experiments in this prisoner's hollow. On arriving at the foot of the mountain we dismounted and scrambled up the side about a quarter of a mile, holding on by the branches of the trees. When within a few yards of the valley we experienced a strong nauseous, suffocating smell, but on coming close to the edge this disagreeable odor left us. The valley appeared to be about half a mile in circumference; the depth from 30 to 35 feet, and the whole covered with skeletons of human beings, tigers, pigs, deers, peacocks, and all sorts of birds. We could not perceive any vapor or any opening in the ground, which last appeared to us to be of a hard sandy substance.

It was now proposed by one of the party to enter the valley, but at the spot where we were this was difficult, at least for me, as one false step would have brought us to eternity. Seeing no assistance of a bamboo, we went down within 18 feet of the bottom. Here we did not experience any difficulty in breathing, but an offensive, nauseous smell annoyed us. We now fastened a dog to the end of a bamboo, 18 feet long, and sent him in. We had our watches in our hands, and in 14 seconds he fell on his back; he did not move his limbs or look round, but continued to breathe a few minutes. We then sent another, or rather he got loose and walked in to where the other dog was lying. He then stood quite still, and in 10 seconds fell on his face, and never afterwards moved his limbs; he continued to breathe seven minutes. We now tried a fowl, which died in a minute and a half. We threw in another, which died before reaching the ground.

During these experiments we experienced a heavy shower of rain, but were so interested by the awful sight before us that we did not care for getting wet. On the opposite side, near a large stone, was the skeleton of a human being, who must have perished on his back, with his right hand under his head. From being exposed to the weather the bones were bleached as white as ivory. I was anxious to procure this skeleton, but an attempt to get it would have been madness.

Household Knowledge.—Windows are kept free from ice by painting the glass with alcohol with a brush or sponge.

Odors from boiling ham, cabbage, etc., are prevented by throwing red pepper-pods or a few pieces of charcoal into the pot.

A cement, which is a good protection against weather, water and fire to a certain extent, is made by mixing a gallon of water with two gallons of brine, then stir in two and a half pounds of brown sugar and three pounds of common salt. Put it on with a brush like paint.

Put potatoes of equal size into water while boiling; when done, pour off the water, scatter in some salt, cover the pot with a coarse cloth, and return it to the fire for five minutes, when they are ready for the table; even watery potatoes are thus made mealy.

Common cut nails are easily driven into hard wood if rubbed with a little soft soap; saliva is better than nothing for that purpose.

The best way to cook a potato is to bake or roast it in an oven; when done, crack the skins open and allow them to dry out for a few minutes before placing them on the table.

To avoid family quarrels, let the quarrelling wretch have it all to himself; reply never a word.

To make cider vinegar, take the water in which dried apples have been soaked and washed, strain it well, and add a pound of sugar.

For French rolls, add two ounces of butter and a little salt to a pint of boiled milk; while tepid, sift in one pound of flour, one beaten egg, one tablespoon of yeast; beat these altogether well: when risen, form the rolls with as little handling as possible; bake on tins.

Ozonized water is now used for drinking and the toilette. It is advertised in London in the following style: "Its use is attended by a sensation which has been aptly described as 'the perfume of purity.' Being perfectly innoxious and tasteless, a few drops make a most refreshing and invigorating addition to the tumbler of plain drinking or soda water, from which they remove all trace of soluble organic matter—a fact of infinite importance to the voyager or the invalid. When employed for the toilet, bath, &c., it removes from the mouth all impure and foreign tastes and odors, whether arising from natural or artificial causes, such as the practice of smoking, and counteracts the irritation and morbid effects of carious teeth. It purifies and softens the skin, and tends to promote a healthy state of the whole body, by removing all secretions, and restoring a wholesome condition."

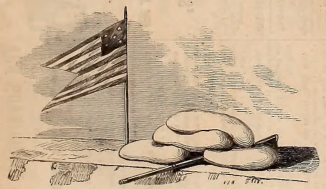
WAR IN VIRGINIA—COAL HARBOR, THE SCENE OF STONEWALL JACKSON'S FLANK MOVEMENT AND OF GRANT'S RECENT OPERATIONS.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, EDWIN FORBES.

COLD HARBOR.

COLD HARBOR, called in many of our papers Coal Harbor, has come into considerable prominence, and will live hereafter in Virginia annals with its countless other battlefields. The name Coal Harbor has been remarked upon as a sad misnomer. It is simply a sad perversion. Its real name is Cold Arbor, and the hamlet derives that name from a neighboring plantation once owned by Cesar Dabney, who gave it the name. An Englishman, or one of our more Northern friends, would have called it Cool Arbor, but it is a curious fact that from Southern lips you seldom hear the word cool. Everything is cold or hot. They go to extremes, and do not halt at intervening stages. What Cold Harbor actually is the graphic sketch of our Artist at the front portrays with characteristic fidelity.

PICNIC AT SCHACH'S PARK, BROOKLYN,

For the German Hospital Fund.



NOR content with their contributions to the Sanitary Fairs and similar institutions or organizations, our German fellow-citizens have an especial hospital fund, and on the 13th of June a picnic for its benefit came off at Schach's Park, East Brooklyn, which must have been highly successful. A procession of Turner and of five or six military companies marched to the spot in the morning, and great numbers of men, women and children, in fitting garb arrayed, flocked thither during the day, on charitable deeds intent, enjoying themselves in the usual orderly and reasonable amusements which prevail among them. We hope to give, as early as possible, a definite statement of the amount realized for the benevolent object in view by this monster picnic.

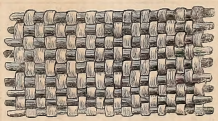
GRANT'S CAMPAIGN—PORTION OF THE LINE OF DEFENCE BETWEEN THE JAMES AND APPOMATTOX.—SKETCHED FROM THE PICKET LINE BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, E. F. MULLEN.—SEE PAGE 238.



SANDBAG FOR MUSKETRY—GUIDON FORWORK.

GRANT'S LINES SOUTH OF THE JAMES.

THE sudden transfer of operations by Gen. Grant from the old battle-ground on the Chickahominy, already historic from the bloody campaign of 1862, and laden with the deadly miasma of the Chickahominy swamps, to the point south of James river occupied already by Gen. Butler, gives that comparatively fresh locality additional interest to the public.

We are happy, therefore, to be able to lay before our readers two sketches of the fortifications between the James and Appomattox. One view is taken from within, showing the shelter tents within the works, and the men manning the line awaiting an attack of the enemy. The other shows the same line sketched from the picket line, and gives an idea of the works as thrown up by Gen. Gilmore under Gen. Butler, to defend the position taken at Bermuda Hundred. The means of defence, the lines of wires, the chevaux de frise, as well as the sanding protection for the men, will all be viewed with interest.

This has now become the base of Grant's operations. There is no longer fear of attack. The fear is reversed. Those who exulted at Smith's departure look blank at his return and the concentration of Grant's whole force.

FASCINES PROTECTING EMBRASURES.

DISTANCE OF THE SUN.—Mr. Stone, principal assistant at the Greenwich Observatory, has been making a series of calculations on the position of the sun, deduced from observations made at Greenwich on the planet Mars at his recent opposition made in Australia. The result is that the sun is found to be 3,000,000 of miles nearer to the earth than previous calculations have made it.

TELEGRAPH WIRES IN FRONT OF WORKS.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

OTHELLO IN THREE COLORS.—When in 1852 "Moses" was produced as the Grand Opera, Parts, the singer who played Amenophis, an Egyptian prince, entered into his character nearly as much as the Othello mentioned by Mr. Dickens, who blacked himself all over. He stained his face, neck and arms of a good Egyptian brownish black, but there his painting arrangements ended, and he depended for his dusky legs on the "maillot" maker of the theatre. At the very last moment, however, the prince's legs had not arrived. "Quoi faire?" There was nothing to do but don a pair of those flesh-colored tight garments usually worn by ballet girls on the stage. The want of local color, however, was soon discovered, and not approved of, and after the first act Amenophis was forced to scrub himself to a lighter hue, more in harmony with his legs. This carried him pretty well through the second act, in which he sang well, was applauded, and got excited, as he rushed off at the end of Act II. he saw the turnip tailor with his black breeches and forgetful of the change he had made above, he caught them on, and appeared—changing Egyptians into Hindoos—a Hindoo in flesh and blood, a Georgian to the ships, and a nigger below. It was too much for the audience, and entirely endangered the success of "Moise."

CHARLOTTE, MY DARLING.

Charlotte, my darling! the dinner is waiting,
The voice of the waiter is heard on the stair;
The grunts on their bosoms their napkins are pinning—
Charlotte, my darling! why linger there?
O, hast thou forgotten how hungry we feel?
Or hast thou determined to starve the staid bo tie?
We may be too late and small not get any,
Charlotte, my darling! have pity on me!

Charlotte, my darling! come down from your toilet,
The fair crayon gleam in the jelly's mild light;
O, where is the spell that can stay in pinnipinding?
Come down as you are, or I shall 'get a bite.
Charlotte, my darling! my faint voice is calling:
Ere long will be vanished both pudding and tart;
I shall no bie, and they won't leave me any—
O, why died thou bolter then bowed my heart!
I know I'm too late, and they won't give me any,
O, why didst thou loiter, thou loved of my heart!

A CITIZEN OF NEW HARTFORD tells that the first time he attended church he was a little (no year old) was seated in a pew. Upon his coming home he was asked what he did in church, when he replied:

"I went into a cupboard and took a seat on the shelf."

PRINTERS' MISTAKES.—During the Mexican war one of the English newspapers hurriedly announced an important item of news from Mexico, that Gen. Pillow and 5 of his men had been less in a bottle (battle). Some other paper informed the public not long ago, that a man in a town across the river was arrested for being found in a charge of swearing and using insulting language to a lady's weather. The stolen property was found in the possession of the accused. A friend, seeing his danger, descending the river, came in contact with a steamboat, and no service was the better for the fact that great exertions were necessary to save it. An English paper once stated that the Russian czar, Nicholas, somewhat was found dead with a long sword (sword) in his mouth. It was, perhaps, the same paper that, giving a description of a battle between the Poles and Russians, said that the conflict was dreadful, and the enemy were repulsed with great laughter (slaughter). Again: A gentleman was recently found guilty of having assisted in the escape of a lady from the county, and was fined.

A POETICAL genius was hauled up before one of the police magistrates for kissing a handsome young girl and kicking up a dust, and the following examination took place:

Magistrate: "Is your name John Ray?"

Prisoner: "Yes, your honor, so the people say."

Magistrate: "Was it you that kissed the girl and raised the alarm?"

Prisoner: "Yes, your honor, but I thought it was no harm."

Magistrate: "You rascal, did you come here to make rhymes?"

Prisoner: "No, your honor; but it will happen sometimes."

Magistrate: "Be off, you sca mp—get out of my sight!"

Prisoner: "Thank'ee, your honor, than I'll tell you good night."

OBEYING THE PRIEST.—An Irishman made a sudden rush into a druggist's shop, took from the counter a soda-water bottle, filled to the brim with some pure liquor, and handing it across the counter, exclaimed:

"There, doctor, sauf that, wit you?"

The doctor did as he was directed, and pronounced the liquor to be genuine whiskey.

"Thank you, doctor," said the Irishman; "Hand it to me again if you please."

The doctor again did as he was directed, and asked what he meant.

"Och, bliss," said Pat, "if you will have it, the priest told me not to drink any of this unless I got it from the doctor. So here's your health and the grace of both."

A COUNTRY school-teacher, preparing for an exhibition of his school, selected a class of pupils and wrote down the questions which he would put to them on examination day. The day arrived and so did the hopeful and his class. The pupils took their places as had been arranged, and all went on glibly until the question of the absentee came, when the teacher asked:

"In whom do you believe?"

"In Napoleon Bonaparte!" was the answer quickly returned.

"You believe in the Holy Catholic Church, do you not?"

"No," said the youngster, amid the roars of laughter, "the boy that believes in that church have to go to school to-day, he's at home sick abed."

THE other evening a gentleman's button caught hold of the fringe of a lady's shawl.

"I am attached to you," said the gentleman, laughing, while he was industriously trying to get loose.

"The attachment is mutual," was the good humored reply.

A NOISY SET.—An old lady residing an seeing the death of a venerable and distinguished lawyer, who was stated to be the "father of the Philadelphia Bar," exclaimed:

"Poor man! he had a dreadful noisy set of children!"

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

WHAT THE ILLUSTRIOUS ABERNETHY SAID—"Well, sir, what's the matter?" said Abernethy to a great English surgeon, to a cadaverous looking patient who had called to consult him. "Oh, nothing serious," was the reply. "My stomach and liver are out of order, that's all." "Do you call that nothing serious," said Abernethy. "I tell you sir, that when those two organs are out of order, as you tell it, there is quite a spare inch of the body that is not more or less diseased, nor a drop of blood in it that is in a healthful condition." No small can be more true, and therefore it is of the very highest importance that the stomach and liver be in a healthful condition. If the one is weak and the other irregular in its functions, less and suffering will follow. HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS, the most genial vegetable restorative and alterative that has ever been administered as a cure for Dyspepsia and Liver Disease. It is recommended by distinguished surgeons and physicians of the United States Army, by Officers of the Army and Navy, by our first authors, by eminent clergymen, in fact, by thousands of the most intelligent of every class, as an unequalled protective against epidemic and malarious diseases, and as a perfectly innocuous, but at the same time powerful, universal and alterative.

The Government Loan

$200,000,000.

This Loan is authorized by Act of Congress of March 4th, 1864, which provides for the REDEMPTION IN COIN, at any period not less than ten or more than forty years from its date, at the pleasure of the Government.

Until its Redemption, five per cent. Interest is to be paid semi-annually IN COIN.

Subscriptions to the Loan are received by the National Banks in United States notes or in such currency or other funds as are taken by them on deposit at par.

Its Exemption from State or Local Taxation adds from one to three per cent. per annum to its value.

The Rate of Interest on this loan, although but five per cent. in coin is as much greater in currency as the difference between the market value of currency and gold.

As a Rule, the five per cent. specie securities of all solvent governments are always par or above, and currency now funded in the National Loan, will be worth as fine in gold, besides paying a regular and liberal percentage to the holder.

The authorized Amount of this loan is Two Hundred Million Dollars. The amount of subscriptions reported to the Treasury at Washington, is over $70,000,000.

Subscriptions will be received by the TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES at WASHINGTON, and the ASSISTANT TREASURERS at NEW YORK, Boston and Philadelphia, and by the

The subscriber has, for more than 20 years past, been in the habit of preparing and preparing manuscripts for the Press. At first this labor was one of kindness, and performed gratuitously; but it became a profession, and absorbed so much time, that a small charge in the nature of a gratuity was necessarily exacted. This fee, not exceeding $5, and generally less, commenced in 1862. Pamphlet, useful and critical perusal of a work in manuscript, and the offering of it, if approved, to publishers.

The subscriber continues to receive and read manuscripts in the same manner, giving his candid opinion concerning them, and arranging for their printing and publication, if deemed desired to do so. He makes his charges as small as possible, since his chief object is to aid and benefit authors.

In all cases letters of advice should be forwarded by mail, when manuscript will be sent, either by mail through the Post Office or by express, highly addressed,

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 458—VOL. XVIII.] NEW YORK, JULY 9, 1864. [PRICE 10 CENTS $4 00 YEARLY, 13 WEEKS $1 00.

Richmond—What Progress and What is the Prospect.

SINCE our last review of the military situation in Virginia, another memorable and important chapter of sanguinary battles, heroic achievements and masterly strategy has been added to the glorious history of our veteran Army of the Potomac. The practical questions, however, which we are required to answer are, what actual progress has been made towards the reduction of the rebel capital? and what is the prospect now before us? Sanguinary battles involve a great waste of human life, heroic achievements signify nothing, and masterly strategy is foolishness without substantial results. What, therefore, has Gen. Grant gained from his last seven days of battles and strategic operations? and what are the advantages contemplated? and what is the prospect from his last bold movement by the left flank? Let us briefly endeavor to answer.

First, towards the reduction of Richmond and the rebel army defending it, an important point has been gained by Gen. Grant in the actual occupation, south of Petersburg, of the Weldon, Wilmington and Charleston railroad, the principal artery through which Richmond draws its supplies and Lee his reinforcements. The only remaining line of communication between the rebel capital and the States beyond Virginia supporting it is the interior Danville road, which, if not occupied by our forces, soon will be, and in the meantime has been seriously interrupted by our cavalry expeditions in that direction. It must not be forgotten that Gen. Grant, from the beginning of this Virginia campaign, has been, and is now, acting under the conviction that Richmond and the rebel army defending it may be more readily and cheapily overcome by cutting off their lines of supplies than by storming or laying siege to the city's extensive and formidable chain of defences. He believes, as we believe, that Gen. Lee, if reduced to the subsistence stores of Richmond, will soon be compelled to abandon the city, or to make a sortie from his entrenchments to reopen his communications, and that, in either case, the city, his army and his cause are lost.

In this view, Gen. Grant's operations in Virginia of the last seven days, and especially the extension of his left wing around the south side of Petersburg, so as to cover the Weldon railroad, will be properly appreciated. From the crossing of the Rapidan on the 4th of May last, to the present time, the great object and the great difficulty of the distinguished leader of the Union armies has been to bring his wily Virginia adversary to the issue of an open field engagement. Thus far, however, the enemy have avoided this danger, and from the Rapidan to the Appomattox have compelled Gen. Grant to accept battle under heavy disadvantages in every instance, or from point to point to dislodge them by a flank movement, which, to an inferior army under an ordinary leader, would have been certain destruction.

The battlefield of the Wilderness was a snare as well adapted to the complete overthrow of our invading forces, as was that gloomy forest defile in which the army of Gen. Braddock was cut to pieces a hundred years ago. The naturally strong and skilfully fortified position next assumed by the enemy at Spottsylvania Court House, and the next between the North and South Anna rivers, were not less formidable obstructions in the line of march chosen by Gen. Grant for Richmond. Having successfully turned them all, he reached the dreaded Chicahominy, only to find that his escape from a long siege, in which his army would probably be destroyed by pestilence, must be by a retreat to the York river, or in a more hazardous flank movement than any yet attempted, as was proved by the terrible seven days battles of 1862 from Cold Harbor to Malvern Hill.

This perilous movement, however, was this time accomplished, without the loss of a gun or a baggage wagon, and from still another advance by the left flank, the Army of the Potomac has been moved to the south side of Petersburg, 25 miles below Richmond. We are told, too, and we believe, that the south side of the James river was the destination of Gen. Grant, from his crossing of the Rapidan. Why, then, did he not move his army down to Aquia creek, put it on board transports, and by way of the broad Potomac, the Chesapeake bay and the James river, land his troops a few miles from Petersburg without a single battle? Because, first in thus leaving Lee's army near the Rapidan, Washington would be left at his mercy; and secondly, because, it was necessary to exhaust the intervening country and communications with Richmond, so far as to render another Northern diversion by Gen. Lee, under any circumstances, utterly impracticable. All this has been done, and hence the boldness and perfect security with which Gen. Grant has placed Richmond, the James river and the veteran rebel army of Virginia, between himself and Washington. Forty thousand men, killed, wounded and missing, have been lost by him in this overland march from Culpeper to Petersburg. He is farther from Richmond than he was a fortnight ago; he has fought many bloody battles, captured or turned many important positions; but he has gained no decisive victory. What, then, is the prospect? We answer, that from the losses inflicted upon the enemy, from the extremities to which he is reduced in the matter of his supplies, and from the near approach of Gen. Grant to the complete isolation of Richmond from the South, the prospect is that the day is near at hand when the city will be ours, Lee's army routed and dispersed, and the rebellion extinguished.

Royal Patent to Wear a Nightcap.—Agnes Strickland, in her "Lives of the Queens of England," in giving an account of the rewards bestowed by Queen Mary upon her friends after her accession, says: "The Queen's gratitude took a very odd form in the case of the Earl of Sussex; he was a valetudinarian, who had a great fear of uncovering his head, and considering that the colds he dreaded respected no person, he petitioned Queen Mary for leave to wear his nightcap in her presence. The Queen, in her abundant grace, not only gave him leave to wear one but two nightcaps, if he pleased. His patent for this privilege is, perhaps, unique in royal annals:

"'Know ye, that we do give to our well-beloved and trusty cousin and councillor, Henry, Earl of Sussex, Viscount Fitzwater and Lord of Egremond and Burnell, licence and pardon to wear his cap, coif or nightcap, or any two of them, at his pleasure, as well in our presence as in the presence of any other person or persons within this our realm, or any other place in our dominions wheresoever, during his life; and these our letters shall be his sufficient warrant in his behalf.'

"The Queen's seal, with the Garter about it, is affixed to this singular grant."

Summary of the Week.

VIRGINIA.

The bold and sudden movement of Gen. Grant, across the James, after failing to break Lee's lines, filled all with hope, but it has thus far proved delusive. Petersburg seemed doomed to fall an easy prey. The first and second lines of the enemy were carried, but in a desperate attack on the principal line Grant was repulsed. He now found that the works were of the most elaborate kind, and held by Beauregard alone. He could not keep his whole army there, and allow Lee to form new plans unmolested.

On the 17th Gen. R. S. Foster's division, 10th corps, whose right rested on Ware Bottom Church, near James river, extending towards the Appomattox, and Gens. Ames and Turner on his left, were attacked by Pickett's and Field's divisions of Longstreet's corps, and a part of the line was momentarily lost, but as quickly regained, and held in spite of desperate attacks.

On the 19th three rebel rams came down to Dutch gap, but were attacked by the monitors across a wooded neck, and retired.

On the 20th Gen. Abercrombie was attacked at the White House by Fitz Hugh Lee and Wade Hampton, who hoped to capture Sheridan's train. The infantry and boats kept them at bay, and having exploded a caisson, drove them off. Sheridan came up in the afternoon, and with his immense wagon train crossed the James above Fort Powhatan.

An expedition, under Acting-Brig.-Gen. Draper, set out from Point Lookout on the 11th, and landing in Westmoreland county proceeded to the Rappahannock, destroying over $300,000 of rebel property.

On the 22d Grant sent the 18th corps from Bermuda Hundred to destroy the Weldon railroad, and the 2d and 6th corps were thrown to the left. During this movement Hill advanced and pushed through a gap in the 2d corps, taking Barlow's and Gibbons's divisions in flank, capturing 2,000 men, with several cannon, and inflicting heavy loss in killed and wounded.

On the 23d the 6th and 2d corps again advanced, but, after beginning the destruction of the road, were attacked by Anderson and Wilcox and forced back.

On the 25th, at 8 P. M., the enemy attacked Gen. Burnside's line, charging under cover of a heavy cannonade, but were repulsed with loss.

Gen. Hunter, pushing on with Crook and Averill, after effecting a junction, flanked and routed the rebel Gen. McCausland, and took Lexington on the North river, a branch of the James. He then sent out minor expeditions, which did great damage to the railroads. Hunter himself advanced to Lynchburg on the 18th.

Lee, meanwhile relieved in a manner by Grant's move, sent nine brigades to join the forces before Hunter.

Sharp work has accordingly been going on before Lynchburg, of which we know only through rebel channels. The action on the 18th is claimed as a rebel victory.

GEORGIA.

Sherman has closed in on Johnston at the Kenesaw mountain, a naturally strong position, which the latter holds tenaciously.

On the 15th McPherson, with the 15th, 16th and 17th corps, drove the enemy from before him, capturing, entire, the 31st and 40th Alabama.

The other corps then advanced on the Kenesaw mountain, and Hooker attacked their position on Lost mountain, taking and holding some of their works. He also captured many rebels. And on the 16th an entire company, with its officers, came into our lines.

Gen. Polk was killed at Pine mountain on the 14th, while making telescopic observations of our lines, with Johnston and Hardee. A battery of the 4th corps observing the party, fired, and one of the projectiles struck the General on the left arm, passed through his body and carried off his right arm. His death thus resembles that of Gen. Moreau, struck while standing with the Emperor of Russia and King of Prussia.

A new district has been created embracing Sherman's recent conquests, and styled the District of the Etowah. It has been placed under the command of Major-Gen. Steadman. It comprises the country from Bridgeport to Allatoona, including Cleveland, Rome, and the country on the east as far as the flag goes.

On the 21st Howard gained an important point, and, in order to regain it, the enemy made seven successive but unsuccessful assaults on Whitaker's brigade, of Stanley's division, in which they lost nearly 800 men, 200 dead being left on the field. Both Noonday and Moses creeks have been crossed.

On the 18th the rebel Gen. Wharton succeeded in capturing five freight trains loaded with supplies, between Kingston and Dalton. Two other trains were lost on the 20th.

On the 19th three companies of the 54th Va. (C. S. A.), came into our lines, and on the 24th 600 conscripts from a rebel camp near Atlanta came in.

LOUISIANA.

The steamers Chillicothe, Neosho and Fort Hindman captured recently a rebel battery on the Achafalaya, near Semmesport, consisting of two 30 pound Parrots.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The firing on Charleston seems to have been suspended. An expedition was recently sent up Stono river, and the rebel works on John's island demolished.

TEXAS.

Brig.-Gen. Fitz Henry Warren has been ordered to Brownsville, to take command of the forces in that part of Texas.

NAVAL.

The U. S. gunboat Elk has made an expedition through Mississippi sound, breaking up a rebel camp on Bayou Lackra, and then proceeding up Wolfe river.

CONGRESS.

In the Senate, on the 20th of June, the bill to prohibit the discharge of persons liable to military duty by reason of the payment of money was called up by Mr. Wilson, the question being on his disamendment, that every person who shall be drafted and serve honorably for the period of one year, shall receive a bounty of $100 and an honorable discharge, and a similar bounty proportionate to his term of service for a less period. No vote on the main question was taken.

In the House, there was no business of any public interest.

In the Senate, on the 21st of June, Mr. Sumner moved to take up the bill to repeal the Fugitive Slave Law. This led to a very animated debate. The motion was carried.

In the House, Mr. Kellogg made an adverse report on the resolution instructing them to inquire what further legislation is necessary to prevent substitute brokers from purchasing substitutes. Mr. Kellogg reported a bill for the relief of Mrs. Gen. Lander. Mr. Schenck reported a bill with reference to the draft, which he explained. After debate the House voted on the motion to strike out the first section of the bill, repealing the commutation clause. The question was decided in the affirmative, by yeas 100, nays 50. The second section was also stricken out. The further discussion was terminated by the arrival of the hour for a recess. At the evening session the House resumed the consideration of the bill to amend the Pacific railroad act.

In the Senate, on the 22d of June, the bill to prevent military interference was passed, with an important amendment to the effect that military may be employed to keep the peace at the polls. The bill to allow the transfer of persons from the military to the naval service was passed. The bill to compensate the officers and crew of the gunboat Essex for the capture of the rebel ram Arkansas was passed. The bill to establish a Navy yard and depot at Cairo was passed. The bill for the relief of officers and seamen in the naval service to compensate for losses, etc., was passed. The House resolution for the relief of John Ericsson was passed without amendments. A bill was passed to repeal so much of the Deficiency bill of last March as appropriated $25,000 for a naval hospital at Kittery, Me. The bill to repeal the Fugitive Slave law was taken up, and after various dilatory motions had been made to adjourn, postpone, etc., a compromise was finally made, and the bill was allowed to be reported to the Senate as from Committee of the Whole.

In the House, it was resolved, the Senate concurring, that the present session of Congress be closed on Thursday, the 30th inst. Reports were received relative to the contested election cases of Pennsylvania, but were laid over. The $400,000,000 loan bill was then taken up; after considerable discussion the clause to exempt all bonds, Treasury notes and other obligations of the United States was stricken out. Several amendments and substitutes were offered, but without coming to a conclusion on the bill the House adjourned.

In the Senate, on the 23d of June, the House bill to repeal the Fugitive Slave law came up as the special order. After debate, the bill was passed, yeas 27, nays 12. The motion to reconsider the bill passed yesterday, to prevent military interference in elections, was taken up. Without concluding, the Senate took a recess. The evening session was devoted to discussion of the $300 commutation clause.

The House passed the Senate bill amendatory of the law of March, 1863, which extends the time within which patentees who have neglected it may pay the final balance fees within six months from the passage of this act, to secure their patents. The House, in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, resumed the consideration of the new loan bill. A long debate ensued. The Committee acted on and agreed to Mr. Stevens's substitute for the first section—yeas 72, nays 51. The House, however, at a subsequent stage of the proceedings, refused to concur in the action of the Committee, by a vote of 59 against 80. The House also refused to concur in Mr. Pomeroy's substitute for the second section, by 44 against 81. The bill was then passed without a division, the yeas and nays having been demanded and refused.

In the Senate, on the 24th, the Pacific Telegraph bill was amended and passed. A bill was reported to provide salaries in lieu of commissions for postmasters. The Civil Appropriation bill was then brought up for consideration, and several amendments were made. In evening session the Miscellaneous Appropriation bill was taken up and the final consideration of it postponed.

In the House, a bill was passed to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and Her Britannic Majesty for the final settlement of the title concerning the Hudson Bay and Puget's Sound Agricultural Company. The Missouri contested election case being called up, the House passed a resolution confirming Mr. Scott in his seat. A resolution, declaring that John Kline is not entitled to a seat as representative from the Third Congressional District of Pennsylvania, but that Leonard Scott is entitled to retain his seat, was agreed to. In the contested election case from the Fifth Congressional District of Pennsylvania, a resolution was passed declaring that Charles H. Corrigan is not entitled to the seat, but that Mr. Russell Thayer is entitled to retain the seat now occupied by him. The Senate bill to establish a Navy yard and depot at or near Cairo, Illinois, was taken up. After some debate the bill was amended by adopting the resolution reported by the Naval Committee, to appoint a commission to report at the next session of Congress as to the most suitable location for a naval depot on the Western waters.

TOWN GOSSIP.

Think of it; oh, inhabitants of the woods and green fields; ye dwellers beside the rushing river or on the mountain top, that millions of your fellows—for no crime committed—are prisoned in brick walls, with metal roofs glowing above their heads, and scorching pavements beneath their feet, while the thermometer touches a hundred in the shade!

Think of it, that while the soft southern breezes come over your mountain tops and down your rushing rivers, laden with the perfume of ten thousand flowers, millions of your fellows are stifling in narrow streets, in cage-like houses, inhaling only the odors generated from uncleanly streets and crowded domiciles!

What a privilege it is to be a denizen of the country! And yet how few who have this privilege offer it appreciation. We have often thought that in all the dog-in-the-mangerism that afflicts human nature, this point is the one deserving of the most especial notice. We mean the selfishness and the jealousy of country people as exercised towards the people of the city. An instance of it is marked in this fact. A large majority of city people are hard laborers all the week, and have no day upon which they can escape to the woods and fields but Sunday, and yet it is this very day the selfishness of country people shuts away from them, by depriving them of the means of transportation. Were it left to country people there would not be a steamboat or train of cars leave the city for any point on the Sabbath. Instead of encouraging the pleasures of their fellowmen by making cheap excursions, and giving the pent-up and stifled citizens a chance to worship God in the enjoyment of nature, they labor to make laws that shall shut them away, fearful that the little ones might pluck a wild flower, or press down a few blades of grass with their tiny feet.

By-the-bye, in connection with this, why is it that some popular preacher, who, during the summer heats, finds it difficult to fill a town church, will not try the country? Let him advertise to hold forth near the city, under the shelter of the forest trees, and charter a steamboat to take his improvised congregation to the spot for the worship of the day, at a low rate of fare, and our word for it he would have thousands where he now has hundreds, and would be better appreciated and more pleasantly listened to than in the hot, close, city church.

How strange it seems, with the thermometer touching a hundred, that men can discuss anything, or make any effort towards the ordinary affairs of life. And yet they do, and the world goes on with the same routine of exciting events. Politicians quarrel, and write long letters, or make long speeches, denouncing each other, and the public read both and believe both. Business men run about and chaffer, and bargain, and worry away their physical proportions in money getting; and women shop and flirt, and torture themselves into uneasy dresses, and hard, stiff and unwieldy bonnets, just the same as though the temperature was fifty degrees lower.

Now we have had some experience of heat in our lifetime, and have speculated some upon it. We have enjoyed it in Africa at 144 deg. Farenheit, and we are obliged to confess that we did not suffer as much as with the 100 of the same in New York city. The reason for this is simply that in tropical climates, under these high degrees of heat, no effort is made at exertion. The white man who, during the middle hours of the day gave way to peripatetic action, or exciting occupation, would be looked on as a madman, and booked at short notice for the next world. The hammock or the lounge, with thin, ventilating clothing, a quiet book, cool and unexciting food or drink, are the means the dweller in a tropical climate uses to pass his day; and the morning before nine, and the evening, are the hours for transacting business. He builds his house for coolness, he dresses for coolness, eats, drinks and moves for the same end, and as a consequence suffers less than we do with our 50 degrees less, and our perpetual haste and carelessness.

Among the numberless things that make up a city life, none seem to us so worthy of discussion as a case of child-murder that occurred during the past week. It is hard to believe that any woman, or human being possessing that form, should have possessed herself of a child, by adoption, between three and four years of age, and under the pretence of administering punishment, gradually beaten the little creature to death, and that this slow and gradual process, going on for weeks and months, should have been known to the neighbors, and not one of them had courage or humanity enough to rescue the helpless, little victim. And yet this is true, in this year of our Lord, 1864. The child, Mary Gerraty, was given by its mother, who had just lost her husband, to this woman, Mrs. Clinton, to bring up. Some of the witnesses testified that they have seen this fiend, Clinton, strike and kick the child repeatedly until the blood would start from several wounds, and then, divesting it of clothing, would leave it alone and naked, without food, so that if it had not been fed by neighbors, the babe, for it was nothing else, would have died with starvation. Finally she killed it, and then these neighbors who could do nothing, or would do nothing, to save it, called in the aid of the police, and the woman who had coldly and devilishly perpetrated this fearful murder was lodged in prison for trial.

Let us hope that she will not be able to obtain bail, and that no benevolent lawyer of enlarged sympathies will interfere to turn her once more out on this community.

Among the movements of the week touching theatrical matters is the meeting of managers at the house of Mr. Wallack, to resist, as it is called, the extortions of orchestral performers. These extortionists are now receiving from the managers the princely sum of $14 per week wages, and have the temerity to ask for more for the coming season. The idea is perfectly shocking, and we cannot for an instant see how the managers, who are, as everybody knows, poor, and have made no money the past season, can help resisting it. Fourteen dollars a week for an artist with perhaps a large family to support, is certainly liberal remuneration, and if the managers do not resist it these extortionists will after awhile be expecting as high wages as a shoemaker or a tailor.

As week after week goes on, bringing us nearer to midsummer, the dramatic season grows "small by degrees and beautifully less." The Winter Garden has closed, and before this paper has reached its readers Wallack's will have met the same end, though it almost immediately reopens under the management of Treasurer Moss, for a short summer season, with an English comedy, called the "The Winning Suit," which will introduce to the American stage a new actor, named McIntyre, and include in the cast most of the members of the old company and some new ones.

Vestvali's engagement at Niblo's terminates this week with just 50 representations of "Bel Demonio," and then we are to have John Brougham in another shape, "The Duke's Motto," as a stopgap, until Lucille Western comes in with "The Sea of Ice," which cannot fail to be acceptable during this hot weather, especially if done with the real article.

On Saturday next, also, the Olympic will close its season, and the house will go into the hands of the English Opera company, who have not yet announced their programme, which commences on the following Monday.

Barnum keeps his audiences cool with homœopathic doses of almost everything, adding each week a touch of novelty, the last of which is Mr. Charles Collins, who does up a little entertainment of his own, called "The Original Cure," warranted equal to the exigencies of the season.

We verily believe that the only sensation just now in New York is Heller, and that New York believes it, or his salon would not be nightly crowded during this sweltering weather. We pronounce his exposition of the Davenport business as the cleverest thing New York has ever seen. We hold the exhibition of the box business to be not only puzzling and amusing, but worthy of every encouragement as showing up spiritual humbugs. If we were inclined to believe the doings of the Davenports almost beyond human ability, then must we think Heller's entirely so, as his box trick is infinitely better than that of the brothers. We stood within 12 inches of the box, and distinctly saw six hands shown at the diamond-shaped openings of the doors and two faces, though a moment before we had seen these doors closed upon his one assistant, Willie, who certainly, as far as our eyes went, possessed but two hands, and those secured with handcuffs, and one face. We saw Dolly Davenport, who was in search of spiritual knowledge, put in the same box with Willie, and while tightly grasping Willie's hands, so that he could not by any possibility move, Mr. D. came forth from the box to report that his nose and hair was violently pulled, the instruments were played, his coat taken from his back and thrust through the aperture on to the stage. If there are any doubters among the audience after these things are done, they are made welcome to a seat in the box, and can have their nose pulled to their entire satisfaction.

We repeat that the whole thing is the cleverest trick ever shown in New York.

Cubas is dead—the beautiful Cubas! A few months ago all the young blood of New York went wild about her. Men gazed upon her beauty and followed her movements in the dance as they would have gazed upon some creature of another world, and women admired with a half-jealousy, half-passion for the voluptuous creature who overshadowed their more delicate beauties. She died at the age of 27, and of consumption. She was a Spaniard, full blooded, born at Valencia del Cid, and her name was Blasco. From her very earliest years she showed the skill and force that afterwards gave her so great a reputation as a danseuse, and so strongly marked her style that none have ever attempted to imitate her. In her profession she possessed decided genius, and we much doubt if future years will replace the beauty, grace, force and originality of the Cubas upon the Terpsichorean stage.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Philadelphia has lately set New York an excellent example in the way of speedy punishment. A man named Mix, alias Mitchell, was arrested on the 20th June, charged with stealing $5,000 from the Sanitary Fair. He was tried on the 22d, and sentenced on the 23d to 6 years imprisonment.

—— On the afternoon of the 22d June there was great excitement in Wall street; gold ranging from 205 to 231. The sales were, however, mainly gambling operations, and in some cases purely fictitious.

—— The Central Bank of Worcester, chartered in 1829, and the second bank in the city, has begun business under the name of the "Central National Bank of Worcester."

—— The Richmond Whig, contemplating the scarcity of provisions in the rebel capital, proposes to expel the Irish and German women, who are running from place to place where charity is dispensed, "just as hogs in the fall of the year from one apple tree to another." The New York Post suggests that they be exchanged for an equal number of rebel women, who are now crowding the boarding-houses of New York, and 20,000 of whom are known to the police.

—— A few days ago a flock of large birds of strange appearance alighted from a flight over the lake, at Burlington bay, near Hamilton, in Upper Canada. It was found that they were pelicans, all the way from the shores of the Gulf, or the lower reaches of the Mississippi. These birds have often been killed as far up the Mississippi as Keokuk, in Iowa, but their appearance in Canada is very unusual. Another rare visitor has been shot at Girondines, Canada. It was the glossy ibis, found in Texas, Mexico and California, but seldom seen at the North.

—— It has been resolved to postpone the meeting of the Chicago Convention from the 4th of July to the 29th of August.

—— On the 21st June there was a meeting of the Democratic leaders at the Astor House, to debate on their party prospects. An attempt was made to extort or beguile from Fernando Wood some "glimmering" of what he meant to do. But he declined answering any question till after the Chicago Convention. He would not pledge himself to anything.

—— The Secretary of the Treasury, in a letter to Mr. Cisco, dated 20th June, announces the debt of the United States on that day to be $1,719,395,169, or nearly one-half that of Great Britain, but as our rate of interest is much higher it necessarily increases the relative proportion. The real cost of the war, however, is in the increased rates of living, which really makes our taxation nearly 200 per cent.

—— The Constitutional Convention of Maryland, in session at Annapolis, on the 24th of June, passed the following article in her Bill of Rights. "Hereafter in this State there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except in punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, and all persons held to service or labor as slaves are hereby declared free."

Military.—Five rebels found guilty of robbery and murder were recently hung in Nashville. They had all once belonged to the rebel army, and asserted their innocence on the scaffold, and declared themselves prepared to die. As the scene was prolonged, however, two of them grew more bold, and less penitent, and after asserting their freedom from guilt, stated that they were but honest rebel soldiers, affirmed their belief in the justness of the rebel cause, and said they would die true rebel soldiers.

—— The Commissary-General of prisoners recently received from the rebel authorities at Richmond a report of deaths of Union prisoners which had occurred in the prison hospitals at Columbus, Georgia, from the 27th of February to the 31st of March. In a little over one month there were no less than 370 deaths.

—— Were you ever ashamed of the names of some of our battlefields? asks the Springfield Republican. Not Northern mudsills, but Southern chivalry, are responsible for such names as these—they are genuine and historical: Bull run, Snicker's gap, Slaughter's mountain, Polecat station, Gum neck, Nigger-foot road, Buzzard's Roost pass, Cockeysville, Scuffletown, Skinner's neck, Mob Jack bay, Yellow tavern, Hardscrabble town, Snaketown, Jericho marsh, Piping tree, Pumpkin-vine creek, Ox neck, Guinea's ranch, Snake river hollow.

Naval.—Great complaint is made by naval men of Amiral Lee for his inactivity in the James river; in addition to his not having attacked the rebel rams, he has caused several large vessels to be sunk in the river to prevent the enemy's boats from attacking him. It is said that if the ironclads are afraid to attack forts they are failures.

Personal.—Ex-Mayor Opdyke has been drawn into the quarrel in which the Albany Journal, New York Evening Post, Tribune, and other papers have been figuring for some time past, and where the grossest personal charges have been daily made and repelled on both sides. In a letter to the New York Herald, the Ex-Mayor threatens to appeal to the laws, civil and criminal, for redress to himself and for the punishment of Mr. Weed, the offender.

—— Lieut.-Col. Chamberlain, 20th Maine, reported dangerously wounded, it is well known is Professor of Modern Languages in Bowdoin College, from which institution he received leave of absence to accept the position of Lieut.-Col. in the 20th Maine. He has been in every battle in which his regiment has participated, and has won golden opinions for gallantry.

—— Miss Mandana Tileston, daughter of the late Cornelius Tileston, of Williamsburg, Mass., was married a few weeks since at Oxford, O., to Rev. Calvin Fairbank, after an engagement of 13 years. Preparations for the wedding were being made twelve and a half years ago, when Mr Fairbanks was imprisoned in Kentucky for assisting slaves to escape, and he has just been released. During all this time Miss Tileston did not relax her efforts to secure his release.

—— The Senate, in Executive session, has confirmed the following nominations: Joseph Holt, of Kentucky, to be Judge-Advocate-General: William McKee Dunn, of Indiana, to be Assistant Judge-Advocate-General; Warren T. Lockart, of Indiana, to be Register of the Land Office at Carson city, Nevada Territory. The Senate confirmed the following nominations for the new Territory of Montana: Sidney Edgerton, of Ohio, to be Governor; H. P. Torsey, of Maine, to be Secretary; Amine Giddings, of Conn., to be Associate Justice; Cornelius F. Buck, of Minnesota, to be United States Marshal; Edward R. Neally, of Iowa, to be United States Attorney; Asa Bartlett, of Illinois, to be Associate Justice for the Territory of Dacotah, vice Lorenzo P. Williston, appointed Associate Justice for the Territory of Montana.

—— Mrs. Stephen A. Douglas was in Harrisburg on the 19th, intending to spend a few weeks in visiting the rural portions of Pennsylvania as a guest of the family of Gen. Cameron. On the evening of that day she received a telegraph despatch from Washington city, announcing the melancholy fact that her only brother, an officer in one of the District of Columbia regiments, had been mortally wounded. The distinguished lady took the cars the next morning, hastening to return home.

Obituary.—Isabella Cubas, the celebrated dancer, died on the 20th June in this city, aged 26 years. She was a Spaniard by birth. She has left one little girl aged 6 years. The cause of her death was consumption.

—— Acting-Assistant Surgeon John K. Hardenbrook, U. S. A., died in Washington on the 20th of June of typhoid fever, aged 62. His death was occasioned by the severity of his official labors.

—— William Johnson Fox, for many years M.P. for Oldham, died at his town-house, in London, in his 78th year, on the 3d of June, after a very short illness. He was the son of Paul Fox, a farmer, at Wrentham, Suffolk, and afterwards a weaver at Norwich. He was born in 1786, and was educated at Homerton. He early in life entered the Congregational ministry, but afterwards became a Unitarian, which body he left, and for many years attracted large congregations to the chapel in South place, Finsbury. He was one of the ablest and most eloquent of the lecturers of the Anti-Corn-Law League, a writer in the Westminster Review and various other publications. He was elected M.P. for Oldham in 1847, and this position he occupied, with the exception of two brief intervals, until the period of his retirement from public life in 1862.

—— Tom Hyer, for many years the champion of the American prizering, died on the 26th June, at his late residence, No. 135 East 36th street, of cardiac dropsy. He came home at a late hour the previous evening, and complained of feeling unwell, grew rapidly worse, and died about 6 A. M. For many years past he has been failing in health, and has lately presented a striking contrast to the stalwart man, who, in 1849, beat the notorious bruiser, Yankee Sullivan. Until within a few months past he held a position in the Street Commissioner's office. A few days since he was tendered a benefit by some sporting friends at Stuyvesant Institute, and realised a considerable sum.

—— Mr. Joseph A. Scoville, who has earned an unenviable notoriety by his letters from New York to the London Herald, under the signature of "Manhattan," died at the Brandreth House, in this city, on Saturday morning, 25th June, of congestion of the bowels, at the age of 50 years.

—— Col. George S. Prescott, of the 32d Mass., died on the 19th June, from the effects of a wound received in the late unsuccessful assault on the lines at Petersburg.

—— Major Hedges, of the 14th N. Y. heavy artillery, was killed on the 19th of June, while charging the enemy.

Accidents and Offences.—Navy Agent Henderson, business manager of the Evening Post, was arrested on the 23d June on a charge of defrauding the Government. He was held to bail in $10,000.

—— W. A. Beecher, cousin to H. W. Beecher, was fatally injured on the 22d of June by falling down the steps of the Custom House.

—— Col. Fish, of the 1st Connecticut cavalry, and formerly Provost Marshal of Baltimore, has been pardoned by the President. His offences were of the most infamous description, and he was condemned, after a fair trial, to pay a fine of $5,000, and suffer an imprisonment of a year. He paid the fine, which was but a small part of the enormous gains he made, and the President has let him off the imprisonment.

—— Mrs. Sarah Littles, sister of Ira Stout, who was convicted of the murder of her husband in 1858, has been pardoned by Gov. Seymour. She now lives with her mother, on the Hudson river, below Sing Sing, and professes to be of a religious turn of mind.

—— A powder magazine recently exploded near the Tripoli station of the Malta and Alexandria telegraph. Forty men were killed and the telegraph station was much damaged. The communication with Alexandria does not, however, appear to have been interfered with.

—— Judge Advocate W. H. Young, of Baltimore, was killed on the afternoon of the 22d of June by one of the Washington cars. His body was terribly mangled.

—— A desperate old lady jumped from the cars, while the train was in motion, at Fair Haven, Ct., last week, and was badly bruised by her fall. She said, however, to those who offered her assistance that "she wasn't one of them kind that faints at everything," and added that "the train didn't give her time to get off when she came over to Fair Haven a year ago, and she wasn't going to be outwitted again."

—— The editor of the Chicago Times was attacked in the street lately, by a man named Trussell, whom that paper had published as a gambler. The editor fired at Trussell, but didn't hit him, thereupon the Times apologises to the public for the failure "to terminate the existence of a walking pestilence," and promises better execution the next opportunity.

Foreign.—Intelligence received from Tunis to the 25th ult. states that the Arabs, having discovered that the Cadi of the tribe of Medjees had betrayed the Bey set up by the insurgents, put him to death, together with 60 of his relations and servants. Eighteen vessels were in the roads of Tunis, ready to take on board those Europeans who might desire to embark.

—— The London Times city article of 4th inst. says: "Advices from Frankfort state that American federal bonds continue to be largely purchased there, and that every new fall in their price brings in new purchasers."

—— The latest advices from Bassora speak of inundations of the Euphrates, which are said to have interrupted communications with Bagdad.

—— According to a correspondent of the London Times, the Austrians have failed lamentably in their ironclads. It is represented that the three last built were made of wood which was only half seasoned.

—— The Queen and Prince of Wales are at open war on the Schleswig-Holstein question—the former being German and the latter Danish "to the backbone."

—— A trained monkey is all the rage at Franconi's, Paris, performing the usual feats of the most daring equestrians with a perfection and yet a solemnity of visage which produces surprise and convulsions of laughter.

—— Marseilles has become a great cotton market. The staple comes thither from Egypt, Turkey and Italy.

—— The Spanish Government repudiates the act of Admiral Pinzon in seizing the Chincha Islands, and has recalled him. It appears that the guano on those islands belonged chiefly to British merchants, by virtue of large advances made upon it. The islands—or rather the valuable part of them—are movable.

Art, Science and Literature.—M. Allard, a distinguished painter of Lyons, has been murdered in his own studio at Rome, by a man who was sitting to him as a model for Judas, in a picture representing Judas giving the kiss to the Saviour.

—— Mr. Babbage, the famous inventor of the calculating machine, and who has been for the last few years waging furious war against the Italian organ-grinders, has just finished a book called "Street Nuisances."

Odds and Ends.—During the recent inundation at Sheffield, Eng., a little child floated in a cradle four miles away from the scene of the disaster on to a meadow belonging to the rector of the village. The rector's wife, having no children of her own, accepted it as an offering from God, and has adopted it. No trace of the child's parents can be discovered. They were most probably drowned.

—— Even more disgusting than the worms are the toadies of the press. A Philadelphia paper says: "'All is quiet along the lines,' means something different with Gen. Grant from the old time import of these familiar words. With him they presage the gathering of a storm that is soon to burst with augmented fury on his former object of attack, or to threaten with its irresistible sweep some new point of the enemy's lines." Gen. Grant should treat such noodles to a new uniform of tar and feathers.

—— It is said that Weehawken is the most irregular town in New Jersey. The houses are not built—they are dumped!

—— The Owen county Journal, Ind., says: "Illness of the editor, compositor and devil—tria juncta in uno—and the total lack of assistance, has so delayed us, that we shall be unable to issue a paper next week. An extra, containing a summary of the latest news, will be mailed to each P. O. in the county on Wednesday."

—— And another Indiana paper has this lively paragraph: "The Cincinnati Commercial calls the Fremont men 'long-haired radicals.' We suppose the Lincoln men must be kinky-haired radicals. The hair of the long-haired radicals is parted in the middle, and the hair of the kinky-haired radicals curls so tight that it cannot be parted at all."

—— A servant girl, hearing the lady of the house ask her husband to bring "Dombey & Son" with him when he came home to dinner, laid two extra plates on the table for the supposed visitors.

—— A postman in the west of England has ridden the same pony for 18 years, and he estimates that in this time man and horse have travelled 66,160 miles, which is much over twice the distance around the globe.

—— The Pneumatic Passenger Railway Company have been constructing an experimental tube, a quarter of a mile long, in the grounds of the Sydenham Crystal Palace for the conveyance of passengers.

—— A terrible warfare of letters is just now going on in London, between Mr. Benjamin Webster, manager of the St. James's theatre, and Dion Bourcicault. It began with a denunciation of Mr. Bourcicault's "Fox Chase" by Mr. Webster, who called it an imposition, and has now degenerated into very warm personalities. Nobody is injured much by the newspaper pellets.

—— A Munchausenish story is told of some Portuguese philosophers and travellers, who were recently on the peak of Teneriffe, off the western coast of Africa, when they saw on the horizon vast masses of mountains. The archipelago of the Canary islands was at their feet, and the distant mountains must therefore belong to some other continent. At last one of the tourists, who had been in this country, recognised the Allegheny mountains, really 2,500 miles distant, as those on the horizon. A rare case of mirage.

—— Thousands of acres of soil are annually planted to flowers in France and Italy for making perfume alone. A single grower in Southern France sells annually 60,000 pounds of rose flowers, 30,000 pounds each of jasmine and tuberose, 40,000 pounds of violet blossoms, besides thousands of pounds of mint, thyme, rosemary, etc., and he is but one of hundreds engaged in this branch of horticulture.

—— A patent has just been granted to a citizen of Springfield for an improved fire-escape, consisting of a ladder so constructed that it may be coiled on a reel, mounted on wheels like the hose of a fire-engine. When uncoiled, the ladder runs up in a direction more or less inclined from a perpendicular, and as it is elevated becomes rigid by means of bolts and trusses operated automatically.

—— The last number of the Petersburg Express—which it is expected that our troops will soon suppress—contains a pleasant acrostic on "Beast Butler," closing:

"Every woman and child shall for ages to come Remember the monster, thou vilest of scum."

—— The Japanese Ambassadors at Paris were greatly astonished at the length of time consumed in trying La Pommerais, the doctor who poisoned his former mistress to get the insurance policies upon her life. They said that in their country justice was much more expeditious, A man is accused of a crime, his bowels are ripped up, and there is an end of it; if he is guilty, so much the better; if he is innocent, so much the worse for him—there is no great harm done. The European respect for human life has, however, struck the principal ambassador as a thing worthy to be made a note of, and he has addressed the tycoon on the subject.

—— A "wife" advertiser, who desired respondents to enclose their cartes de visite, received a reply from a lady, who wrote: "I do not enclose my carte; although there is some authority for putting a cart before a horse, I know of none for putting one before an ass."

CHIT-CHAT WITH THE LADIES.

Out of Town.

EVERY one is in the country; houses are shut up or left to the care of a single servant; the chandeliers done up in papers; the parlor chairs in brown holland; sheets thrown over the sofas; and silence even in the nursery and my lady's chamber tell the story. Nice, comfortable homes are deserted for closets and a chance of dinner at Saratoga, Newport, etc., because it is "the fashion," or because, in some cases (let us whisper), it is hoped that eligible matches may be met with at such places.

Biddy entertains her cousin Pat in the dining-room, producing delicate lunches with a duplicate storeroom key which she possesses "unbeknownst to the missus." The courtyard flowers wither or grow rank; the grass wants cutting; bits of straw and paper are blown into the areas and lie there; enterprising agents leave circulars, and good colporteurs tracts by the hundreds, so that their edges stick from beneath the doors continually. Boys draw caricatures with chalk on the brown stone steps, and a beggar takes his position on the area curbstone. At one glance you say, as you pass your eye along the street—Nos. two, four and six have all gone out of town.

Economy.

What do economical people do now-a-days, supposing there are any left? A lady of that old stock must live in agony just now. How can she economise? Time was when such a one would say: "We'll be very saving to-day, and have beefsteak and rice pudding."

Now any housekeeper knows what a good rice pudding with sauce costs now-a-days, and that beefsteak at 27 or 28 cents per pound is not economical enough to make the good old lady smile when she reckons up the housekeeping accounts, and so with a host of things once not to be counted as expenses, the cost was so slight, but which in this age of paper money make their mark in the "little bills" of grocer and butcher.

Poor old economy, once so respectable, is laughed and sneered at now pretty much as some belle of past generations might be, could she rise and walk amongst us in her old gala costume.

Economy is out of fashion, and it is just as well she should be, for her receipts to-day are useless.

To Spite his Wife.

They say that a man has been arrested in Montreal for trying to drown himself, to "spite his wife," on the complaint of that indignant female, who, we presume, had him bound over to keep the land. She need not have been alarmed; he might have left his hat on the water's brink and run away to California; he might even have plunged in, but only when he felt sure of being promptly rescued.

Drowning is a personal matter, and however much we may desire to "spite" any one, we don't like to injure ourselves in the accomplishment of the object. Mrs. Mantalini, or whatever her name was, might have remained at home darned her stockings, eaten her dinners, and made herself comfortable. As soon as Mr. Mantalini felt sure that she was not fretting about him, but rather rejoicing in the promised opportunity of trying ticket No. 2 in the marriage lottery, he would have returned, put on his dressing-gown and slippers, and taken some less troublesome means of "spiting" his spouse than playing at suicide.

We believe that half the people who drown themselves do it in the belief that they will be rescued, and only to frighten some unkind wife or sweetheart.

What Californians are Doing.

The Californians are doing something for the Sanitary Commission as well as ourselves. They have had a grand picnic in aid thereof, fare given by the railroad company, provisions provided and sold by citizens, etc. During the picnic a gentleman shot a hare, a very fine one, brought it in and sold it for $1, the purchaser resold it, and so on until $200 were raised for the Commission by that little hare alone. The Rev. Dr. Bellows sent a splendid box of mammoth strawberries to the picnic; these berries were sold for $1 a-piece. One sold again and again, like the hare, until it brought the Commission $10.

In the same way a sack of flour was handed about, until the repeated sales amounted to $2,000. The object was to raise money for the Commission, and we must say the Californians appear to have worked for that purpose with all their souls, and the proceeds of that picnic are exceedingly large, a fact in which, for the sake of our suffering soldiers, we must all rejoice.

Chivalry.

The last remnant of the age of chivalry has departed; there is not a vestige of it left. Now and then some fine old gentleman, with snow-white hair and white neckcloth to match, shows by his manner what the gentlemen of the past generation were; how delicately scrupulous as to those little courtesies towards our sex which used to be a well-bred man's pride and pleasure. But, alas! he only shows us what is lost to the world for ever.

The men of to-day—whose fault is it, we wonder?—are as far behind their grandfathers in elegance of manner as, judging from old portraits, they are in good looks. They expect to be paid attention to and coaxed into goodhumor by the ladies, and the girls do it on the principle of the old Quaker lady's sermon; that if the young men would stay at home, the young women would come after them! Look around you at any social gathering, and you will see half-a-dozen pretty girls, all smiles and dimples, doing their best to entertain well-dressed pieces of masculine conceit, who lounge on sofas, twirl their moustaches, and answer now and then by a monosyllable or two.

The hostess makes immense exertions to coax her gentlemen guests to dance, and the whole feminine battalion is in a strategic state to get the gentlemen in a goodhumor, and manage to mould them into very bearish partners and escorts.

The fact of the matter is, it is the women's fault. If by common consent we should behave as they do, tables would be turned, and we should soon live in times like those our grandmothers' grandmothers enjoyed, when woman was treated with courtesy and kept her proper place, sought by admirers, not seeking them.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL JAMES LONGSTREET, C. S. A.

IN spite of the assertion so confidently made at the beginning of the war by the Southrons and their Northern servants that all the military talent in the United States army was in the Southern officers, it is a remarkable fact that the Southern States, properly so-called, as distinguished from the Border States, have produced no really great General.

Longstreet, of South Carolina, is the only one who approaches the first rank, and he does so from his possession of the Northern qualities of stubborn persistance and obstinacy rather than from his dash or genius.

He has led an active life. He was born in South Carolina in 1823, graduated at West Point in 1842, entering the 4th infantry as brevet second lieutenant. In 1845 he became second lieutenant in the 8th infantry, 1st lieutenant in 1847. He fought bravely at Contreras, Churubusco and Chapultepec, receiving a severe wound at the last, and winning brevets of major and captain. He received a captain's commission in Dec. 1852, was made paymaster with the rank of major in 1858.

Although a native of South Carolina, he was one of the last to resign, throwing up his commission only on the 1st of June, 1861, and fighting as brigadier-general against his own flag in the same month at Blackburn's ford. From that time he was in important command in all the operations against the Army of the Potomac down to the battle of Gettysburg. He was then sent into Tennessee, but was repulsed at Knoxville. During the recent campaign of Gen. Grant he has been again in Virginia. He was made a Lieutenant-General in October, 1862. He is a powerful, thickset man, about 5 feet 10 inches high, taciturn, somewhat bald, his sandy hair verging to gray; his keen, penetrating eye, a cold, hard, blueish gray.

Our portrait is taken from a fine recent Richmond photograph.

BOOK NOTICES.

SELF-SACRIFICE. By the Author of "Margaret Maitland." Philadelphia: J. D. Peterson & Bros.

This novel of Scottish life is from the pen of an authoress who has already made her mark. The plot is well conceived and admirably carried out, the delineation of character extremely true and touching, and the narrative fervid and impressive to the highest degree.

MACARIA. By the Author of "Beulah." New York: John Bradburn.

The authoress of "Beulah" is a Southern lady, who, before the war, won the hearts of thousands in the North, and still retains their admiration. Her present work is an extremely interesting volume; her two heroines, for such we must consider them, both attached by the deepest affection to the same man; the struggles of the hero, who battles not only with poverty but with family dishonor, all interest the reader to the close.

Necessarily the present war is brought in, but the story seems to us to have been written long since and the close since adapted. It is a striking fact that, with a moral tone running through the work, she draws, as the only family where religion was household, the family of a well-to-do New Yorker, a compliment from the South which we must acknowledge, when even at the North they are not always disposed to give New York justice.

HIERONYMUM.

BY PAULINE.

THE gold sun smiles a sad adieu
On flowers and streams and woods to-night,
And long hills doff their dreamy blue,
To wear his crown of parting light.
At this sweet time fair Memory brings
Her garlands from the withered Past,
And sheds a radiance from her wings
On joys that were too bright to last.

Oh! still the echo of thy words
Rings through my heart in ling'ring chimes,
Like music of rich summer birds
That trill in air their rippling rhymes.
And still my spirit bows to thee,
As some sent messenger from Heaven,
To whom the tide of harmony
In all its glorious strength is given.

Around my life a richer hue
Thy warm soul-atmosphere has thrown—
Like flowers that drink the sunlight through,
Deep in that wineline life I've grown.
On the bright day our eyes first met,
When perfumes reeked from every grove,
(I feel the sweetness of it yet),
I knew my soul had clasped its love.

Brimmed with the poet's high desires,
The humming solitudes are thine,
Where Nature in baptismal fires
Lifts to her child her bright propine;
And glitt'ring down the ocean walls
Her mystic meaning pales and burns,
And through the sweet earth's emerald halls
'Tis writ with mosses and with ferns.

An elfin world of gracious gleams
Thy pure tones fling athwart my soul,
And evermore in sliding dreams
I hear immortal rivers roll.
I drink the glorious light of Love,
I freshen in the heavenly dew,
And feel the Spirit-ocean move
The great pulsations of the True!

And born within that noble land
Are Thoughts and Feelings white alway;
They walk upon the starry strand
And seem the children of the Day.
I bless thee! yes! that thou canst bring
A realm like this within my ken,
Thus—all its milky glories fling
A lustre on the brows of men.

Perhaps, within the Future's maze
Together we shall rove the plains,
Where light supernal 'round us plays,
And Truth falls down in golden rains.
Our souls may pierce all mystic state,
All glades of blue—all symbols deep,
And take from off the eyes of Fate
The lids of their unstirring sleep.

Oh! joy to wander thus with thee!
To feel thee with me high and strong,
To live within thy melody,
The fragrance borne from off thy song!
There, down the wide columnar aisles,
Cloudspread with dewy, amber flow,
Perchance we'll walk Love's shining miles,
And kneel before the lucent Cross.

Night from her ebon halls on high
Comes down the world with darkened sweep,
Her trailing skirts touch earth and sky,
And stars among her tresses sleep;
I kneel in worship unto her,
As slow she treads the blue, blue sea,
And listen to the downy whirr
That drips her warm'ring minstrelsy.

Oh! love that all my being fills!
Oh! passion of the pulsing heart!
Oh! flower that blood-red dew distils!
Its heat through all my senses dart!
As tropic growths in tropic seas,
Unfold to wooing airs each plume,
So, though hast been the sunlit breeze
That kissed my soul-life into bloom.

And I, through all the years that roll
In freighted wavelets over me,
Shall hold thee as a starlike soul
That dipt my life in melody.
And I shall bless thee evermore,
For the dear light that soul has given,
Till life shall break on Lethe's shore,
And swell within the chimes of Heaven.

CECILE;

OR,

THE YOUNG PORTRAIT PAINTER.

CHAPTER I.

IN the Rue Platrière, in the same house which, some years later, became the home of Jean J. Rousseau, and near the same window rendered famous by those delicious little breakfasts which he there enjoyed with his poor Therèse, a young man, apparently a visitor, was working silently on a large portrait of a man in a military dress. By his side stood a young girl in morning toilette, attentively observing the corrections he made, and expressing from time to time her appreciation of his kindness by words of grateful acknowledgment.

"I shall not dare to put my name to this masterpiece," she said, with charming grace, as the young man turned to her with a look that implied "Is it improved?—will it do?"

"It is far too well done—too beautiful, Robert," she replied, answering his glance. "I shall be afraid in future to ask your assistance or advice; and yet what could I do without you, who lend me your talent so generously?"

The young man took her hand and pressed it in silence. There was something in his look which implied a hidden sorrow, a suppressed thought. The young girl continued, smiling:

"What shall I do if the Marquis de Maucomble, charmed with his portrait, which he believes wholly my own work, should succeed in calling me to Versailles? You could not follow me there, assist me during the sittings of my models, nor repair secretly my blunders. I would lose at once both my undeserved renommée and my hopes of extended patronage."

"You will never become a great artist, Cécile—you work for money," said Robert, without turning towards her.

The Insane Painter.

"Not for myself," murmured the young girl.

"I know not for whom then," Robert replied in a careless tone. "True, I've no right to question you——"

"You cannot intend to be so harsh," Cécile replied, turning away her head to hide the pain caused by his words.

"No, indeed, Cécile," exclaimed the impetuous young man. "But this mystery with which you surround yourself, why can it not be removed? And these nightly visits, on which I warn you every one is commenting——"

"What is that to me, so long as you trust me?" the young girl replied, timidly.

"Darcut Cécile, I have loved you without questioning, and would not now inflict upon you the renewed avowal of my love, but for this portrait—this odious portrait!—which, for your sake, I touch-up patiently, with resignation and perfect self-abnegation. I have not even asked by what miracle you have contrived to reproduce so faithfully upon your canvas a countenance so insipid, so devoid of expression. Cécile, you love the Marquis de Maucomble! Farewell!" he added, with a strange, forced laugh. "For if the marquis somes here to-day I cannot come to-morrow. We part now and for ever."

Cécile checked him; but expressed neither fear nor surprise.

"Is this your promise to me? Have you forgotten our agreement?" she asked, proudly, and with perfect calmness.

"I would break it—I would be free to destroy my life—even as you take the liberty to love whom you choose."

"You speak like a child, my poor Robert," said Cécile, in a tender, caressing tone.

"I have been one till now."

"And are you now jealous?"

"Yes, madly so!" exclaimed Robert, kneeling down at her side. "Cécile, I can endure this no longer!"

"Oh, how blind, how deluded!" murmured the young girl, biding her face, suffused with blushes, in her hands, as the truth forced itself upon her mind that, through her fears for the marquis, she had unconsciously encouraged the love of the chevalier.

"Forgive me, Cécile," said the young man, in a calmer tone, "I now fear nothing. I will return."

"And the Marquis de Maucombe, too?" Cécile coldly asked. "I wish it so," she added, seeing Robert start; "this duel shall not take place."

Robert shook his head.

"A gentleman," he said, "never refuses satisfaction to his enemy. I have insulted the marquis to-night."

"I know it."

"How?"

"I know it—that is enough."

"You have seen him, then, and have perhaps offered an apology in my name. Cécile, Cécile! a woman who loves would not thus have degraded the object of her love. You spoke falsely just now—you deceived me!" he cried, and seizing a brush full of paint, with two strokes he destroyed the portrait and rushed from the room, exclaiming, "Ungrateful girl! I will revenge myself this day on you and the marquis!"

Cécile, overcome with astonishment, had remained motionless and unable to speak. When she recovered from her surprise her eyes rested upon the defaced portrait, the innocent cause of the scene just acted out, and murmured, while the tears trickled down her cheeks:

"My poor, dear father, for your sake I would endure much more. I shall not be able to pay your rent to-day!"

CHAPTER II.

YOUNG Damécourt was dreaming of his delightful adventures of the ball on the preceding evening, at the President's house, when he was awakened by some one rushing into his room and exclaiming:

"Get up, get up, my friend! It is past mid-day, and I want your advice on various matters."

"The deuce take you, marquis! What brings you here at this hour to disturb a man who is dreaming of Eden?" Damécourt said, rubbing his eyes and looking up at his friend.

"Why should you, young, rich, and full of life, as you are, seek happiness in dreams?"

"One would suppose you were old, ruined and done with this world, from the expression of your face."

"There is perhaps, more truth in your words than you think. But come, get up, for I have a duel on hand, and want you to be my second."

"Another folly, eh?" asked Damécourt, putting on his robe de chambre. "And you call this asking advice?"

"Certainly; for you see this is no common affair," the marquis said, seating himself upon a sofa. "I have reason to believe that I am to meet an accepted rival; the lady in question having declared to me positively that I shall be further advanced in her favor whether I kill or am killed."

"Who was the aggressor; you or your rival?"

"Zounds! my rival; a fool who views everything in a false light, even to love and women—a dreamer, jealous as a Castilian, taciturn as an Englishman —and who, though a Frenchman, knows nothing of French gallantry."

"I bet I have guessed the parties! That fantastic Cécile and that no less whimsical Chevalier de Saintonge. That boy belongs to another age. But come, I will undertake to convince him that it is not worth while to get his throat cut for a young girl who is not even à la mode."

"Not so fast, my dear Ozore; many thanks for your experience, but keep it for another occasion. Now, I need only your wit. You have yet to see the Marquis de Maucombe, Colonel of the Red Guards, undecided or irresolute when a duel is on the tapis."

"What would you have me do? Explain yourself, then."

"Listen," the marquis said, quietly taking a pinch of Spanish snuff. "It is possible I shall only be wounded, but I would turn the matter to good account. You know how that hairbrained fool, Lafleur, has possessed me with the idea of conquering this Cécile, this paragon of perfection. You also know how far I have succeeded, aided by the plan of sitting for my portrait, for which, by-the-bye, I am to pay somewhat dear. This portrait was to have been finished, delivered, and paid for to-day, and upon the pleasure which this seemed to give her I had placed the success of my suit. If I should be wounded, go to Cécile, and after lamenting the accident and regretting my disregard of her wish—for she made me promise I would not fight this duel—ask, in the name of my afflicted family, to be allowed to take away the mid portrait, paying the price agreed upon. You will notice the effect of the intelligence you bring, if she displays any emotion. Be watchful, my friend, for she is discreet, reserved, and has learned to hide the secrets of her heart. Then speak of my virtues, my constancy in love, my capability of loving. If she is moved, bring me back to life gradually: tell her there are still hopes of my recovery, and obtain from her an interview with me at my little villa des fosses du Temple."

"And, if in place of being yourself wounded, you should wound or kill the Chevalier Robert, the favored rival?"

"Favored! pshaw—the idea is but a phantom of my imagination."

"But still, what if you should wound him?"

"In that case, my dear friend, I will plead my own cause."

"All right! But, if you should be killed?"

"If I am killed, did you say? If I am killed, I begueath to you Cécile and my portrait."

"Be it so; though you know well I need neither the one nor the other to keep you in remembrance, or to make me mourn your loss."

The marquis's carriage waited at the door. The two young men were soon in it, and on their road to the Bois de Vincennes.

CHAPTER III.

"WELL!" said Damécourt, "as your second, I have the right, I presume, to ask the history of this love adventure."

"You are right," the marquis replied, "the recital will serve two purposes; it will add to your own experience and help to shorten the distance. My friend Rieux, who also knows, is a perfect original in all his ways, has built a house behind the Invalides, at the extremity of the Rue Babylone. His only neighbor in this quiet neighborhood was a certain Dr. Gousset, whose house, surrounded by a wall ten feet high, and with counterfeit doors and windows, looked little like the house of a respectable citizen. An air of desolation hung like a pall over the house, standing alone between a court on one side and a garden on the other. Visitors were rarely admitted on the premises, and those who visited secretly, as if afraid of being seen or recognised by a chance observer who might be near. One evening Rieux was returning home somewhat later than usual, when his phaeton came very near running over a lady, who appeared less frightened than annoyed at being detected in some secret errand. She endeavored to conceal her face as much as possible, but did not succeed sufficiently to prevent Rieux from seeing that she was young and very beautiful. He pretended not to notice her; but, secretly following at a distance, observed her at Gousset's house. A few evenings after, he met her again; and this occurred so frequently and at such regular intervals, that I determined to find out something about the doctor and his night visitor. For this purpose he made inquiries of the country people around, and at last induced a doctor to be a pearl of the faculty, occupying himself much less with pretty eyes than with the virtue of the drugs he prescribed.

"Nothing daunted, he waited one evening till the beautiful incognita came out of the doctor's house. He found her accompanied by a maid, and learned that she lived in the Rue Platrière, that she was a portrait painter, and that her name was Blanche. Another man would have pursued the adventure; but she was only a poor 'artiste,' and to him le jeu ne valait pas la chandelle, so he gave it up. The romance of the affair interested me, and I resolved to follow it up. But Cécile ceased visiting the doctor; and as I found no means of meeting her in the street or elsewhere and making her acquaintance, I called boldly upon her at her own house. You have seen her, and in pretext of my portrait, the long sittings necessary for that object—the jealousy of the Chevalier de Saintonge, too often renewed—the broken meetings, and finally the duel in which I am now embroiled. But what you can never fully understand, my friend, is Cécile's character. It is such a combination of timidity and self-reliance, simplicity and tact—the whole pervaded by the spirit of a demon enshrined in the body of an angel."

"Angels are blondes, my friend, and you've told me this Cécile of yours is a brunette."

"Yes, she is brunette," the marquis continued, "but with large blue eyes; a complexion fair and fresh as a Hebe's, a profile that would put to shame the most classic antique statuary: and a form and carriage which Diana, Venus and all the other goddesses, though each might have envied. To say nothing of her pride and purity, which would be sans reproche were it not for those ridiculous fits of jealousy, which are not directed to the doctor's house, are, however, not less frequent or mysterious. True, I have a powerful counter-charm in the shape of my face; but this little coquette, whom I believe Rieux judged too harshly, has found a more delicate lover, if sometimes unreasonable, than I to moderate my love and cool the enthusiasm she has excited in my usually calm temperament; and would no doubt have, but for my success, ended by turning my attention to other interests, and dismissing portrait and painter from my mind, if my self-love or vanity, as you may call it, had not been in danger."

"I confess it is cruel to raise the siege of a citadel defended by the Chevalier de Saintonge, a man so little known in the beau monde."

"I swear, my would-be Cicero, you talk like a fool, for you are at fault on a very important point. The place is not only defended but besieged by the Chevalier de Saintonge. Your metaphor, my friend, was mal à propos."

"Then why not make your cause a common one, and stand ready to divide the spoils afterwards, like a brave and loyal victor."

"This is exactly what I proposed yesterday, and for this proposition I am involved in this duel. This chevalier, my rival—painter, poet, musician, a perfect Leonardo da Vinci, is a real Jansenist in love. He would allow no trifling in the matter. So when I saw he took the affair so seriously, and that we should be obliged to fight, I played the whole game. I went to Cécile, with the determination of conquering at least in this first encounter. Would you believe it? I was repulsed with great zeal, and in despair of my cause, I told her of the meeting on hand. I drew a picture of myself pierced to the heart by my adversary's sword, and implored her to grant me one sigh, one tear in return for the life I was about to sacrifice for her sake."

"Well?"

"Well! I expected of course a scene—an exhibition of some emotion. Cécile heard me with the greatest tranquillity, seeming to doubt neither my own courage nor that of the chevalier, and intending to cut fighting ourselves with such composure, that you would have thought it was an inevitable event she was waiting for, so as to mourn us both in the same time."

"What a heartless coquette! I shall add my name immediately to the list of her worshippers; that makes a dozen of a long life."

"You need not take that trouble, for it will be of no use. She loves—I am sure of it—and with her whole heart—but whether it is myself or the chevalier, I cannot tell, for she is impenetrable. She reasoned with me an hour to persuade me to arrange this affair amicably, and not one word escaped her that—"

The marquis was interrupted by a violent collision with another carriage.

"What insolence!" he exclaimed, furiously shaking out of the window. At the same time another head was seen issuing from the other carriage, calling out—

"By Jove! 'tis Rieux!"

"Bless me, Maucombe, this is a pleasant and unexpected meeting."

"A most happy accident!" exclaimed the other; and the next moment Rieux's carriage was returning empty to Paris, and that of the marquis was again on the way to Vincennes with himself and his two friends, Rieux and Damécourt.

"You will stand by me—'tis agreed"—said the marquis to Rieux.

"Willingly!" he replied; "but against whom? Oh, by-the-bye, you again discovered the object of your Cécile's evening walks—do not be obstinate, my friend; that girl is not worth the love of a brave man."

CHAPTER IV.

WHILE the marquis and his two friends, and Robert with his, are on their way to the place of rendezvous, we will look at what is taking place in a retired and secluded spot at the extreme end of the village of Vincennes, and on the border of the forest. The house resembled very much the one occupied by Dr. Goussett, having the same outward signs of precaution, with the exception that the windows were not so well secured.

Before one of these the first step on which the events we relate took place, sat an old man, seemingly enjoying the charming scenery and the delightful view of groups of undulating meadows and dark forest stretching out before him as far as the eye could reach. All nature slept, as for a moment the intense heat of a July mid-day sun. The old man suddenly left his seat at the window, wiping the drops from his forehead, and looking up upon his bed. He was nearly bald, but the few remaining locks were white as snow, and his form, though upright and deep set, bore marks of age. Still he appeared in the full vigor of life. Mental suffering, more than physical ailments, had bended his proud shoulders, and bowed his stately form. His features were finely chiselled; his countenance noble and frank; and he possessed altogether the appearance of refinement which are sure indices of high social position. After lying some moments with closed eyes, he raised himself partly on his bed and leant his head on one hand, remaining immovable, as if listening to the recital of an interesting story.

Gradually his brow darkened, and his eyes were fixed upon an easel placed opposite the bed.

"Work on, count," he said, shaking his head as he spoke; "work away, my daughter; work away, if you would finish before Cécile comes to-night, to take the picture to that man who is a stranger to all sentiments of hospitality, and laughs when I do him the honor of showing him this wonderful portrait!"

He spoke, the old man's agitation increased; when he suddenly sprang towards the easel, drew back the curtain which covered it, and displayed a canvas prepared for painting, but as yet untouched by brush or paint. He stood some moments in deep thought; then, seizing a pencil and palette and a handful of equally clean brushes, he began to work on the canvas (upon which, of course, he had been engaged during many days and then and locking admiringly upon the effect he imagined he had produced.

"Since you can paint," he said, "why cannot I do the same? She has talent; I, her father, should be even more gifted. And then, she paints for gain, I for the first purchaser—and for money—for I that it should be so. I will paint this picture—only this one—and then I will be a child again—anger, shame shall grasp my models."

He ceased speaking, moved slowly away; then stood looking down upon the floor as in a dream, murmuring:

"Claire, my own but unworthy Claire! I will transmit to posterity the memory of your error, and the revenge I have taken! Noble revenge! Salnval, my best friend, I see him now pierced by my sword."

A nervous smile now contracted his lips; his look became fixed and stern, and he began to talk with great rapidity.

"Yes, Salnval! yes, I killed you, my old friend! but you deprived me of my wife! Oh! I would have killed you twice—aye, every day since! for I loved my wife, the mother of my Cécile—my wife, my poor, unhappy wife!

And so he continued his expressions of grief, and his lamentations; till, in heartrending tones, exclaiming:

"Claire! Claire! forgive me!"

He buried his face in his hands, and wept.

More than an hour elapsed before this paroxysm ended. He then rose sad and humble, picked up the pallet and brushes that had fallen on the floor, and wiped the canvas, saying:

"What I have done to-day is of no value; I will begin again to-morrow."

Then he covered the whole with the green cloth, and again took his seat at the window.

"Two o'clock!" he exclaimed, looking at the sundial on the wall opposite, and turning as if addressing some persons present. "Do not be addressing some persons present. "Do not be impatient, gentlemen," he added, "Salnval is a brave man, he will come. Let us wait a little longer," and he crossed his arms upon his breast, and stood looking towards Paris.

Every day at the same hour, for ten long years, had the old man fought over in imagination the fatal duel in which he had taken the life of the destroyer of his happiness.

And now suddenly his eyes are attracted to an open space at the entrance of the forest, where six men are visible. Two of them take off their coats and lock each other. The old man shudders, for he sees the glitter of steel.

"Stop, stop," he cries, beside himself; "do not fight without me!"

The weapons are lowered; witnesses and combatants seem to be disputing.

"Oh, the coward, the coward!" the old man cries, exasperated; "he receives an apology! They have wounded him of his wife, and refuses to avenge himself! Yes I yes," he continued, clasping his hands, "their swords are crossed again; the taller is the deceived husband—'tis myself! the other is the lover—'tis Salnval! Good! he is wounded! Stop, stop, gentlemen! I will settle this affair till I arrive! I come! I come!" he exclaimed, and springing forward he cleared the window-sill, and fell into the court below.

When he was taken up all consciousness was gone—the old man was dying.

CHAPTER V.

CECILE had soon required her composure after the violent scene of Robert's passionate. She forgot the unjustifiable act he had committed in the absorbing thought of the danger incurred by the marquis, for whom she was now interested. One she loved well, though secretly; and for the other, she felt a deep and sincere affection. But how could she avoid the duel; rendered unavoidable by the chevalier's impetuosity? To whom could she apply? Where should she run whom should she apply? Where should she run to, to prevent a meeting between the two rivals? Her inability to act overwhelmed her with grief, and increased her anxiety. She thought of her father—of the unfinished portrait—on which she had formed hopes even for this very day. The strokes which Robert had made in his anger, had fallen upon the face, which, having been painted some time previous, was well dried at the time. Perhaps she could find the means of preserving the rare colors, without disturbing the old. She made the experiment, and succeeded—and oh! what joy! the portrait might still be delivered, paid for to-day; and this evening, when reason returns to her poor father, she can go herself to him, gratify his fancies, and gain a few moments of enjoyment and peace.

This point settled, her thoughts returned to the duel, and her agony increased. On sending to the marquis and the chevalier's, she learned that both had been absent since morning, and it was now past mid-day, and no news had come. This was what she might have expected, but reason's voice in her ear could not drown that of love, and blood only heard when dashed on its way. The poor young girl, clasping her hands in quiet submission, wept bitterly at the sad remembrance of the unfortunate, the life of her mother had caused the death of another brave man, and deprived her father of his reason—how dreadful to see her whole life. Had she, too, erred? In vain she reviewed her whole course to discover a just motive for self-reproach. She had conducted herself before the tribunal of her own conscience. Satisfied on this important point, she worked resolutely to the completion of her portrait, hoping to fix its proper condition; and towards evening it was finished. Was it the joy for her success, or a secret glad presentiment that had removed the weight of sorrow from her heart? She pounded herself that the duel had not taken place, and listened for the sound in the silence that reigned around the sound of the clashing swords, as if it could have reached her retreat. Seeing it as it could have reached her retreat. Seeing it as messenger. Then, when him the portrait, saying:

"Take this to the Marquis de Maucombe, and bring me an answer."

The order made, and the canvas gone, before which she had shed so many tears, and dreamed away so many hours, she was again attacked by fears and anxieties.

"How long the messenger tarries! The marquis is dead!" she cried, for the poor chevalier still among the living?"

Slow is the flight of time when moments are reckoned by the throbbings of an anxious heart!

The messenger returned at last, bringing a note and little box carefully wrapped up. Cécile, trembling with agitation, snatched the note from his hand, letting drop the box, which, broken by the fall, displayed the gold which it contained—the price of the picture. The note ran thus:

"Be happy! my rival is well. I have kept my promise. His wound, though severe, is not dangerous, I shall come and give you the full particulars."

"Oh, God, I thank thee!" exclaimed Cécile, kneeling down and clasping her hands with joyful emotion; "the marquis is saved!"

CHAPTER VI.

RIEUX, on the way to Vincennes, had told the marquis and Damécourt that, in his evening perigrinations, he had again surprised Cécile; but this time, she was on the road to Vincennes; and that he had been so fortunate as to procure information concerning the romantic journeys of the young artist.

"She is a strange creature," he said, "for I am certain that she has now chosen as her specialty the task of comforting and administering to persons of advanced age; and the object of her special care and attention is now an old man who is obliged to live in perfect seclusion, and who, from the manner—as I am told—in which he speaks of women in general, of his own wife, and of Cécile too, probably cannot be a person of any refinement or respectability. Believe me, it is idle to the extreme to offer a true devotion to a woman with such tastes, and most sinful to risk one's life for such a cause."

So thought the young man, who spoke from his worldly estimation of the young girl's character. The marquis declared, however, that he did not take up his sword as Cécile's champion, but only to avenge the insult he had received from the Chevalier de Saintonge, and the three friends arrived at the forest while still disputing the necessity of the encounter. But Robert de Saintonge had been much less communicative with his friends. He had told them both in secrecy:

"I am challenged to fight—will you stand by me? But first, promise not to seek to arrange matters amicably, and above all, ask me no questions."

The marquis had waited long when the chevalier's carriage made its appearance, and Dumicourt hastened to arrange preliminaries. After a long conversation with Robert, in which he related the particulars which Rieux had just communicated concerning the evening visits of the young girl, he succeeded so far in prejudicing Robert's mind that the two combatants decided to withdraw after the first wound, and that the marquis having insulted Robert in the arm, the two left the fatal friends instead of enemies. It was then decided they should watch Cécile the following day, and that the marquis should call for Robert in his carriage.

"I will not see her again except in your presence, chevalier," the marquis said, "unless," he added, "Cécile sends me my portrait, then, you know, the honor of a gentleman demands I should acknowledge its reception."

"Your portrait!" repeated Robert, almost ashamed at the recollection of the violent act of which he had been guilty. "I advise you, marquis, not to expect it, for I was before you in taking my revenge," he added, pointing to his wounded arm.

"Ah, very well, chaqu'un à son tour," the marquis replied gaily, "and may you be as free from ill-feeling towards me as my poor portrait entertains for you. Adieu till to-morrow."

"Till to-morrow," Robert answered sadly.

CHAPTER VII.

THE marquis now began to regret his promise, and when he received the portrait, which Robert declared he had destroyed by his rashness, he felt less surprised at what he considered a fair indication on the part of the chevalier, than satisfaction at the excuse now offered him for breaking that promise. He therefore did not hesitate to send for an interview with Cécile in the note he sent with the box containing the price of his portrait. The poor girl was too anxious to send an answer, and construing her silence in his favor, the marquis made his appearance the same evening in the Rue Platrière.

"You here, marquis!" exclaimed Robert, who was already on the spot, and gazing up at the house which hid her he had that very day almost renounced as unworthy of his love, but who, nevertheless, absorbed his thoughts.

"By my honor, chevalier, I find you have had as strong an attraction here as myself," the marquis replied, hiding his annoyance beneath a calm exterior.

"You swore never again to see Cécile."

"And if I remember rightly, were you not guilty of the same rash words? But come, chevalier, be frank with me, were you not watching the exit of my unlucky portrait, to avenge a second outrage upon it. But you are too late; the picture is perfectly restored, and has been two hours in my possession. I do not complain of the pleasure in order to revenge yourself upon a rival, but I do of the want of frankness you have shown. Only this morning you declared Cécile was not necessary to your happiness, that she was unworthy of your love."

"But she has been tradueed."

"Indeed! You believe she is true to you?"

"I have to claim upon her."

"You have then never avowed your love?"

"A thousand times; but love gives one no right over its object."

"You have discovered, then, that your love is not returned?"

"Has she told you so?"

"No; but, my poor friend, these strange visits she makes at different places, and at such late hours."

"It is false!"

"But you have proved this yourself, and acknowledged it many times."

"I know not then what I said; fool that I am!" he exclaimed in broken accents. "I love her, and you, marquis, you shall prove her not, she shall."

The Marquis de Mancombe, though a gay man of the world, and little accustomed to attach so much importance to les affaires de cœur, was touched by the sincere grief of his companion.

"Come, my friend," he said gently, "calm yourself, you take this too much to heart. I would not willingly cause the unhappiness of a man who has so lately declared his friendship for me. I renounce all claim to Cécile's love. To you I entrust her happiness. On the honor of a gentleman I withdraw from the pursuit, fully persuaded that your great devotion entitles you to success;" and he tried to draw Robert away from the house, but the latter was already at the door, and had rung the bell.

"Monsieur would see Mademoiselle Cécile?" enquired the portress.

"Yes," Robert replied, pale with emotion.

"She is not at home, sir."

"Are you sure she is not in?" Robert again asked.

"She went out at dark," the portress replied, "and I think has gone some distance, for she ordered a carriage and told me she would not return to-night."

Robert looked sad and disappointed. The marquis with difficulty restrained a smile.

"Well, my friend," he said, drawing away the chevalier, who no longer resisted him, "shall we go call on Damfreville?"

De Saintonge made no reply, but a deep sigh told the anguish he endured.

My Aunt Mary.

My Aunt Mary! Thoughts of her fill my mind this beautiful June morning. Thrice have I tried to fix my mind upon this delightful Euclid lesson, and second step by step to the crowning glory of his incomparable logic. Even Euclid has no charms for me; for the great God of reason and all good-grey has spread a richer feast. Glorious morning! indescribable beauty! Poets may write and rhyme of thee; but who can describe the delightful feeling, the deep sweetness, the all-pervading glory, resting upon and hanging over all the halo of beauty.

It seems as if I must write Aunt Mary's history. I have long contemplated this pleasant task, and have several times commenced, but have as often been interrupted, and obliged to lay it aside.

There at the foot of yonder blossom-laden tree I will resume the work. My Aunt Mary was the daughter of a wealthy farmer; at the same time the youngest, handsomest and the most admired of a family of six. She was petted and indulged so much by her injudicious parents that it is indeed surprising that it did not prove her ruin. Everybody said that she would be something or nothing; not because she manifested any extraordinary talent, but because she threw the whole being into whatever she attempted to do. She grew up proud, imperious and vain. Her wealth, beauty and talents had the attraction for her side many admirers, and, strange to say, one true-hearted lover—Ernest Ashley. It seems surprising that one with a noble spirit and cultured mind and heart should have been so entirely fascinated by a coquette.

But so it was; when he could not get near, on account of the multiplicity of her flirtations, he worshipped afar off. At length opportunity and perseverance prevailed. She condescended to pledge to him her heart and hand, and it became known far and wide that Mary Ashley and Mary Thornley were engaged. Two years were to elapse between the promise and its fulfilment. In the meantime were to be seen the wonders of the United States and Mexico. Being naturally fond of adventure, and too young to consider the hardships, privations and dangers of a soldier's life, he and his brother Egbert volunteered their services for a year, and left their homes in the month of June, 1846. A few days after the willow tree shook a shadow they bade adieu to the fair young creatures who had promised to be their affianced wives.

Had they have realised whit would be the anguish of that moment, neither the pomp nor glory of war, nor the love of adventure would have induced them to part even for so short a time from those dearer than life; but the sorrow of separation was mitigated by the sweet assurance that they would write often. During their brief absence many love-freighted missives passed back and forth. In the year, like all other years, the first days of June has again returned. The twilight of a lovely day is mantling the earth with sombre shadow. Mary Thornley and Mary Ashley sit under the old oak conversing deeply of the absent loved ones. They cast their eyes towards the east, and see two travellers approaching in the dim light. Both are lame, and both carry a staff. They seem very much fatigued. Now they have come to the old oak.

It is Ernest—it is Ebbert. Julia received Ebbert with the beautiful simplicity of undisguised affection; but alas! for Mary Thornley, she betrayed both disappointment and mortification. Certainly she had expected a more impassioned, and the warmth of true and unchangeable love was wanting in her greeting.

She slept but little that night. The bitterness of unsubdued pride was stirred from its depths. Shall Mary Thornley, the beauty and belle of Elton, have her maimed and sickly lover? Never! Never! The next day she sent him a very politely worded note, desiring to be released from the engagement.

Not long after she was walking out with her friend Julia; for though the bond which had drawn them so close together was now severed, they were still friends—when they heard a sharp rattle, but before they could jump back to avoid the deadly serpent, it had coiled itself around and it into the earth.

They looked up. Ernest Ashley stood before them, and Ebbert was coming up, but they appeared not as when they met them at the old oak. The bloom of youth and health was gone from their cheeks; their limbs were as strong and flexible as ever; they stood erect in manly beauty.

"Mary Thornley," said Ernest, in a voice never to be forgotten, "I have received your note. You are released from the engagement. I have written over against your name upon the page of memory, 'tried in the balance and found wanting.' I stay not here amid broken idols and crushed hopes. I could not breathe the same air with you. Farewell, friends! yea, more than friends, my sister Julia and brother Ebbert. Bear my adieus and best wishes to those at home." So saying he took the woodland path and disappeared over the same hill upon which he was first seen by Julia and Mary. Though gossip glutted itself upon this unhappy separation and its cause, Mary Thornley still moved in the circles of fash. She recked not that she had pressed upon her once-heart [illegible]'s love a wreath of mourning cypress—she still wore the myrtle and went forth "conquering and to conquer." To the great delight of those who envied and those who hated her, she was at last caught in her own net.

It was in the summer of 1856 that Henrique Woodworth first made his appearance in Elton society. He was a lawyer, standing high in his profession and in the literary world; but like too many of earth's children, self was the great centre towards which all his thoughts and aspirations tended. Brilliant in wit and beauty, his principles were like a spider's web. But oh! what fascination was there in his dark basal eye; what power in his rich musical voice to stir the depths of the heart, and lead it to pour out its richness and sweetness upon this unworthy shrine.

Mary Thornley thought that at last she had found her equal, and not doubting an easy conquest, she gave herself up to the pleasure and excitement of the chase.

The élite of Elton had planned a Leap year picnic, and were determined, if possible, to outdo in gallantry the "lords of creation." Mary was among the leading spirits, and the offered and accepted escort of the brilliant lawyer, Henrique Woodworth.

The summer swiftly sped with this gay circle, nor did the autumn leaves swiftly with my Aunt Mary and Henrique. They rode, they conversed, they walked together. His name became synonymous with the inspirations of the future, and sweet thoughts of him mingled with all her thoughts.

Her old coquettish pride had vanished, and she knelt to the god to whom she had caused so many before her bleeding, and for the first time she realised the anguish of seeing the heart's best and truest affections trifled with and trampled upon. She determined to confess to her the gay part in which she had so long been the bright particular star.

As for Aunt Mary, it seemed for a while as if the iron fingers of Despondency were feeling for the very springs of life. Bus affliction began to reduce and reflection to strengthen, and every new high purpose, "she sat at the feet of Jesus," and learned of Him. "Be still and know that I am God," and went about Life's great work, so long neglected. She found this work so great, so allabsorbing, that the sting of her self-inflicted immolation, to me to resign herself to the woes of hopeless love, so she was happy—happy in doing her duty, happy in making others happy, the highest kind of happiness.

Gently and lovingly she supported the steps of her invalid parents to the desolvity of life, and received their blessing as they closed their eyes in the sweet sleep of death. They did not forget to pray for her before they left her—they died. It was arranged that she should have Rose cottage, a beautiful home indeed, in sight of my father's dwelling, where she resolved when thirty years of age, bringing with her an orphan niece and adopted nephew, to those another had left in two years before and whose father had long since been numbered with the dead. It is five years since Rose Cottage was surrounded with their songs of joy and gladness. But come with me and I will introduce you to my Aunt Mary.

This, "the old oak tree," is just the time to visit Rose Cottage; it could not have received a more appropriate name. Twenty varieties of the queen of flowers in full bloom, and the old oak itself is nearly covered with running roses, the purse white beautifully contrasting with velvet red and crimson. Here is a rustic seat at the door smiling a welcome.

You would like a picture of her? I can describe her features, her complexion, but what are they without the expression, the true-soul beauty, the cheerful eye, the smile, the voice of sweet music. She is a Saxon beauty; her hair is a delicate flaxen, still curling in merry ringlets about her neck; her forehead broad and intellectual; her eyes are "blue as the summer heavens;" features, if anything, too small and regular; complexion, like the pure white rose in the garden.

But let us enter and glance at the interior. The first thing which strikes our attention is an exquisite bouquet of flowers in a white porcelain vase upon the centre table. The rich orange and black carpet contrasts elegantly with the white satin and gold papers upon the walls and the grey lace curtains.

Annie and Augustus have gone out for a few minutes, but here is the piano, which both play admirably, and Annie's guitar standing in the corner. Aunt Mary must see me the range of the house, perhaps she would not if she knew what I was doing. I find the kitchen, the pantry, the cupboards, as neat as the parlor; the unpapered walls, clean and white, and the floors innocent of a grease spot. She does not trust altogether to servants; her own head and hands contrive, plan and labor to make home cheerful, comfortable and unscrupulously neat. Annie's apartment is called the blue room, and is elegantly furnished with delicate blue and white hangings, carpet and furniture to match; but here is Aunt Mary's room. I know I shall "let the cat out," but the temptation is too great; the door is already open. What cream this bridal veil with its wreath of white rosebuds and emerald leaves? this snowy white muslin, and all the elegant paraphernalia of bridal costume! This is to be Aunt Mary's room no longer.

Come to the window! Yonder Ashley Hall rears its grand proportions where those aged elms and gloomy pines cast their deep shadows. To-morrow Aunt Mary will awake in a grander but not a lovelier home. Six months ago Ernest Ashley returned, and in that short time we have all learned to love the noble, manly, self-sacrificing proved to him an excellent teacher. He came back with higher and nobler purposes, to spend the remainder of his life in duty, and around the home of his childhood. He had long since abandoned the idea of marrying; but, finding the heartless coquette, whom he once loved, become a meek and true-hearted woman, he was so weak as to fall more deeply in love with her than before, and break his resolution and all.

But I must hasten home, for cousin Augustus and I are pledged to attend the bride the happy one, who will, to-night, more than realise that, though the star of love set, and the shadows of night fall upon our pathway, it may arise in tenfold brightness and glory.

SIEGE OF PETERSBURG.

Storming of the first Line at Baylor's Farm.

At one o'clock of the morning of the 15th June the column of Smith—consisting of Brannan's Brigade of Hinks's division—left our fortifications, Brannan's command having took the lead, and before daylight the entire command had crossed the pontoon bridge across the Appomattox, above Point of Rocks, and was in full march on the road city. Pickets pushed rapidly ahead, drove the rebel pickets before him until he arrived at their first line of works, turned to the left and moved to the fortifications on the other side of the city.

Gen. Smith had under his command two divisions of the new corps and a brigade of artillery, besides the cavalry division of Kautz. Following after the cavalry, the column arrived second on the battlefield, and were soon before the first line of rebel works, along the front of which the cavalry had passed some time before.

Gen. Hinks formed his command in line of battle, and advanced upon the rebel works, with Brannan commanding his right and Holman his left. The result of this charge was watched with great anxiety. The majority of the whites expected that the colored troops would run, but the subtle forces astonished everybody by their excellence. With a shout that must certainly have struck terror into the hearts of their foes, the 23d and 6th U. S. colored regiments, commanded by Colo. Riddler and Conner, charged, under a hot fire of musketry and artillery, over the rebel ditch and parapet, and drove the enemy before them, capturing a large force of prisoners, and taking entire possession of their works, its defenders, Carpenter's and Lewis's Carolina Cavalry and Graham's Petersburg battery, seeking safety in rapid flight, leaving their dead and wounded in the ditch.

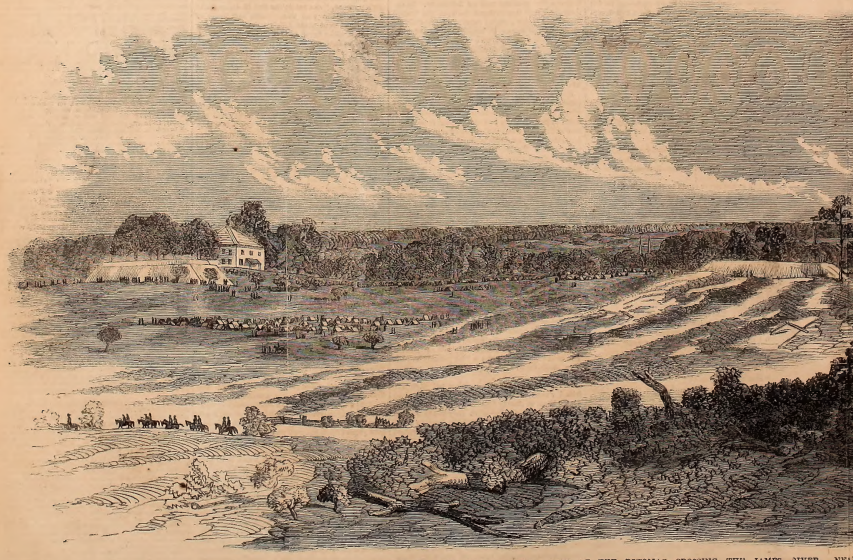
When the negroes found themselves within the works of the enemy a cheer could be heard for miles off. Numbers of them kissed the gun they had captured with unbounded enthusiasm, while the whole scene was manifested to get ahead and charge some more of the rebel works. Another of the colored troops were wounded and a few killed in the first charge. A large force concentrated, with the idea of unmistakable annihilation, about Sergt. Richardson and Corpl. Wolsey, of the U. S. colored troops, who had taken the two colors of their regiment, and bore the first men in the works. Our rebel prize was a stake of the same nature, which can only be attributed, we suppose, to the Southern confederate breach of the rules of warfare as to our colored troops.

Gen. Smith, in his congratulatory order to his troops, says: "But the crowning point of the honor they are entitled to for this day was won at the front. In 1863, when a series of earthworks, on most commanding positions of formidable strength, have been carried, with all the guns and materials of war of the enemy, including prisoners and colors. The works have all been held, and the trophies remain in our hands.

"Soldiers, I thank you for your conduct. Since the troops have never been regularly organized in camps, where they have been gradually trained in the discipline and instruction of unparalleled corps d'armee, but they have been hastily concentrated and thrown into battle to take part in the trying campaign of our country's being. Such honor as they have won will remain immortal.

"To the colored troops comprising the division of Gen. Hinks, the commander commends the zeal and devotion of his command. With the veterans of the 18th corps Gen. Hinks stormed the works of the enemy and carried them, taking guns and prisoners, and in the whole affair added to the high reputation of good soldiers."

Gen. Smith gratefully remarked his line-of-battle along the whole rebel front, and about noon the rapid discharges of Kautz's howitzers announced that the officer was making desperate efforts to carry the works on the Baylor farm. Through the Appomattox Brook, on the centre, and Martindale and Hinks on the flanks, were simultaneously the commands that sprang to the formidable character of the rebel works, and the difficult nature of the ground. It was only with the utmost difficulty that the troops could be properly disposed for charging effectively.



A simultaneous advance of three infantry divisions, after a desperate fight, carried the rebel outer line, and we succeeded in getting a good position on which to mass our artillery, and operate on the inner main works, which were descovered to be strong earthworks, flanked here and there by massive bastion forts.

The artillery was under the direction of Capt. Follett, of Thompson's, Turner's and Ellsworth's guns were soon in position on high ground, immediately in front of Avirett's house, on the City point and Jordan road, and commenced a succession of artillery volleys that drowned every other sound, and completely silenced the rebel guns.

Night was approaching when the charge was finally ordered by Gen. Smith. At half-past five P. M. Brooke advanced, and the assault was made. Martindale was, on the rebels right, a most important point. It was, too, the most difficult to be compassed, of which reason a large number of troops were massed to concentrate in a series of embrasures. It was held by Graham's battery of Carpenter's and Wise's brigades, and by dismounted troops, with Capt. Sturdivant's battery. Those kept up a continuous fire, but at half-past six the charge in advance was given, and under cover of the fire of the whole artillery, consisting of Burnham's battery, the enemy from their rifle-pits, and the 18th New Hampshire, 10th Connecticut charged across the open plain, and without wavering poured like a torrent over the walls, driving the enemy before them, taking six guns, a battle-flag, 300 prisoners, including Sturdivant's, two of his lieutenants, and Major Bake, and all in about five minutes. On the right Martindale swept over and through the rebel works, taking three guns, and Hinks took successively three lines, the chivalry fleeing from the ex-slaves.

We give on our double page a graphic panoramic view of the works taken. They are less than three miles from Petersburg, the spires of the city being visible, as will be remarked. Petersburg can be shelled at any moment. It might be occupied, but the enemy held ground which commands it.

WORK AWAY.

Work away!
For the master's eye is on us,
Never off us, still upon us,
Night and day!
Work away!

Keep the busy fingers plying;
Keep the ceaseless shuttles flying;
See that never thread lie wrong;
Let not clash or clatter 'round us,
Sound of whizzing wheels confound us;
Steady hand! let woof be strong
And firm, that has to last so long!
Work away!

Keep upon the anvil ringing
Stroke of hammer; On the gloom
Set 'twixt cradle and twixt tomb
Shower of fiery sparkles flinging;
Keep the mighty furnance glowing;
Keep the red ore hissing, flowing
Swift within the ready mould;
See that each one than the old
Still be fitter, still be fairer
For the servant's use, and rarer
For the master to behold:
Work away!

For the Leader's eye is on us,
Never off us, still upon us,
Night and day!
Work away!

Wide the trackless prairies round us,
Dark and unsunned woods surround us,
Steep and savage mountains bound us;
Far away
Smile the soft Savannahs green,
Rivers sweep and roll between;
Work away!

Bring your axes, woodmen true,
Smite the forest till the blue
Of Heaven's sunny eye looks through
Every wild and tangled glade;
Jungle, swamp and thicket shade
Give to-day!

O'er the torrents fling your bridges,
Pioneers! Upon the ridges
Widen, smooth, the rocky stair.
They that follow far behind,
Coming after us, will find
Surer, easier footing there,
Heart to heart, and hand with hand,
From the dawn to dusk of day,
Work away!

Scouts upon the mountains peak—
Te that see the Promised Land,
Hearten us! for ye can speak
Of the country ye have scanned,
Far away!
Work away!

For the Father's eye is on us!
Never off us, still upon us,
Night and day!
Work away!

Pray! and work will be completer;
Work! and prayer will be the sweeter;
Love! and prayer and work the fleeter
Will ascend upon their way!

Pear not lest the busy finger
Wears a net the soul to stay;
Give her wings—she will not linger;
Soaring to the source of day;
Clearing clouds that still divide us
From the azure depths of rest,
She will come again! beside us
With the sunshine on her breast;
Sit and sing to us, while quickest
On their tasks their fingers move,
While the outward din was thickest,
Songs that she hath learned above.

Live in Future as in Present;
Work for both while yet the day
Is our own! for bird and peasant,
Long and bright as summer's day,
Cometh, ye more sure, more pleasant
Cometh soon our holiday!

CHAPTER XIV.

If you can behold it,
I'll make the stolen story mine; indeed,
And take you by the hand.
Do you doubt me? Approach! Behold!
Stand with your eyes upon me!
Wonder's Tale, Act V., Sc. 3.

ST. CROIX had received a long letter from Marina, which the events of the day had prevented him from more than glancing at, but he was well pleased to retire for the night to the room Elfstone had assigned him, and enjoy a thorough and leisurely perusal of the lengthy communication with which his heart's idol had favored him.

The apartment he occupied had been fitted up to suit the taste of a wealthy female member of the Elfstone family, an enthusiastic Romanist, at variance with all her relativesin her religious views, and was in the most elaborate Gothic style. It contained a miniature oratory and a beautiful statue of the Virgin Mary, by an Italian sculptor of celebrity. Many other little evidences of the pious turn of the deceased, who had made it her asylum.

The mind of Julien St. Croix was replete with devotion now, but to a very terrestrial deity, and, with little sense of the sacredness of his surroundings, he seated himself in a richly-carved oaken chair and began the reading which he had for hours longed to devour to the last syllable.

The greater part of the letter consisted of the narrative of events already recorded in a preceding chapter, and its disagreeable conclusion, all that need be given, read as follows:

"And now, my dear friend, I know what your true heart is thinking: 'She has escaped a life of horror, is she any better for it?' Is she as innocent rigible as ever?' Julien, I am changed—a different being. 'Yes,' you say, 'but you are continually that.' The changes of which you are thinking were on the surface, but this is radical. Whether I am better or worse it does not become me to decide; but as many things have pronounced it an impossibility for me to grow worse, I argue that I must be improved. I am afraid I shall lose the love of all my male friends in consequence. Poor Jacques—where is his dreadful soul now?—thought hate more piquant than love, and I suspect your ex-gruesomely-suffering wickedness to virtue for the same reason. Am I not right? Fish up an answer from the deep well of your heart and tell me truly. Your dive of it with a gentle, placid and kindly enough, but sadly wants (what it can never have) the sweet sparkle, laughing mischief, sweet temptation, and soul-inflaming power of wickedness. Pray for me, dear Julien, pray for me, for I am beginning to backslide at the bare thought of daring devilry.

"It was with no little trepidation that I returned to my mother, whose estimate of me I knew would be frustrated. She seemed, however, to be more afraid of me than I was of her, but when I had told my story, which concluded with the death of Jacques Renvi, she caught me in her arms, kissed me a hundred times, and wept for joy, as she exclaimed:

"'Marina, you have saved me! For the first time in many years I breathe freely. While that man lived by my vow that of a criminal condemned to die, and only respited from time to time to prolong his suspense and suffering.'

"I had spent some weeks happily with my mother, when the Countess of Visadin called upon us, and insisted upon taking me with her to London. I am half-inclined to suspect that she was afraid to cross the Channel without me. Here I am, therefore, in the house of the Italian minister of the baronet. His health is failing, and he leaves town in a few days for Wilborne Hall, his country seat. I am invited to spend the summer there.

"Before I left Uberto's cave I invited its venerable occupant to visit Ellingford. I should like Bart and Elfstone to meet. The former is a grand old man—I have a passion for grand old men—and almost as inspired as the sculptor. He declines to quit his self-marriage; but I entertain a shrewd now that will surely drive him out of it.

"I shall run down to Ellingford as soon as the countess allows me an opportunity to escape. Has Bertram actually gone to America in search of his gay brother and the ghost of his mother? We will find one in the antipodes and the other in the moon. Tell father that his Serpent is coiling up for a spring into his studio, and that he will be locked in her folds when he next expects it.

"Julien, love me, pray for me, and believe me ever your affectionate

MARINA.

It was long past midnight when Julien St. Croix, having finished his answer to Marina's letter, was kneeling in the little oratory engaged in prayer and heard a nervous tapping at the door. He did not immediately reply to the summons, and the next moment the door was thrown open, Elfstone and behold a figure in an first deemed a spirit, so white and heavenly did it look, advancing towards him.

"Come! come quick!" it cried. "Bertram is—I don't know—I fear I have killed him!"

* * * * *

Notwithstanding the succession, of excitements through which Julien St. Croix had just passed, he was up betimes, and had been for half an hour in the room when Mrs. Berton ushered Muta into the room. The old lady had no sooner left the apartment, than Muta anxiously inquired:

"Have you seen Bertram this morning?"

"I stole into his room a while ago, and found him sleeping pleasantly, as though he had never been nearly frightened to death by the terrible semblance of life in a marble statue. Had I not been in a sense spiritual state of mind when you found me, I should have been no better able to sustain the shock you gave me than Bertram. I thought you an emissary from the infernal regions to my prayer. You must not indulge in many of these freaks, Miss Elfstone, or you will surely have to answer for the death of some of us."

"Twill never do so again; for when I found Bertram lying so lolligan, cold and dead, I thought I should die myself. When I raised him and tried to bring him to, he fell from my trembling arms so heavily that my fear began to turn with horror. I went to find some one, and if I had not seen the light in your room and found you there, I should have filled the house with shrieks."

"And driven your father raving mad. What is to be done about his statue, which you have shattered to atoms, I have puzzled my brain in vain to decide."

"I will take its place."

St. Croix shook his head.

"Why not? Am I not better for a bride than a cold stone?"

"Infinitely. The only difficulty is that you cannot make yourself look sufficiently like it to deceive the sight."

"Was it not like me? Did not Bertram mistake me for the statue? All I have to do is to make myself very pale, dress in white, look down, and hold myself immovably in one position."

Muta struck an attitude and looked so much like the statue that St. Croix was taken with her idea. Its novelty and boldness captivated him, and he consented to act as her accomplice in carrying out the innocent but impudent deception. The humorous offcenters of the scheme would, he hoped, divert the dangerous tenor of Elfstone's mind into a new and safer channel, and turn a mad farce into a genial and lasting reality.

The conspirators were impressed with the necessity of immediate action, and soon busy with their preparations for the execution of their plot. Muta retired to her chamber before Bertram came down to breakfast, and sent her excuses to him, made under the pretence of illness, for not appearing. St. Croix and Bertram were joined at the breakfast table by their host and a young clergyman. The latter, a tall, pale, and sour visaged Low Churchman, came summons, looked rather mystified, but the old sculptor was in high spirits and talked with sparkling fluency. Bertram was silent and nervous. St. Croix was anxious and watchful, and availed himself of his first opportunity to engage in a private conversation with the clergyman in the library. From him he went straight to Bertram, and said, bluntly:

"The sooner this idle ceremony is performed the better. I have little hopes of Elfstone's recovery till it is over."

"Yes; let us have done with this fantastic mummery at once, for I am beginning to feel more and more uneasy about it. I had dreams last night, as vivid as daylight, about the statue, and, womanish as you may think me, I confess that I am as nervous and full of superstitious apprehension as the veriest victim of the fortuneteller."

"Well, Bertram, if you have a presentiment of evil—"

"Of nonsense! Like Hamlet, I defy augury. No, Julien, when I feel a weakness, instead of yielding to it or wrestling away from it, I conquer it. En avant! marchons!"

* * * * *

Elfstone's studio was darkened, and, when the curtains concealing the statue were drawn aside it was found to be gracefully draped in tissue, wreathed about the brow and bosom with orange flowers, and covered with a very large, rich and beautiful veil. Elfstone, whose eyes were beginning to burn, was in the room as well as nothing, and would have taken the descent of a choir of angels through the ceiling as a matter of course. He was gratified with the propriety of the change, and felt happier than he had been for many a long year. Bertram wassurprised, received a vague impression that the statue was not exactly set up, but was so bewildered and nervous, and in such agitated haste to get through with the ceremony and rid of the companionship of Elfstone, that he paid little attention to the marble and its attiring.

The young clergyman, with some adroitness, adapted his service to the requirements of the occasion. Elfstone gave away the bride, and it was Bertram's, not the statue's, hand that trembled when the former put the ring upon the fourth finger of the bride's left hand. Still more agitated he grew when, at the minister's injunction of "Let us pray" the statue sank beside him. At the conclusion of the prayer, when the priest joined their right hands together, he felt the pressure of the warm, living hand, and all the horror of his dream came back upon him. The same frightning thoughts flashed, wild and dreadful, through his brain.

"What had he married? Not a woman. What then? A fiend. Who had tempted him? Amadman—perhaps a self-wished himself.

Every man has some latent superstition in his nature, and in the hour of his weakness and nervousness this strange reason may be surprised and paralyzed, and his self-possession lost, as were Bertram's, when he lifted the bride's veil and, through his hands shook violently, his eyes swam, and his brain reeled; but when his lips touched hips warm and moist, and his eyes met eyes of gleaming blue, his senses failed him; he neither saw, felt, heard nor knew anything more.

It was surprising how quickly Elfstone's shattered nerves, like those of Bertram, whom he had loved as if he had been his own son, restored the old man to himself. Julien and St. Croix, who came to his assistance to the aid of his friend, with promptitude and address. But when Bertram came to himself, and, finding the statue removed, began to question as to what had happened to him, Elfstone could only reply:

"What has befallen you I cannot explain. If it be not miraculous my reason wanders, and I hope somebody will make the matter clear for your sake and mine."

St. Croix looked round the room, and perceived that the bride had vanished. Having first asked pardon of Elfstone for Bertram, whom he whispered in his ear a few words that brought back the rich blood to the young man's cheek, the radiance to his eye, and the smile to his lip

"I will fetch her back and introduce her now," exclaimed Bertram, rushing out of the studio.

What does this mean?" demanded the bewildered sculptor.

"What your heart most wishes—no more, no less," responded St. Croix.

Bertram re-entered with Muta, confused, blushing, and more beautiful than ever, and he led her to her father.

"Father," said he, "the Lost Love is gone for ever, and the Found Love has taken her place. She thinks you made of marble is no more, but your Muta, made of your own flesh and blood, lives and stands before you."

If Muta could go backward or stand still for twelve years and more, I should call this lady my wife, but as it cannot, she must be my daughter."

"If you need proof—"

"I need proof! Who shall teach me to know my own daughter? Not all the witnesses in the world, if not my own heart and eyes. Muta, my darling child!"

"Father!"

Muta rushed into his arms, and the long-severed father and child were locked in the embrace of parental and filial love, the holiest of all.

CHAPTER XV.

Beauty provoketh thieves sooner than gold.
As You Like It, Act I., Sc. 3.

I longed for thee, and sought for thee,
In all these agonies, and woke, and found thee.
Sardanapalus, Act IV., Sc. 1.

MUTA, one beautiful May morning, was wandering down a shady lane, plucking field flowers and singing from her heart, like a bird, deeming herself the happiest of mortals, when she was suddenly confronted by the last being, whom, of all mankind, she dreaded most, Gregory Grimgrip.

His look paralyzed and fascinated her in an instant, and she stood and gazed at him with her face assumed the vacant and half idiotic expression of her lonely childhood. Grimgrip saw his advantage in a moment, and was as quickly resolved to profit by it. He measured her with death on the spot if she did not keep silent, seized her hand in his, and led her away.

Muta felt powerless, as we sometimes do in a horrible dream, and in this moment of dire need her self-possession entirely forsook her. It was not till she found herself shut in a close carriage, and driven rapidly she knew not whither, that the spell which had fallen upon her, benumbing all her faculties, dissolved in a burst of tears, bringing home to her a full sense of her calamity, and plunging her into a paroxysm of inconsolable grief and despair.

Muta was soon missed at Ellingford Hall, and diligent search immediately made for her. Nothing was, however, ascertained that threw any light upon her sudden disappearance, but the fact that an extremely ugly man had, on the evening before, been seen prowling about the premises. This was, nevertheless, enough to convince Bertram (who had just made a second visit to Liverpool, accompanied by his first adventure in that town), that the author of Muta's abduction was Grimgrip himself. Week lapsed before any thing more valuable than her was ascertained. Bertram was nearly frantic, and Elfstone's great pity for him alone preserved his life and saved him from sinking into a state of lamentable condition. Bertram, after having hardly eaten or slept at all for a week and more, had just returned from a long and hopeless journey, fatigued and despairing, and had fallen from sheer exhaustion into an uneasy slumber in the library, when Julien St. Croix arrived at Ellingford. She sat by his side, and wept to view the sad alteration his bereavement and sorrow had made in the young man. At one time he seemed to be dreaming, and she heard her own name escape his lips. A delicious thrill quickened her pulse, and her tears ceased. Fear of what she was doing, she stooped down and kissed his now pallid but still beautiful mouth. He woke at the gentle touch.

"Marina," he exclaimed, with pleasure beaming in his eyes, "how have I longed to see you!"

"I have longed to see you, Bertram, but from a different motive. You need me, I suppose, for something you cannot accomplish yourself."

"Yes, Marina, I do, but not for myself."

"Would you dill but your father-in-law has told me all. I am as ignorant as yourself of Muta's whereabouts."

"Say not that, Marina! You are my last and only hope. Have you seen Grimgrip? You surely know where he is to be found?"

"All I know of Mr. Grimgrip, Julien took me in London."

Bertram looked incredulous, and Marina burst into tears.

"I see you still think me capable of deceiving you"

"Pardon me, Marina. My mind is disordered, and I know not what I do, and hardly what I think. I shall go mad if I do not find Muta soon. I would give my own existence to know where that demon, Grimgrip, is, for he has stolen her."

"I would accept no reward from Bertram Hapa though I had a realm to offer, but if Muta's captor be in England I will discover his hidingplace in a few days, perhaps in a few hours."

Bertram caught at their Frenchwoman in his arms, kissed her, and vowed that she was the noblest of her sex, and the loveliest, except his darling lost love.

Marina was absent from the hall about three hours. When Bertram espied her coming up Ellingford beautiful avenue, he ran to meet her.

"Have you succeeded?"

"You would never have seen me again if I had not. Here is Grimgrip's address."

Marina handed Bertram a direction, written with a pencil on the back of an envelope.

"That man," she continued," "is too ugly to find a hiding-place in any inhabited region. I had no sooner suggested my friendly services—to whom I always apply first for information—a guinea to tell me who and where the ugliest man in London was than there was but one, once shouted Grimgrip, and gave me his address. They give a very bad account of the old fellow, alleging that he is not only the ugliest but the meanest and most desperate old miser in existence. He has bought or leased an old house by the sea-side, where he lives by himself with no other company than that of his deaf and dumb old housekeeper, and takes great delight in refusing any beggar who ventures to apply to him for charity.

"Marina, you are infallible. I never knew another being at once so quick and keen. Had you been a man, what a politician you would have made. You are amazing, that calms, cribs and confines genius so much as prelicoats."

Bertram would have set out on his journey in search of Grimgrip alone, had not Elfstone insisted upon accompanying him. Bertram's haste was great, and it was not until they were seated in a railway car together, and borne on the wings of steam to their destination, that he found time or temper to talk deliberately on the business he had undertaken to accomplish. Between them, many suppositions, hopes, fears, menaces, doubts and devices were freely vanilated, and though they decided upon resorting to a legal authority and a surprise, their sage consultations served better to kill time than to benefit them in any other way. They had a cunning enemy to deal with, and one who was now always on his guard. Their agents' measures and decided action proved therefore of no avail, and after ransacking Grimgrip's residence from cellar to roof, and thoroughly searching the neighborhood without discovering a trace of poor Muta, of whom he denied all knowledge whatever, they were obliged to relinquish their efforts, in spite of Bertram's longing to persevere.

When the last hope was gone Bertram walked up to Grimgrip, and said:

"I do not believe that you think you do or can deceive me. I know that you have stolen my wife, and have her concealed in some durance here about. You are guilty of this crime, but not convicted of it, and therefore I cannot kill you. But mark me well, if I find that you have so much as injured one hair of her head, or even threatened her with worse, during your imprisonment of her, I'll have your heart out, though I have to tear it from your body with my naked hands! For the last time, I demand my wife of you."

"I know nothing of your wife."

"That he shall yet sink you into the lowest pit of eternal despair. Remember—for every pang that Muta Hapswell suffers, you shall endure a thousand; so, the shorter you make her captivity, the better will your wretched self fare."

"Mr. Hapswell, you talk to me as if you were addressing some wild cannibal. Your suspicion shows a guilty mind; your threats, debased ire and your threats, a weak one. I defy you—do your worst!"

Bertram looked at the fearless, infuriated old man, his face inflamed and distorted with passion, and but for his white hair would have felled him to his feet.

"You are playing a dangerous game, old man," said he, mastering his wrath; "but boldly and freely as you venture you will lose, as surely as the wrong is on your side and the right on mine."

When the bereaved father and lover returned to Ellingford, they met Marina at some distance from the hall, and stopped their postchaise to take her up.

"Where's Muta?" said she, looking into the carriage. "You have not left her with old Grimgrip, have you?"

We turned his house and grounds upside down, but could not find her on the premises," answered Elfstone.

Marina raised her eyebrows for a moment, and for a moment a sneer curved her most beautiful mouth. She said, coldly:

"I'm glad you were so keen for you, eh? I feared as much. Drive on; I came out for a walk with Flora, who expected you to restore her mistress to her."

Flora was a pet spaniel of Muta's, a present from Bertram, but now following Marina. Bertram leaped out of the carriage and told the driver to proceed, as he intended to walk the rest of the way.

"And so you think that Muta was concealed in Grimgrip's house, after all."

"I do."

"Boy you have no idea how suddenly we pounced upon the old wretch, and to what a close scrutiny we subjected him and his belongings."

"I know nothing but what you tell me, Bertram."

"Then why do you sneer at our failure?"

"Bertram, all you have asked me to do I have done, and have therefore some right to your confidence. You may hurried away on this journey without affording me the opportunity of advising with you. How long had you been endeavoring to find Grimgrip, when, in despair, you resorted to me for aid and guidance? I succeeded in three hours."

"Well?"

"Well!"

"What shall I do?"

"When next you visit Mr. Grimgrip's castle take somebody of intelligence with you."

"Yourself?"

"I make no pretension to the character."

"Who, then?"

Marina walked to the little dog that followed her, which immediately leaped into her arms. She presented the little creature to Bertram.

"Take Flora!"

"By Jove, you are right, girl! Flora would have been better than an army. How inevitably you hit upon the only right idea. You make me ashamed of myself, and respect your sex more and more every time I meet you. What a brain you have for a general, a prime minister or an empress! Reinforced with Flora, I will return to the ghoul's den forthwith, and rescue Muta. She shall learn to love you as well as I do."

"Better, if you please."

"Ah, you flatter me now dearly I love you, Marina; I am myself afraid to think how much."

When Bertram reached the hall, he found a letter awaiting him of a most ominous exterior. The address was in his mother's handwriting, and Bertram, whose prescient nervousness at times proved to him more overwhelming than the saddest reality, let the letter fall in his tremulous attempts to break its seal.

"Marina, open it—read it—I cannot."

She complied, and read these words, all the note contained:

"My son, your father is dying. Come without a moment's delay, or you may be too late."

Bertram's color now fled from his cheeks and lips as if he had received a deathstroke, and Marina caught him by the arm to prevent him from falling. His grief and distress were extreme, enbled by each counter and imperious summons, the one of love and captivity, and the other of duty and death. He was bewildered, confounded, and torn by terrible and conflicting emotions.

"I must go," he muttered, almost inarticulately.

"Yes, Bertram; there is no alternative here; you must return to your parents without delay. Why do you pause?"

"I go, Marina; but what may not happen to Muta while I am watching by the bedside of my dying father? I will not a reckling horror that these crises should both occur at this moment? Is no effort to be made for her recovery from this monster? I shall go mad. Oh, Marina, dear—"

"Dear Bertram—"

"I cannot you from death once. Save me—rescue Muta now, and your debt shall be cancelled and my life for ever after at your service."

"You do not exact the fulfilment of a promise, Bertram, freely given, and to be religiously performed."

"Do you think you will succeed?"

"I am not apt to fail, Bertram, and in this undertaking death only shall balk me of success. You little guess what a sacrifice I must make to obey you, but were it a thousand times greater, for your sake it should be offered as freely as my orisons to heaven. Hasten to your father, and rest assured that when you return hither, if Marina does not give you back your arms, she will herself have departed whither your father is going. Good-bye, Bertram!"

CHAPTER XVI.

I fear
Her subtle mind, her awe-inspiring gaze,
Whose beams unstonize me, nerve by nerve,
And lay me bleeding, make me blush to see
My hidden thoughts.—The Cenci, Act I., Sc. 2.

As soon as Marina was fairly started on her journey, she said to herself:

"Now shall I see this pretty baby face of which Bertram is so much enamored, according to his ever glowing statements. She is half a natural, but he does not love her a whit the less on that account. Unless a man is a born fool or a boy or of an archangel, he prefers a pretty nonentity for a wife, and women of soul have to put up with neglect. Bertram is a fine fellow, but he is passionately nervous and sensitive, but true as heaven and brave as a lion in the hour of peril, and—and I love him—how much he will never know, unless he himself should need the sacrifice of my life. Alas! 'tis the curse of my powers to fail utterly where I most desire to succeed. Love, with Bertram I am powerless, for when with him passion melts my strength into weakness. Yet it will be best so, and something whispers, 'Hope,' Marina was not born to fail.' What she most longs for is only withheld a while that it may be the more welcome and the more enjoyed.

Towards the evening of that day Mr. Grimgrip was surprised by a visit from Sergeant Indy, whose cool countenance he failed to recognise, but which brought recollections to his mind that made him shudder.

"Mr. Grimgrip, I believe."

"Yes madame."

"My name is Marina Nitouche."

Grimgrip started. She lifted her veil.

"I am the daughter of Madame Nitouche whom you knew so well. Do I not resemble her?"

"Too much—too much!"

"I am satisfied. She has done me great wrong in denying me."

"But whom do you call Madame Nitouche?" demanded Grimgrip, turning pale. "Mathilde Nitouche I knew too well, but she was married, and died many years ago."

"I know you believe what you say, but she you speak of is living. You shall see her."

Grimgrip sank back into his chair, like one whose last hope of escape had been cut off.

"Do you wish me to bring madame here?"

"God forbid! is she so near?"

"She is still in France."

"Did she send you to me?"

"I come with her assent."

"What for?"

"Her daughter."

"Her daughter? Why, you just told me you were she."

"So I believe I am, but I mean her daughter Muta."

"Muta, her daughter?"

"Certainly. Would she were not so!"

Grimgrip laughed, and the devil himself could not have made worse merriment.

"I see it all," said he. "You are a spy in the employ of Elfstone and Hapswell."

Marina rose from her seat, and, towering, walked towards the old man, her eyes darting light at him like flashes from a gun.

"What am I?"

"The daughter of Mathilde, and as fierce a fiend your mother, I remember, and so, and so you, to talk of Muta's being a daughter of hers or mine. She may be a relative of yours, but as I am a gentleman and the son of a father, it is not likely that I will give her up to you."

Grimgrip, in the excitement and bewilderment of the moment, had let the sacred self-possession, and Marina smiled triumphantly as she observed it.

"I assure you I am not particularly anxious that you should restore her, for she is my successful rival with more than one, and I am right glad to find that you have got her safe. I have discharged my duty in demanding her, and for your own good remember that you had better take a hint and consider your reply. I will stop with you till tomorrow and take back your answer."

"The daughter of such a demon sleeps not under the same roof with me."

"Just as you please, Mr. Grimgrip. I have only one particular favor to ask—see more country in your address to me, for it is not worth your while to make me your enemy, as yet. I assure you, I have no personal spite. In that character allow me to inquire what madness impels you to conceal Muta? Whose daughter is she but Elfstone's? And what claim have you upon his flesh and blood?"

"An undeniable one upon his heart's blood. You are the right one to put this interrogation to me? Who is your father?"

"You, legally."

"Aye, but not truly. You are the daughter of the man who dishonored me, of the woman who attempted my murder; you are the fruit of my disgrace, and the sight of you whets my revenge to a sharpness that would cut my enemies off from all hope."

"I am sorry I have put you in so unenviable a frame of mind, Mr. Grimgrip, but hope you will pardon me for observing that much as you may be deserving of revenge, on account of the wrongs you have sustained, your method of revenge is truly despicable. Upon whom do you wreak your malice? Upon me, a perfect outcast, uncared even by her father and mother, and left to the mercy of a merciless world. Upon this innocent and ill-starred child Muta, who never harmed as much as a fly. Out upon you for a cruel dastard! I am glad you have told me your son—I should scorn such a father. Why don't you face your actual injurers and avenge yourself upon them?"

"I do not face Elfstone, who can be came hither backed by the police? He will not care to repeat to you what I said to him. As for Muta, she is my ward. Her mother gave me her guardian, and appreticed her to me till she becomes eighteen years of age. I paid Mrs. Elfstone handsomely for her discharge of her service, and am not going to be cheated out of them. The mother was perfectly sane at the time the agreement was made, and the child is dead as a March hare, and of course no fitting party to any compact. I have the documents in my possession and will show them to you."

"Save yourself the trouble, sir. This matter must be legally tested, and your rights to the minor and your unjustifiable detention of a ward admit your possession of the unhappy cause of dispute."

"I will."

"I am not in the habit of perjuring myself, and will therefore tell you what you first told me. But this is all beside the question. I am speaking of the sheer madness of your conduct in hiding Elfstone's daughter and Hapswell's wife in some dungeon or other. Do you not perceive the barbarous monstrosity of the deed? What will my mother say to your illicit concealment and detention of a young married woman? What would you say of anybody else who should shut up an innocent girl to be revenged on her father's love? You have as much right in this matter as you have to steal the first young bride you meet—no more. You are playing the part of Bluebeard in the wife's enemy's only daughter, the heiress of Ellingford, young enough to be your grandchild, to marry you; but Elfstone will never give you her wife, and your wife, my mother, is alive, in health, and not at all likely to quit it for the sake of your views. You must not, therefore, wonder at people for attributing to you the most diabolical intentions towards your guilty passions, rendered half idiotic by your neglect, and too innocent to understand what you are about. Really, Mr. Grimgrip, I think you should look upon matters in a mad, as you say Mordaunt Elfstone was, for even madness is preferable to baseness so vile and detestable. Do you not see that matters in a different light from what you did, Mr. Grimgrip?"

"I cannot believe my wife is living."

"I see that my statement must make no doubt she is so now, for I received a letter from her but yesterday."

"Show me that letter."

"I don't know whether I can or not. I may have burned it and it may be still in my reticule. Yes, here it is, sir."

Grimgrip took the letter, examined the address, postmark, seal and envelope; took out the contents, scrutinized the handwriting, and afterwards gave it back.

"It is here, indeed; no other woman could write a communication betraying in every sentence so much utter heartlessness."

"If you are convinced, Mr. Grimgrip, you will save a world of trouble by giving me the key to Muta's room."

Marina pointed to what appeared to be a dead wall, but at which Muta's pet spaniel had been sniffing and scratching during the interview between Grimgrip and Marina.

"Keen as your mother," observed he, contemptuously, but with considerable admiration, "keen as she, and still more beautiful. Take your sister, for she is half that at least. My game is up."

He rose from his seat, stiffly, as if lame, and, pressed hard upon a spring which caused the concealed door to open, revealing another hidden and locked, which, when opened inward, discovered a narrow stairway leading down into a sort of cellar, where Muta, guarded by the spaniel, was by the spaniel, descended. He led the way through a low narrow passage, and emerged into a broad and higher level of the cavern, partly lighted through crevices in the rock, and by a fire smouldering in the centre of the apartment. The den had formerly been used by smugglers as a place of concealment, but its mouth towards the sea had been long closed up, and its connexion with the house never known save to a few, forgotten, or rather the secret had died with them that knew it. Upon a rude couch near the fire by a female flask asleep. The little spaniel bounded towards the sleeper, leaped upon the bed, and commenced to lick her hand. Muta, for it was she, opened her large blue eyes, and her gaze encountered that of Marina, who was bending over her. Muta was fascinated by the black, dazzling orbs that seemed to be searching her soul, and she felt alarmed.

"Don't be afraid, Muta," said a sweetly reassuring voice, "I am Marina; I have come to take you back to Bertram and your father."

The tone and smile of the speaker carried ecstasy to the captive's heart, and Muta threw herself into the arms of her fair rescuer and wept and sobbed for joy. Poor Flora, who was doing her best to gain her mistress's attention, was hurried to attract it and vent her feelings. Her manoeuvres were at last crowned with success, and she came in for a full share of blandishment. It was a rapturous moment to both, but when Muta perceived Grimgrip, she trembled with fear, and her gladness vanished like a dream.

"Why, little one, do you fear him?" said Marina, contemptuously. "Why, tell me that he has abused you, and I'll stab him where he stands!"

"He hasn't been unkind to me, except in keeping me so much in this dark place, and in threatening never to let me out till I consented to marry him. But I love Bertram so dearly that I would rather die than have another husband."

The pang of heart Marina felt, and Muta's simplicity, brought a strange smile to her lips.

"You are a great baby, Muta. What do you think your teeth, nails, limbs and lungs were given you for, if you could not use them in preventing a feeble old man from tearing you away from the hearts and home you loved? I should like to see the man I did not love running away from and playing the tyrant over me!"

I would rather elope with a royal Bengal tigress," replied Grimgrip, bitterly. "You have all your mother's fatal fierceness, and the sooner you fall victims to your own pride the better. Come, the sooner I shall be rid of an intolerable nuisance."

Grimgrip was not long encumbered with such presence, but when Muta and Marina were gone, instead of experiencing relief, the sense of his loneliness, solitude and disgrace fell upon him with crushing weight, as if it had only been suspended till they were out of sight. The wretch who was to now felt himself to be, and it is a wonder he did not commit suicide under the oppression of his despair.

THE CROSSING OF THE JAMES.

THE crossing of a large river like the James, in the face of a large hostile army on each bank, is one of the most extraordinary movements of the war, and probably without a parallel in history. The engineers Gen. Grant justly alludes to it.

Those who witnessed the scene represent it as one of unusual grandeur, and our Artist, catching the spirit of the occasion, has transferred it to paper.

A correspondent thus graphically describes the crossing:

"I was suddenly came in view of a pontoon bridge, some half a mile in length, and black with moving men. A gray mist hung over the river, rendering boats and craft of all descriptions and colors crowd the river, both above and below the bridge. The noise of hauling altogether is very gay and animated.

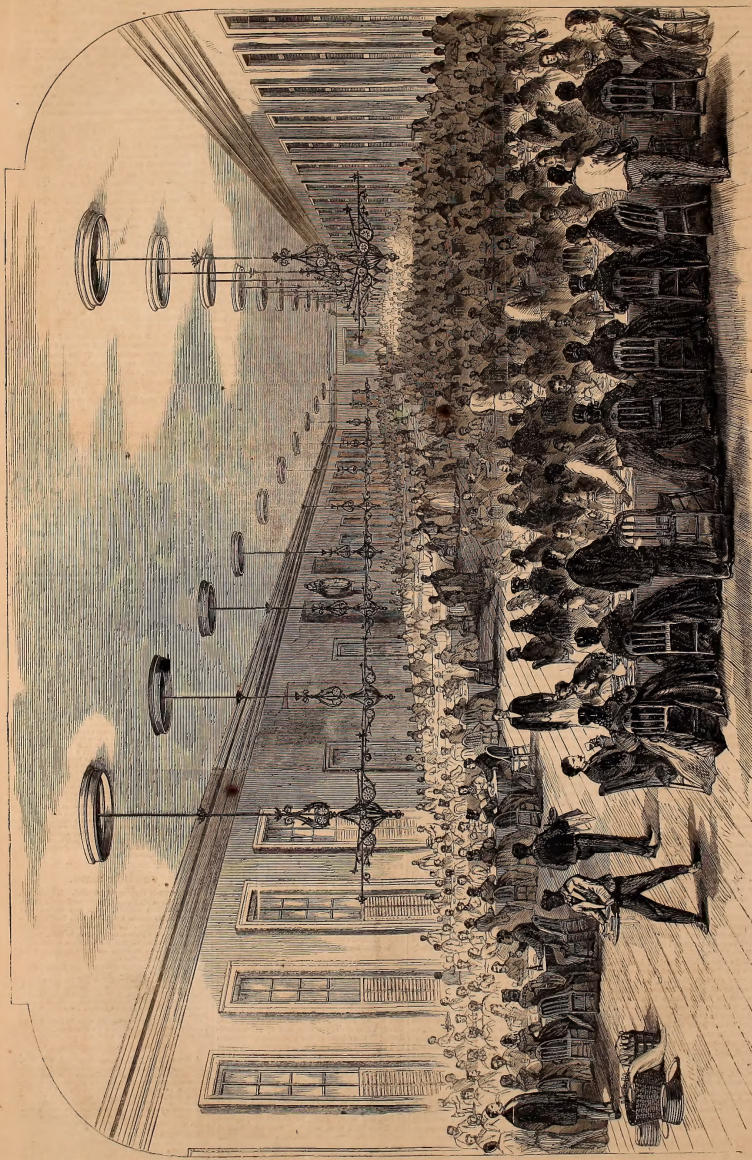
"As we approached close to the pontoon bridge and our steamer halted, we saw distinctly the huge bodies of infantry, cavalry, wagons, artillery and beasts moving across the pontoon. They extend across the entire length of the bridge, and can be seen winding down from far away up the east bank of the James, enveloped in a dense cloud of dust, while on the opposite bank is a part of the great body which has already effected its crossing.

"To one to whom the grand army is a new sight and all the circumstances of war are fresh and novel, the scene is picturesque and splendid in the highest degree, and the imagination is carried forward over long spaces in far bygone history, over other such movements in the countries of the Old World, and even of late in the West. The mind grasps the real prime significance of the and at those who thought and planned it. Others see, but tries in vain, to reach forward and gain a glimpse of their object.

"The army has been steadily marching across here for 36 hours, and the crossing will not be over on Wednesday morning, and it is now mainly across. This has much very beautiful, martial and picturesque and supremely cheerful. They do not form a line absolutely parallel with the river, but rather in great irregular parallelograms. A brigade of infantry, with perhaps a thousand cavalry at the flanks and rear, moves on; then just as much artillery as can be massed, or seems massed, for the marching in units or couples across the bridge. Now comes a man leading a horse; now a caisson; now a dozen teamsters; now a battalion of negro soldiers; now a solitary horseman (probably a sick or wounded man). But a heavy body of troops of all arms is passing and repassing, filling up the interstices, and now they go marching over and along—not tramping in column, as it would be, for such a mode of order of march on crossing a pontoon. Besides the columns of infantry moving and massed on the banks, there are immense numbers of horses (mostly cavalry horses, I think) picketed, being led, fed, and marched by themselves, long trains of wagons, numberless pieces of artillery and caissons."

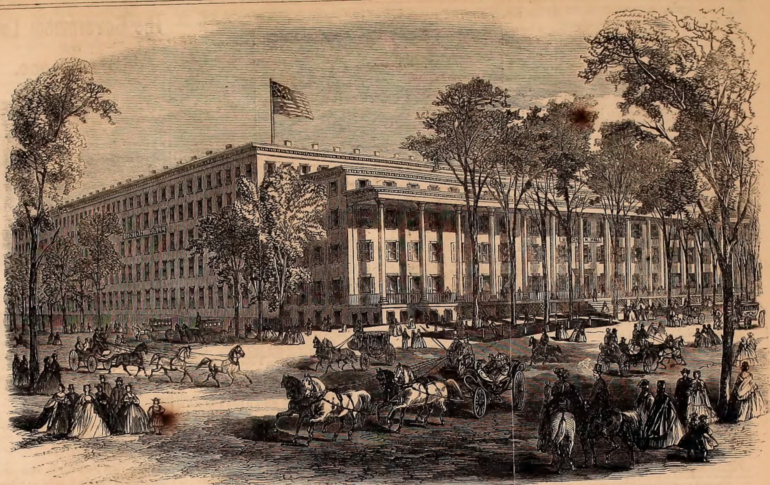
FOREIGN NEWS.

THE news is very unimportant. There had been a debate in the House of Lords on Federal Enlistments of Englishmen, and Lord Russell stated very strong speeches against the Union from Lords Chamberlayne and Brougham. The latter denied the charge of sentiments in the Federal Government to Lord Lyon's complaints, but added that the Southern Confederacy had been treated in the same manner than the authorities at Washington.



The armistice between Germany and Denmark had been extended a fortnight.

The Polish insurrection question had become agitated again, and Louis Napoleon had suggested to England the propriety of intervening in the war. Russia and the rebels—but the policy of England is decided, so say the London papers, and the neutrality will be preserved.



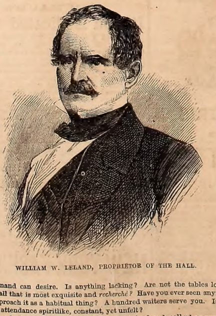
The Court of Europe is tranquil, with the exception of Turkey, where the question of the Danubian principalities threatens to become serious.

A KISS A VALID CONSIDERATION.—A Western Court has recently decided that a kiss is a valid consideration. Do you know that an old bachelor—these old bachelors, by the way, are useless institutions, anyhow you look at them—offered a young lady a pony for a kiss. The young damsel accepted the offer and gave the kiss; but the mean old curmudgeon, after receipt of the coveted salute, refused to stand by his part of the contract. A suit was therefore entered, and the jury decided that the pony, or its value, should be given to the girl.

Who finds all the umbrellas that everybody loses? Every man we meet loses the umbrella he buys, and we never see one picked up. Somebody finds them. Can any one answer the question before the next rain?

OUR SUMMER RESORTS—UNION HALL, SARATOGA SPRINGS.—THE DINING-ROOM.

OUR SUMMER RESORTS—UNION HALL, SARATOGA, WILLIAM LELAND, ESQ., PROPRIETOR.



UNION HALL, SARATOGA.

Wm. W. Leland, Proprietor.

DESCRIBE Saratoga! Who will attempt it? The theme has been essayed by so many; yet American life is so volatile, so evanescent, so full of strange changes and stranger contrasts, that the well studied description of one season by the next excites the merriment of all, and when five years old has all the exquisite aroma of antiquity. All the world knows Saratoga, and whoever has enjoyed Saratoga, with its comforts and discomforts, its pleasures and its gaiety, knows Union Hall. But how long ago did you know Union Hall? Somewhere down in the year 1802, when Napoleon I. was Emperor—not Napoleon III.? Oh! Then Union Hall was a small affair, 200 feet by 36. We mean Union Hall as it is, with its splendid wing, its lodgings, its cottages, its magnificent lawn. Do you know this, and do you know that it is kept by W. W. Leland, Esq., one of that wonderful family who have achieved the greatest of modern experiments—men who can keep an hotel? Well, readers, you know it now. Need we say more—need we tell you that it is the largest hotel in Saratoga Springs—that the front is so long that when you have twice walked it to and fro you have nearly accomplished a mile? Look at the exterior, what can be more attractive? Do not suppose that you have here the old-fashioned four by nine rooms. These are built for comfort. Enter the dining-room. A thousand—yes, and half a thousand more are seated here; and, incredible as it may appear, seated comfortably, the tables being placed across the room at intervals of five feet, and a passageway down through the middle no less than ten feet.

At the tables themselves three feet is given to each one, so that you breakfast, dine and sup at ease, without fear of upsetting your neighbor's glass of wine, or, what may be worse, sending your own, in liquid wrath, along the costly skirt of the lady beside you. Not for the wine's sake do we say this, for choice as good wine is in these glorious days of taxes, Mr. Leland's wine-room represents a value of $50,000.

Then think of the substantial food provided here, and of the delicacies of every shape and kind that a finished caterer can supply, or the keenest gourmand can desire. Is anything lacking? Are not the tables loaded with all that is most exquisite and recherché? Have you ever seen anything to approach it as a habitual thing? A hundred waiters serve you. Is not their attendance spiritlike, constant, yet unfelt?

WILLIAM W. LELAND, PROPRIETOR OF THE HALL.

Leland, the untiring, the sleepless, ever to be found, call when you will from six in the morning till twelve at night, is the mainspring of the great machine, and it moves not like a machine after all, but rather like the telegraph or something impelled by some new and imperceptible power.

You run from the cities for air, Union Hall welcomes you. Eight men ever stand at the door to receive your baggage and conduct you to your rooms or your cottage.

There you find comfort, and without its many acred lawn, with its secular trees, gives a shade to make an editor stop writing for the very thought of it, and pack off for the spot, having already in imagination dined there.

The scene from the piazza of Union Hall is most attractive. Being opposite Congress Springs you see all Saratoga there. From the hotel itself come forth the most distinguished of men, the most world-famed of women; from its porch dash off equipages that have no match. For a splendid turn out, Union Hall has great attractions. Your carriage and pair are well taken care of; your coachman has a room in the magnificent carriage-house. All is in good order. Your carriage rolls to the door in good trim when you need it to ride to the lake, the battle-ground, or where you will.

The Lelands are well-known, having conducted Clinton Hotel, and subsequently the Metropolitan, with a skill which the discerning public repaid by the boon of success.

William, who now alone assumes the management of Union Hall, and whose portrait we give, was at one time an immense stock raiser in Texas, where his realm was counted not by acres but by miles. He is here North; a Union man, certain the man for Union Hall, as all who are happy enough to enter his empire during the heated term will attest.

Old habitués, who knew and appreciated Messrs. Putnam and Payn, need fear no change that will disturb their conservative motions. Dr. Payn will remain there to welcome them warmly, and point out approvingly the improvements in 1864.

In the office, Mr. W. D. Harmon, who has had eight years experience in the house, will officiate as room clerk; Mr. James R. Marvin as bill clerk, assisted by W. G. A. Drake, as cashier, who speaks French and Spanish fluently. The bar will be under the charge of Montgomery Avery, assisted by N. S. May and others. B. P. Waling, the capable and wide-awake steward, will be assisted by J. R. Chapman. Miss Gilgore, the popular housekeeper for thirteen seasons, will continue to fill that position. Hans Shedd, the capable head waiter, who has been connected with the house for twenty years, is retained, as also his old assistant, Robert Jackson. The kitchen department will be under the skilful supervision of Monsieur Victor Comée, chief cook of the Metropolitan Hotel, New York, with Anthony Baden as confectioner.

OUR SUMMER RESORTS—LAWN OF THE UNION HALL, SARATOGA SPRINGS.

THE HARP.

AMONG the Hebrews the harp served as an accompaniment to songs of praise and gladness, and was never used in times of affliction. They hanged their harps upon the willows by the waters of Babylon, and refused to sing the songs of Zion in a strange land. In like manner Job's harp is changed into mourning whilst the hand of grief pressed heavily upon him. Its soothing effect was exemplified in calming down the furious spirit of Saul; and the gift of prophecy appears also to have been excited by its use. It is reasonable to suppose that the Biblical harps were of various kinds, as they were played while sitting, walking and dancing. The skill of the Jews on the harp is described as wonderful, and reached its highest point of perfection in the time of David. The number of its strings have varied from four to ten. In the Talmud is preserved a curious tradition, to the effect that, over the bed of David, facing his north, a harp was suspended; and that when, at midnight, the north wind touched the chords, they vibrated and discovered exquisite music.

By several writers it is considered doubtful whether the harp was known to the Greeks and Romans in any shape analogous to its present form; but we are told by others that the Athenians considered the instrument as an exotic refinement; and the Rhodian women, who played on harps at the marriage feast of Caxiope, were introduced to add splendor to the entertainment. Under the Roman empire, the harp appears to have been in use, and was played by both sexes.

Many are of the opinion that Europeans are not indebted to the Egyptians for the harp, notwithstanding their extraordinary identity. They believe that it was introduced into Ireland by pirates or Scots from the Baltic, in the year 1000, among some northern tribes as early as the 8th century. In the days of chivalry the harp was considered the most noble and majestic of instruments for this reason the romances placed it in the hands of their greatest heroes, as the ancient Greeks did the lyre. It then had 32 strings, to each of which the poet gave an allegorical name, calling one Consolatory, again Truth; a third, Happiness; a fourth, Beauty, etc., applying the living qualities to the inert and unconscious harp.

The Celtic bards held the harp in the highest honor. A Welshman named Jones, famous for his courtship, possession of a triple harp as early as the 5th century. The triple harp seems to imply that there have been at Wales three different kinds, the single harp, with only one row of notes, double, with two, and the triple, with three strings. In Ireland the harp was known from ancient to the Christian era, and from the great prevalence in that country it was adopted as the national emblem. One of a very early date, A.D. 1021, is still preserved in the University of Dublin, and really is the oldest harp now in existence.

The father of Guilbo, the great mathematician, tells us that the Italians, who were in possession of the harp before the time of Dante (born in 1265), had "had this most ancient instrument from Ireland, whose learned inhabitants practised on it for many, many ages." The strings were of brass, with a few of steel to sustain the higher notes—in all, 30.

In an important particular the Welsh differed from the Irish instrument, the former being strung with catgut. Here it is worthy to remark that the Eoff Christians made much use of the harp in their religious assemblies as an accompaniment in the singing of their Psalms; and that, until a comparatively recent period, Romish churches throughout the rural districts of Ireland considered it almost indispensable in the celebration of the sacrifice of the mass.

The history of the harp would be incomplete without more particular notice of the bards or minstrels who have constituted one of the most important parts of the ancient Britain, and in Ireland. They submitted by the art of poetry and music; and sang to the harp verses composed by themselves or others. Their skill was looked on as almost divine; their persons were held sacred; their attendance was solicited even by kings, and they were everywhere beloved with munificent rewards. In the poems of Ossian, we read of 100 bards, belonging to princes, playing on harps, and singing for his entertainment. At the period they are represented to be men of genius and of virtue, and enjoyed the honors which they enjoyed. They were oral historians of all past transactions, public and private, whose duty it was to preserve authentic records, and various kinds of knowledge, in the national memory, by means of tradition. Even Alfred the Great disdained not to assume the disguise of a bargrin, while he successfully explored the camp of the hostile Danes.

From the Norman conquest, down through a long ages of English history, these minstrels maintained their popularity and privileges, particularly during the reign of that brilliant and poetic crusader, Richard I., and the instances of favors bestowed upon them by subsequent monarchs are very abundant; but this was in an age when people "loved better to be pleased than instructed." However, during the reign of Henry VIII., the ministrels were degraded from the ranks of gentlemen; and so rare had they become in the time of Elizabeth, that Stowe, in his curious chronicles of England, A.D. 1575, that classical chronicler, Stowe, felt called upon to describe with painful minuteness, "the extraordinary man-of-the-harp." A single law was enacted, in the reign of the Virgin Queen, including them, with all the penalties, amongst beggars and rogues.

OLD ADVERTISEMENTS.

SOMEBODY who has been overhauling the back files of the English press in the British Museum and elsewhere, claims to have discovered that the earliest advertisement published in the English language was the offer of a reward for the recovery of a "stolen nag," inserted in the Moderate, a London newspaper, March 16th, about two months after the removal of the Charles I. From that primary paragraph what a multitudinous progeny has sprung. The multiplications of the human species has scarcely been so rapid as that of advertisements during the last two hundred years. From half a dozen to twenty lines sufficed in Cromwell's and Charles the Second's time to tell the world a story; but now columns, pages, sheets, are necessary to make an impression, or to speak more correctly a sensation. Quack medicine proclamations monopolize vast spaces in all papers. And yet the branch of the literature of imposture dates no farther back than the latter half of the 17th century. To one Mrs. Elizabeth Fulser belongs the questionable honor of originating it. Her advertisement in a treble column Mercurius Politicus lies some exhilarating cordial—in the London Gazette of 1658, and the Court Beauties of the "Merry" monarch reign patronised the publisc. The price was five shillings per bottle.

Could we but see the art of newspaper quackery then in its infancy, one finds some pretty smart examples of it in the journals of James the Second's reign. An example, a gazette of that era tells us that "about forty miles from London is a schoolmaster, who has had much success with boys, as there are almost forty ministers and gentlemen that were his scholars." Not very good grammar this, but in other respects very much like the announcements one sometimes sees that are learned in Law and Divinity will vouch for the excellence of some school, they or their sons have been educated at that institution." By the way, the schoolmaster who had such success with boys in the twentieth century had a helpmate who deserves mention. "His wife," says the paper-fabricator, "is excellent at making, plain work, raising paste, sauces, and cookery to the degree of exactness." Alas! why are there not schoolmistresses to teach young ladies such useful arts to the year 1864?

A WASHINGTON paper, in alluding to the recent search for a girl and her subsequent discovery, says: "She had a mark on her cheek, which neighbored a dimple, and over-face lips would be wreathed in smiles, and which showed itself perceptibly whenever the manifested contingent animation." That's word painting with a vengeance.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A LADY, paying a visit to her daughter, who was a young widow, asked her why she wore the widow's cap so long.

"Dear mama, don't you see!" replied the daughter, "it saves me the expense of advertising for a husband, as every one about me, by it, knows I'm private courtesel."

THE MODERN WIDOW'S LAMENT.

FLOW on, my tears—my tears flow on;
My husband low is lain;
Oh let me weep to ease my heart,
That I may—mate again.

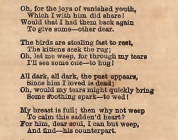
Affection's cord, though now in twain
For life who prizes me dear,
If I may weep my sorrows off,
I'll very soon get—cheer.

Oh, bid me not control my grief,
Nor keep my feelings in;
Nor tell me, now, to calm my woe,
For I have got—his "tin."

That face of his I cherished dear
In mine no more, you know,
So let me drain my bitter cup,
And get—another beau.

The night winds moan around his grave,
And sing a requiem sad;
And, while he's sleeping peaceful sleep,
I'll catch another—lad.

Then let my tears flow on in peace,
And as they gently fall
I'll bear—to some new manly breast—
The—boodle of his stall.



Oh, for the joys of vanished youth,
Which I with him did share!
Would that I had the power again
To give some—other dear.

The birds are stealing fast to rest,
The silence sets in;
Oh, let me weep, for through my tears
I'll see a—new husband.

All dark, all dark, the past appears,
Nine long years of—misery;
Oh, would my tears might quickly bring
Some floating spark—to wed.

My breast is full: then why not weep
To calm this sadden'd heart?
For him, dear soul, I can but weep,
And find—his counterpart.

Then tell me not to check my grief;
Alas! I cannot—will
Until within his lonely couch
I place my—other mate!

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

IS HEALTH WORTH HAVING? If it is, protect it. It is a jewel so costly lost as virtue, and in some cases it is difficult to recover. Impure waters, in our climate, and especially at this season, requires to be occasionally reinforced; but weighty reliance is upon the Stomach for the full purpose. The medicinal tinctures, all of which are powerful, should be taken with caution, for although everybody finds out who takes much or little of a good thing, the fact is not proved upon the healthy stomach—patients in search of health should use powerful corrective. HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS, a compound of the purest stimulants ever manufactured with the most effective tonics, alterants, and diuretics, and ingredients that chemistry has yet extracted from the botanical kingdom. Convalescents from fevers, and feeble from recent illness, will find the Bitters an incomparable restorative, not disagreeable to the taste and eminently invigorating. No other stimulant produces the same effect as this Stomachic. It does not excite or flutter the nerves or occasion any undue arterial action; but it cures soothes and strengthens the nervous system and the animal spirits.

Literary Agency, Established in 1862. The subscriber has, for more than 20 years past, been in the habit of reading and preparing manuscripts for the Press. At first the largest one of kindness, and performed gratuitously. But it became so burdensome, and absorbed so much time, that a small charge in the nature of a preliminary fee became necessary. This fee, not exceeding $10, and generally less, compensated both for a careful and critical perusal of a work in manuscript, and the offering of it, if approved, to publishers.

The subscriber continues to receive and read manuscripts in the same manner, giving his candid opinion concerning them, and urging the best printing and publication, when desired to do so. He makes his charges as low as possible, and has shall charge it in all and such cases will notify.

In all cases letters of advice should be forwarded by mail, and manuscripts are sent, prepaid, either through the Post Office or by express, legibly addressed, PARK BENJAMIN, 16 West 4th st., N. Y.

The Resignation of Mr. Secretary Chase—Our Financial Difficulties.

THE startling—because wholly unexpected—announcement from Washington on Thursday last, of the resignation of Mr. Chase, as Secretary of the Treasury, and the appointment of Ex-Governor David Tod, of Ohio, to fill his place, instantly created a more painful and profound sensation in New York than any tidings for a long time of any disaster to the national cause. Men of all parties, and all classes, began instinctively to inquire of each other—why has Mr. Chase resigned at this critical period in our financial affairs? Has he abandoned the heavy task imposed upon him of sustaining the national credit and currency in despair? Or have political difficulties among the members of the Cabinet, which we had supposed were adjusted, broken out afresh, and precipitated this resignation? If so, may we not anticipate a general breaking up and reconstruction of the Cabinet, with every probability of more serious embarrassments than ever in the working of the Government machinery? And who is this Mr. Tod, of Ohio? Is he recognised anywhere as a statesman of the requisite abilities to assume at this crisis the management of the National Treasury? What does all this mean? With the present fearful depreciation and still downward tendency of our paper currency, are we not hastening to a sweeping financial collapse and revulsion?

These were among the many difficult questions suggested by this startling news of the official retirement of Mr. Chase, and the appointment of Mr. Tod, of Ohio, in his place. Nor were there any encouraging answers at hand from any quarter. There was nothing consoling in the statement that Mr. Chase had resigned, because Congress and the President had failed to support him; nor in the allegation that Mr. Chase did not expect his resignation to be accepted. Doubts, distrust and despondency prevailed, and gold, that invisible standard by which the grocer, the baker and the butcher make their advances, from day to day, went up with a new momentum that was positively appalling. Mr. Tod's declination of the Treasury, and the appointment of Hon. William Pitt Fessenden, Senator of Maine, to

Summary of the Week.

VIRGINIA.

The campaign has now, from the very necessity of the case, been reduced to a series of skirmishes, partial assaults on each other's works, and fruitless long manœuvres.

Grant presses steadily in on Petersburg, gaining slowly but surely, and the enemy endeavors, by sallies, to discomfit him.

On the 25th June they attacked the 9th and 5th corps, but retired, leaving their dead before our works.

On the 28th Gen. Ledlie, 9th corps, threw up a fieldwork for siege guns, on which the enemy opened a tremendous fire. They subsequently attacked him, but were repulsed.

On the 30th Gen. Smith attempted to take the Petersburg Road, near Petersburg, but failed, losing seriously.

Gen. Wilson has succeeded in destroying 60 miles of the Danville railroad completely, but on his return was met at Rosan's station by the enemy in force. He fought them all the night of the 27th, and was at last relieved by the 6th and 2d corps, and cut his way through. His command was, however, separated, and he is about 700 men.

Mosby's guerillas have begun their raids, dashing into and plundering Duffield's station, near Harper's ferry, and murdering prisoners.

Gen. Hunter, having accomplished the objects of his movement, and running out of ammunition, fell back to Meadow Bluff, Greenbrier river, and so against the heavy force sent down from Richmond. His total loss in killed, wounded and missing did not exceed 600, and he brought with him 400 prisoners, 7 cannon and 600 horses, and destroyed an immense quantity of stores. He lost some cannon in a defile by a sudden flank attack of guerillas.

ARKANSAS.

Gen. Carr, on June 27, defeated the rebels under Shelby, between Sheridan and St. Charles, taking 200 prisoners and 4 guns, with his loss. Gen. Marmaduke came up to aid Shelby, but they both retired.

LOUISIANA.

A large deposit of rebel archives has been found buried in the earth at Baton Rouge by John O'Connor, Jr., acting Provost Marshal Gen.

Gen. Banks has sent all his wounded North.

Col. Slemmer attacked our troops on the Red River, but was repulsed, and found his own camp captured and destroyed by the 7th Missouri cavalry.

On the 19th the 8th Missouri was attacked at Brownsville by Shelby, but they repulsed their assailants.

A cavalry force from Fort Smith, on the 26th, met a rebel cavalry force of 800, and killed or took the whole.

GEORGIA.

On the 24th Sherman made a diversion on each of the enemy's flanks, at 8 A.M., Thomas and McPherson attacked Kenesaw mountain, but, after sustaining heavy loss, including Gen. Harker, Col. Dan. McCook and others, gave up the attempt. In an attack on Schofield and Hooker the enemy were repulsed with a loss of 300 killed.

On June 24 Gen. Pillow, with 3,000 men, demanded the surrender of Lafayette. Col. Watkins, who had but 400, refused, and held out till Col. Croxton, 4th Kentucky, came up, when Pillow retreated, leaving 100 dead and wounded on the field.

Johnston has four corps, Hardee's, composed of Cheatham's, Cleburn's, Walker's and Bates's divisions; Hood's corps, comprising Stewart's, Stevenson's and Hindman's; Polk's corps, composed of Loring's and Tyrch's divisions; besides Wheeler's cavalry corps and the independent commands of Roddy and Lee.

On the 27th the 4th, 14th and Logan's corps attacked Kenesaw in three columns, but were repulsed. Johnston was, however, so straitened that on the 3d he evacuated Kenesaw and Marietta. Thomas at once marched on the Chattahoochee and McPherson on the mouth of Nicajack creek.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Gen. Foster has shelled Secessionville from Morris island, and on June 16th the rebels from Janes' and Sullivan's islands opened on Cumming's point.

NAVAL.

On the 19th June the U. S war ship Kearsage engaged the Alabama, off Cherbourg, and, after a desperate action of over an hour, so disabled her that she sunk. The English steam yacht Deerhound, which witnessed the engagement, took up Capt. Semmes and about 40 of his men. The Kearsage captured 68 of the Alabama's men.

CONGRESS.

In the Senate, on the 27th June, there was much routine business of little public interest, the principal subject being the Government's bureau bill.

In the House, the Foreign Affairs Committee reported a resolution, the consideration of which was postponed, asserting the right of Congress to an authoritative voice in declaring the foreign policy of the government. This is designed as a censure for the refusal and Mr. Seward for the explanatory diplomatic note of the letter to the French Minister of State in reference to the House resolution censuring the intervention of Mexico. A resolution in favor of giving to disabled soldiers such appointments as are in the gift of officers of the House was adopted. A resolution authorizing the extension of the Navy Department building was reported. The Senate's amendments to the draft bill were acted upon, and a large number of them adopted, the remainder being left for the adjustment of a conference committee. The bill to carry into effect the treaty with Columbia was passed. The Senate's amendments to the bill exempting from duties goods imported for the late Chicago Sanitary Fair were concurred in. The bill amendatory of the Internal Revenue law, on the subject of a repealed debate, the main point of discussion being, as on previous days, a proposition to repeal the $200 draft commutation, which, on being put to a vote, was again defeated, but this time by only two majority, showing that the opposition to the repeal is gaining strength. Different amendments and substitutes were offered; but a vote on no one entire bill was reached.

In the Senate, on the 28th, the House Enrolment bill repealing the commutation clause was received and referred to the Military Committee. The bill establishing a bureau for Freedmen's affairs was then discussed, Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, making a very severe attack on the Administration. Finally the bill was passed.

In the House the Senate's amendment to the Loan bill, excepting the $75,000,000 recently advertised from the operations of the bill, was agreed to. The Senate substitute for the Enrolment bill was passed by a vote of 82 against 43. It repeals the provision for exemption by hearing arms is exempted from military service by the payment of $300 for nine months' service, and shall also be paid a bounty of $100; for two years, $300; and for three years, $300, and stated intervals.

On the 29th the Tariff bill passed both Houses. Mr. Morrill said that he reckoned it would yield $400,000,000 a year.

In the Senate, Mr. Powell's resolution that the President be requested to recall Gen. Burbridge's order suppressing the Cincinnati Enquirer was rejected by 26 to 13. The House Enrolment bill was taken up, and several important amendments adopted. The period for receiving substitutes from the 1st to the 10th was shall recruit only in their own limits, and a tax of five per cent. on all incomes over $600 a year is levied to pay soldiers' bounties. The bill was then finally passed.

In the House, the resolution declaring that Gen. Schenck was entitled to a seat and Gen. Blair was not was adopted. The subject of the admission of the representative from Arkansas was laid on the table by a vote of 80 to 47.

In the Senate, on the 30th, the bill to encourage the telegraphic communication between the Atlantic and Western Continents was received from the House. Mr. Grimes called up the bill for the more speedy enlistment of guerillas.

In the House, Mr. Garfield made a report from the Select Committee to investigate the affairs of the Treasury Department. The charges against Chase were disproved, and the frauds were much less than expected. Trade and the business of colored vagrancies, the chief subject of private conversation being the resignation of Secretary Chase, which a variety of reasons was given. Gov. Tod, of Ohio, whose name was sent in to the Senate for appointment to the Supreme Court, declined the appointment.

In the Senate, on the 1st of July, the Hon. William Pitt Fessenden, Senator from Maine, was appointed by the President Secretary of the Treasury, vice Secretary of the Treasury, in place of Salmon P. Chase resigned.

Both Houses were occupied in considering and passing the act prohibiting speculation in gold and foreign exchange.

In the Senate the House bill reimbursing Pennsylvania for expenses in repelling the invasion of 1863, fixing out the militia during the rebel invasion of last year, and the bill for the appointment of a Commissioner of Internal Revenue in those districts. Finally the subject was resumed, and the amendments to the Enrolment Act, the bill, embracing a prohibition of the coastwise slave trade and the abolition of colored witnesses in the Federal courts was passed; also the bill regarding the Pacific railroads.

TOWN COSSIP.

LAST week we grumbled and chattered about the heat, because the thermometer touched 100, and this week we are inclined to do the reverse, because the same marvellous little instrument has marked 40 degrees less.

Within 24 hours, between Sunday and Monday, the change was 40 degrees, an inconsiderable matter when we simply ascended, but a very serious matter when sertously considered. London physicians, and men of science, tell us that when the thermometer falls 10 degrees in that city it kills 300 people! We think there is little difference in the healthiness as to the effects, but in this city we have not weighed the matter very nicely. We realize when the thermometer goes up to 100 that some 40 or 50 deaths are announced as proceeding from sunstroke, to say nothing of all those unannounced. We do not calculate the deaths resulting from both.

But the thermometer fell, as it did the past week, 40 degrees in 24 hours, and we will venture to say, in spite of our acclimatization and familiarity with sudden changes, as many deaths will occur from it in the city as in London. Understand us; we do not mean to say that the heat was a benefit to anybody, but only the increase, but that the blow will have been struck, and those who are in low health, or who have been suffering from the heat, will succumb more readily than to the other world.

With the advent of really hot weather comes all the little excitements that naturally accompany it. Mosquitoes, for instance, those wretched little creatures on whom man has pronounced the direst curse that he can see fotto the wisdom of all things else that the Almighty has created, but on whom we bestow the sweetest nicknames. We think the city is partially exempt from their annoyance, but there are localities about us which just about this time we should be glad to inhabit, localities where the trees are green and waving, where the waters ripple and dance over the clean gravelly bottom, and where nature seems to have set a tantalizing repast before her hungry devotees, and all is spoiled by—mosquitoes.

The idea is too terrible to contemplate, and we must hurry on and go into something else.

What shall it be? The 4th of July! That is a theme already discussed, and, not so stereotyped, that we hesitate can be said new. The 4th of this time is not the 4th of 1776. We, very little more than a century of progress, we remember how the city was turned inside out, and New York and the entire country, and all the country flocked into New York. There were bonfires about the Park, at least 100 of them, and every conceivable thing that has been made to eat since the days of Adam was cooked, and spread on a ready to each booth. There was a military parade, such military as we have seen since, and never can—and we hope never see more—that marched up Broadway, and then marched down again. We have heard that the crowd was marvellously enjoyed themselves, especially the French and Irish element, and that upon the day and the night upon a revolution of some kind kept it up by firing in incessantly, and that the Police Force was very much occupied in preserving the peace.

We venture to say that upon this 4th we hope less will ask in New York city than ever before, because the people have grown more sober and virtuous, and because the spirit of patriotism has taken a more temperance shape has at last been applied in the shape of a tax upon liquor, and the people whose throats men crocked their elbows, or passed the rosy, have been compelled to pay handsomely for the privilege. The compensation claimed for a simple "whiskey straight," is 5 cts., but we would defy the bibulist in the future a punch must disburse the sum of 25 cents, which, even at the present high prices of liquor, will require a good deal of money to go at one opening and shutting of the throttle.

Which puts us in mind that just now a fearful excitement has been created in Washington, and all in reference to gold. Since the passage of the bill making a tax upon gold, and in the previous debate, the street has been terribly excited, and has had spasmodic attacks of fever, which have run through the whole system with weak financial heads. Gold is supposed to have reached 300 in the street, while several millions were quoted at that, and would have been glad to sell at such enormous rates. But the fact is that gold in such a market is nowhere. With the quotation of $2.60 staring us in the face, we will venture to say that no man could have sold the precious stuff for over $2.50. There is nothing in which the people are more apt to rush in a mass, like that of the quotation of gold, and yet the whole thing is very simple. By some it is argued that a rise of 50 per cent. in the value of gold when it has been quoted at $1.30 depreciates the currency 50%, it must do the same when gold is at $2.50, but that is an error. The depreciation is in the currency, and no one can back dollar to half 50/ cents more. To illustrate this we will take the following table of prices:

When gold is at	The greenback is worth
130	92 cts. 3 mills
140	89 "
150	86 "
160	83 "
170	80 "
180	77 "
190	74 "
200	71 "
210	68 "
220	65 "
230	62 "
240	59 "
250	56 "
260	53 "
270	50 "
280	47 "
290	44 "
300	41 "

And so on, ad infinitum.

Now, this table will lead into is to suppose that the speculation of prices arises from the depreciation of the currency. The fact is that the depreciation of the currency is the scarcity of labor and its consequent rise in value. A dollar a day is a good fee for more than one-half given by the laborer in a day's work at $1.50 day costs twice as much as the latter for day's work at $3 per day, in consequence of the scarcity of labor created by its absorption in the army.

To step into more serious subjects; it is announced that Dr. Hawks Squire, one of the Rectors of Trinity of the city, and endorsed by others, that the reign of high prices is at an end, and that the fall in gold will utterly repudiate the mountainous, hearty trimmed bills of fare that have been the order of the day, and that a small, roundish shape, sans curtain, sans flowers, sans cream, and sans everything except coffee, will take its place. We can conceive no reform in future dress that will be more acceptable to the fair sex than a reform in the fare upon the dinner table, and feels somewhat inclined to go for the reformer.

Without seeing the connection, only as the thing slips into our head, we will here mention that Dr. Hawks has within a few days obtained an upperclassman. It is the case of photographic letters. A young gentleman has already arranged to affix to letters on the spot where we receive them a small photograph, the size of a half dime, a stamp to the outside. Intend, therefore, of signing, for example, John Brown, he has a photograph of his ugly pug tongue over the wrong side of your visitate, and you have in propria persona John Brown. This is not a dreadful bad one.

And now, with a little touch of tragedy, as illustrating some phases of city life, we will afterwards endeavor to get on the subject of reform. It is a case of a boy, a rock and a hand. A few days since an early passer through Broadway, near the Park, saw a boy of 12 or 14 years of age, with a hand of the same, holding up his elbow. It was that of a woman, young and well-shaped, and had apparently been severed with the blow of a hatchet. There was little said about it, but the limb was wrapped in an old newspaper and conveyed first to straightening drug store and presently to the station-house, its history afterwards being, perhaps, an interment in any ground that could be got at, or a consignment to the waste tub of any dissecting room. Within two days after, Mr. R. D. Horton, a Sandy Hook pilot, while sailing through Bell gate, passed by a foot and part of the leg of a female, young and well-shaped, floating in the water, which he describes as having all the appearance of having HORSES AND MULES.—During the year ending June 30, 1863, there were purchased 153,371 horses and 98,256 mules, and there were captured 7,183 horses and 6,413 mules, which, added to those on hand at the commencement of the year, made the number 197,457 horses and 110,068 mules. There were condemned and died or lost by captive during the year 97,676 horses and 11,770 mules. More than one horse out of every four was thus hors du combat, while nearly one mule in every seven was a used-up beast. For $1,626,131 we paid for veterinary surgeons, and $20,292 20 for medicines for horses and mules. This unprecedented destruction of horses and mules will have somehow to be arrested, or it will become impossible to mount cavalry and to provide animals for the artillery and wagon trains.

Sickness on the Peninsula.

Our army before Richmond have suffered greatly from Chills and Fever, as well as Bowel Complaints. Some regiments have made a free use of PERRY DAVIS'S PAIN KILLER, and have consequently suffered much less than those who have depended entirely upon the surgeons. A few doses of the Pain Killer taken in the early stages of the Diarrhœa have often prevented a long illness. Some are accustomed to use a little in water, preventing any injurious effects from its too frequent use during the hot weather.

been dissevered with the blow of a hatchet. What a terrible mystery hangs behind this hand and foot, and yet we will venture to say that no inquiry will ever be made. "What's everybody's business is nobody's business," and the hand and foot will go down the void of time with an unwritten history.

And now for something more pleasant; a recital of what New York is doing or going to do in the way of amusing itself:

There is little record to be made of the theatres. Literally nothing stirring but stagnation. Wallack's has closed the season, and reopens instantly under the management of Moss—being six of one and half-a-dozen of the other—with Avonia Jones in the new play of "The Winning Suit," and much of the old company. "Rosedale," the 125th dose, was the closing piece, which dramatic effort, to say nothing of other merits, has had that of putting $5,000 in Lester Wallack's pocket. In Boston it was played 77 times, to the utter confusion of dramatic critics and calculators on public taste, to say nothing of all minor successes.

Niblo's closed with Vestvali and "Bel Demonio" on Saturday, and opened with the "Duke's Motto" and Wheatley on Monday.

The Olympic, after a season in which nothing can be boasted of success, is given up to Borchard and English Opera, while the Broadway announces in mammoth letters "the last nights of the season" at the head of its bills.

Barnum keeps his auditors cool by action, everything just now exhibited on that stage having been seemingly got up for the largest amount of stirring about, especially that part performed by Mr. Collins, whose jumping is positively painful to witness with the thermometer at 100, every jump illustrating the possibility that the jumper might go off in a gush of perspiration.

Heller, after the most successful season ever made by any one in his line, closed on Saturday, to return when the days get cooler and the people return to the belief in packing. He has been the first to elevate his profession to the dignity of an art, and bring together audiences of taste, who went equally to see his magic and hear his music, such pianoforte playing as New Yorkers have heard but few times, even from those who make profession to high art in that line.

Among the items to be counted on for summer excitement is the arrival of G. V. Brooke, who is daily expected in this country. So far we believe he is without engagements, but will not lack them.

The Congress of New York Managers, of which we made mention last week, met at the house of Mr. Wallack, and organized themselves into a permanent institution by electing Wallack President and Stuart Secretary. The conclusion arrived at was to accede to the fearful demands of the musical Teutons, who demand $14 per week—an acceding that seems to us something like Hobson's choice—on condition that the said Teutons will sign an agreement for the whole season, a matter we much doubt, as in the present continued daily rise in all the necessities of life it is next to impossible for any one to tell what their labor may be worth in a week hence. The subject of raising the prices of admission for the coming season was mooted, but wisely dropped, after which an adjournment to the Maison Dorée and a feast of reasons, and a flow of soles—homeward—ended the performance.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A returned soldier of the 7th Mass. regiment was discovered the other morning, says the New Bedford Mercury, soundly sleeping under one of the trees, near the depot, in Taunton, with his cap for a pillow. On being roused and asked why he was reduced to such a necessity as that of sleeping out of doors, he replied: "It's of no use, I can't sleep on a mattrass; and so I came out last night, and in the old fashion have had a good rest."

—— The 110th commencement of Columbia College was celebrated on the 29th June, at the Academy of Music. President King took leave of the students, and introduced his successor, Dr. Barnard, to them. The exercises were of a very high order. The music was under the direction of F. B. Helmsmuller. Seldom has the Academy of Music gathered within its walls such a galaxy of beauty.

—— William Pitt Fessenden, the newly appointed Secretary of the Treasury, is a son of Gen. Samuel Fessenden, one of the ablest lawyers of the State of Maine. Several of his sons have already attained considerable reputation as public men. William Pitt was born in 1806, entered college at the age of 13, and graduated when he was 17 years of age. He then commenced the study of law with Mr. Charles Davies, of Portland, and entered into practice with brilliant prospects for the future. He was elected member of the Maine House of Representatives in 1832, and was repeatedly re-elected, until 1840, when he was made a representative in Congress from the Cumberland district of Maine. He served his full term, but declined a re-election, and subsequently returned to the Legislature. In 1854 he was made United States Senator, and was placed upon the Finance Committee, a position for which he exhibited remarkable fitness. He was re-elected in 1859, and since that period has been at the head of the Finance Committee. Mr. Fessenden had four sons; three of which entered the army. The youngest—Samuel—was killed at the battle of Centreville, in August, 1862. Another—Brig.-Gen. Fessenden—has achieved an enviable reputation on the field of battle; a third is a Colonel on Gen. Hooker's Staff.

Politically, Mr. Fessenden is a Conservative Republican. He is gentlemanly in his manner, affable in his demeanor, possesses talents of the highest order, and is undoubtedly well-fitted for the position to which he has been called.

Military.—Lieut.-Col. Bowman, who had charge of the West Point Academy, has been dismissed from his position, for permitting Gen. McClellan to deliver the battle monument oration.

—— Hughes, the guerilla, formerly one of Gen. Morgan's men, is making raids on the border of the Ohio river, and excites much alarm in Green river county.

—— During the fight at Swift creek Gen. Weitzel was sitting on a log, watching the skirmishing. Two stretcher-bearers came by with a soldier, one of whose legs had been entirely shot off, and whose face was disfigured by a ghastly wound. As he passed by Gen. Weitzel the man raised his head to eject blood from his mouth. In doing this he nearly soiled the General's boot, and at once made an apology for the accident. In such an extremity ordinary men would have been very apt to forget politeness. These little things tell, as much as any, of the heroism of the army.

Personal.—Charles Mackay, the "the Good Time Coming" man, not content with writing letters to the London Times, has written one to the N. Y. Evening Post, in which he denies that he received the pension from the British Government to relieve his necessities, but to commemorate his genius. The N. Y. Daily News calls the minnesinger Carl Mackay the greatest lyeric poet of the age.

—— Gen. McClellan was serenaded on the evening of the 26th June at Lake George, by a large and enthusiastic crowd. He made a short and sensible speech in reply to the compliment.

—— The Stevens, of Hoboken, gave a Strawberry Festival to the schoolchildren of Hoboken last week, at their "palace of Castle Point." Owing to the stupidity of some of the school officials, the poor children were marched around several "unnecessary blocks" under a scorching sun.

—— The heroic little surgeon, Miss Dr. Walker, who was recently captured by the rebels, appears to bear her imprisonment like "a man," for in a letter to her mother, dated Castle Thunder, she says: "I hope you are not grieving about me because I am a prisoner of war. I am living in a three story brick 'castle,' with plenty to eat and a clean bed to sleep in. I have a room-mate, a young lady about 20 years of age, from near Corinth, Mississippi (Miss Martha Manus). I am much happier than I might be in some relations of life where I might be envied by other ladies. The officers are gentlemanly and kind, and it will not be long before I am exchanged."

—— Mr. Lavender, of the Home Journal, has the following equivocal compliment to "Queen Mary:" "Our rosy Empress, charming Mrs. Lincoln, is at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, preparing for her accustomed séjour at one of the watering-places. War may be 'disastrous,' but the 'Fashion,' of which this genial-hearted woman is now the controller, was never before so expensive, never so prosperously gay. The stranger must go to the Hospitals to find out that there is any sadness in the country!"

—— James F. Otis has returned to New Orleans in the hope of resuscitating the Picayune, recently suppressed by the military authorities for publishing Howard's bogus proclamation.

—— John Bright, the English Quaker and orator, has announced that when Parliament adjourns he intends to pay this country a visit. His advocacy of the Union cause will insure him a brilliant reception. He is not popular in England.

—— John Bell, of Tennessee, says in a letter to a friend, that he never would have joined the rebels had he not been told that if a person of his influence attached himself to their cause he would be the better able to control the movement. Facilis averni!

—— Gen. "Baldy" Smith is a Pennsylvanian, and a graduate of West Point. During the Mexican war he was a Captain in the regular army, and was noted for his "dash" and bravery. From some cause or other he lost most of his hair from his head when he was young, and therefore obtained the soubriquet of "Baldy," which has clung to him to the present.

—— Punch says that the reason Garibaldi so suddenly departed from England was because he was privately informed that Martin Farquhar Tupper was preparing to speak an ode to him composed for the occasion.

—— Mr. A. Gallenga, the correspondent of the London Times, better known as Signor Marcotti, has in the press "A Narrative of the Invasion of Denmark in 1864."

—— Mr. Tom Taylor has recently adopted a new dodge in regard to the stage, by writing against the sensation character of most modern dramas. His production was a play entitled "Mystery and Morality," and it does not appear to have been taken from the French. It was a failure.

Obituary.—John Clancy, the well-known Democratic politician and editor of the New York Leader, died on Friday, the 1st of July, at his house in 19th street, N. Y. He was born in this city, and in the old Sixth ward, which has given birth to so many prominent politicians, on the 4th of March, 1829. He served two terms in the Board of Councilmen, representing the Eleventh district in 1854 and 1855. The year after retiring from this Board he was elected to the position of Alderman of his native ward, and held that office for three years, part of which time he served as President of the Board, and ex-officio acted as Mayor of the city during the absence of the regular incumbent. In 1859 he was chosen County Clerk, and served out the regular term of three years. Previous to going into politics he was engaged at the law in the office of Mr. Peter B. Sweeny, and also occupied himself with commercial pursuits of various descriptions. It should be mentioned also that he was an active fireman for several years, and was foreman of Hose Companies 28 and 60. He was not a married man, but leaves behind two sisters and one brother.

—— Col. William Wilson, of the Wilson Zouaves, was killed by a fall from his horse, on Thursday afternoon, the 30th of June, while riding through his farm in Westchester county. Deceased was an active politician and served as Alderman of the First ward for several years. At the breaking out of the rebellion he raised a regiment of volunteers, and served his country for two years in the Department of the Gulf. During the stay of the regiment on Santa Rosa island the rebels surprised Wilson's camp, and it was only by dint of some terrible fighting that the Zouaves escaped being captured. The regiment subsequently served in Louisiana, and after an absence of two years returned to the city with the loss of about 400 men.

—— Mr. Smith O'Brien, the famous Irish rebel, died at Bangor, in Wales, on the 16th June. Mr. William Smith O'Brien was born in 1803. He was the second son of Sir Edward O'Brien, fourth baronet of Dromoland, in county of Clare, by the eldest daughter and co-heiress of Mr. William Smith, of Cahirmoyle, Limerick. His elder brother (better known as Sir Lucius O'Brien, long the Conservative M. P. for Clare), succeeded his father as fifth baronet in 1837, and became 13th Baron Inchiquin in 1855. Mr. O'Brien, after an education at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge, entered Parliament in 1826 as the Tory M. P. for Ennis, and opposed Mr. O'Connell at the famous Clare election. He was member for Limerick from 1835 to 1849, and this was the important part of his senatorial career—the position of a Protestant Irish county member being his Archimedean standpoint, whence he could, as he thought, move the Irish world to O'Connellism. In 1849 he visited Paris with Meagher, and other noted Irish patriots to congratulate the French Republicans, but was very coldly treated by that French Harold Skimpole, Lamartine. The same year he got up the Irish rebellion, for which offence he was transported to a British penal colony. In 1856 he was pardoned. About five years ago he visited this country. He was an honest but unlucky man.

Accidents and Offences.—On the 29th of June an emigrant train consisting of 11 cars, and containing 354 persons, principally Germans, were precipitated into the river, about 19 miles from Montreal. The loss of life has been appalling, very few escaping.

—— At Hume, Alleghany county, David W. Sweet, a hotel proprietor, was taken into custody on a charge of selling, passing and having in his possession counterfeit United States postal currency. In the garrets of the house a cigar box was found containing about $400 in 50 cent and 25 cent currency, and also a large amount of counterfeit money on Albany and Troy banks. Some of the false currency was also found in Sweet's pocket.

—— Mr. Weston, a young man of excellent family, drowned himself at Chicago last week, in consequence of having lost a large sum of money by gambling.

—— Policeman Tyler has been recently tried by the Police Commissioners for assisting a conductor of the 8th avenue railroad to eject a colored woman from the cars. The company has now ordered that colored persons may ride in all their cars.

—— The Seneca mills at Minetta were destroyed by fire on the 28th of June. It was the largest flouring establishment in the State of New York. Damages nearly half a million.

—— As the Provost-Marshal's guard was escorting some deserters on the 25th of June through Morris street, near Greenwich, one of the latter made an attempt to escape, whereupon the guard fired at him so recklessly as to kill him, and wounded two passers-by very seriously. Such proceedings are infamous.

—— Jacob Griesemer, of Oley township, Berks county, Pa., was recently driving a four-horse team home, when three of the horses were killed by lightning. The fourth was stunned and stumbled. Mr. Griesemer had hardly dismounted when the lightning struck this horse also, killing him.

Foreign.—The pirate ship Alabama has been admitted to full pratique in the French port of Cherbourg. She was also permitted to enter upon large repairs in the Imperial dockyard. The pirate Semmes landed the crews of two Union vessels he had burned. He had also written a letter to the London Times stating that the action of the British Government in refusing him entrance to their ports compelled him to burn his prizes. The London Times ridicules his argument.

—— The Czar of Russia and the King of Prussia were to have an important meeting in Berlin; they would be attended by their chief diplomatists. The London Times says the closer the German powers go to Russia the stronger will be the alliance between England and France, who pause simply because their word could overthrow every throne and dynasty in Europe.

—— A foreign legion of about 20,000, consisting of Austrians, French and Belgians, and commanded by a French General, was on the point of sailing for Mexico. It is to receive orders from the Emperor Maximilian himself, and may be considered as a sort of Pretorian guard.

—— The Austrians are fortifying the quadrilateral in Italy with immense assiduity. The recent visit of Garibaldi to England has much disturbed the Italian question.

—— Louis Napoleon's banquets now are on a new principle—every guest has a servant in waiting, every five servants a superior officer to command them, and the Imperial Host insists that everything, including coffee, liquors and cigars, shall be over in 30 minutes. At this rate he could give two dinners an hour.

—— Louis Napoleon had fallen from his pleasure boat on the lake at Fontainebleau, but beyond a sound ducking he received no injury, much to the grief of the Red Republicans.

—— The éclat given in England to the marriage of the Comte de Paris with the Princess Isabella of Spain has annoyed and somewhat disturbed the French Emperor, as it foreshadows an alliance between the Spanish court and the Orleanists.

—— The recent crisis in Canada politics, which involved the assent of the Governor-General to a dissolution of Parliament and a new election, has brought out a plan of reorganization which seems to give great satisfaction. This plan proposes the confederation of all the provinces of British North America, embracing Canada, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and the Northwestern Territory into one system. The plan was the result of a conference between leaders of the Government and the opposition parties.

—— The ancient regime of France are very much scandalized at Louis Napoleon's conferring the title of Duke of Montmorency upon the Prince of Talleyrand.

Art, Science and Literature.—Foreign painters now very generally adopt the plan of photographing their model figures in their studios, and afterwards painting from them, as the draperies can then be more accurately copied.

—— In the Central Fair building, says the Philadelphia Press, may be seen, among other articles of merit, the first steamboat that split the waters of the Hudson river. It was built in the year 1804, by Mr. John Stevens. The boat is an open one, about eight feet beam, and 30 feet long. The engine and the boilers are very great curiosities when compared with the machinery of more modern finish for the same accomplishment. We also observe the boilers made for a locomotive in 1816, by the same gentleman.

—— The European naturalists are having a great time over an animal called the Aye-aye, recently brought alive from Madagascar, and now thriving at the London Zoological Gardens. Though the species was known to exist in the last century, but one specimen had been obtained, and this in the time of Buffon and still remaining in the Cabinet du Roi. It is of the size of an ordinary cat, with a triangular visage, and its peculiarity is in its combining the characters of rodents and quadrumana.

—— The breed of the once famous Shetland pony—shaggy as a bear, and not bigger than a Newfoundland dog—is fast disappearing. So say the English sporting journals.

—— One of our most eminent publishers is about issuing a volume of poems by C. G. Rosenberg.

Odds and Ends.—Capt. Barnaby, of the Royal Horse Guards, lately performed an astonishing feat of agility near Windsor, England. He undertook for a wager to run a quarter of a mile, to ride on horseback a quarter of a mile, and row a like distance on the river, all in a quarter of an hour. He executed the task, winning with four minutes and four seconds to spare.

—— A lieutenant of the 10th U. S. infantry recently met with a sad rebuff at Fort Kearney. The lieutenant was promenading in full uniform one day, and approached a volunteer on sentry, who challenged him with "Halt! who comes there?" The lieutenant, with contempt in every lineament of his face, exclaimed indignantly: "Ass!" The sentry's reply, apt and quick, came, "Advance Ass, and give the countersign!"

—— The Rochester Democrat quotes a telegraph dispatch: "The rebel papers declare that Lee is getting Grant just where he wants him; that Grant is really retreating, and Lee pursuing," and says: "This reminds us of the facetious Iowa editor who got a whaling in his printing office and described it next day, giving all the facts, but making himself the hero. The narrative ran thus: 'There was a blow. Somebody fell. We got up. Turning upon our antagonist, we then succeeded in winding his arms around our waist, and by a quick manœuvre threw him on the top of us, bringing our back at the same time in contact with the bed of the printing press. Then inserting our nose between his teeth, and his hands in our hair, we had him.'"

—— An exchange asks very innocently if it is any harm for young ladies to sit in the lapse of ages? Another replies that it all depends on the kind of ages selected. Those from 18 to 25 it puts down as extra hazardous.

—— Paris consumes 12,000,000lb of ice in a year, Boston 150,000,000.

—— The London Times says there has never been such fighting in the history of the world as that which has lately taken place in Virginia between Grant and Lee.

—— The Medical Reporter says that a consumptive patient, now under treatment, is taking cream with better effect than was experienced under the cod liver oil previously tried. Our advice is for all who have or think they have the consumption to adopt a cream diet; eat pure, sweet cream, as much of it as the stomach will digest well. Eat it alone, on bread, with baked apples, and at every meal. Eat it believing it will cure, and we doubt not that it will prove quite as effectual as the purest cod liver oil that can be bought.

—— Many wives are miserable, not from wanting the affections of their husbands, but from the absence, in that affection, of the quality of tenderness.

FOREIGN NEWS.

It is said that the Alabama left Cherbourg in order seek a fight with the Kearsage, and that heavy cannonading had been heard in the direction of Flushing roads soon afterwards. Galignani's Messenger, of Paris, says that the Kearsage came into Cherbourg roads to watch the Alabama going out, and fight her if she afforded an opportunity.

The Paris Moniteur announces a series of French successes in Mexico, and anticipates an easy rule for the new Emperor.

The Danish question, of peace or a renewal of the war with Germany, was still the cause of much anxiety. It was pretty generally conceded that if the London Conference dissolved without effecting any result England would be involved in war on the side of Denmark. The Danes had occupied the Island of Sylt, by landing a detachment of troops from a flotilla of gunboats. All "German sympathizers" were either arrested or suspended from office. The Danish Minister in St. Petersburg had arrived in Copenhagen. The meeting of the Emperor of Russia, the Emperor of Austria and the King of Prussia at Kissengen was watched with great interest, as likely to affect the subject materially.

It was thought in London that the Italian, Hungarian and Polish questions were all intimately blended by the diplomatists in the consideration and treatment of the Danish difficulty, and that the Polish one may in the end govern the Dano-German crisis.

The Palmerston Cabinet escaped a vote of censure in the House of Commons by the narrow majority of seven.

Visits of search had been made by the Paris police at the houses of MM. Carnot, Garnier Pages and other advocates, suspected of being members of an illegal association for election purposes.

The Liverpool cotton market was irregular and easier, with unchanged rates, on the 18th of June. Breadstuffs steady and firm. Provisions easier. Consols closed in London on the 18th June at 89⅞@90 for money. American securities nominal, without sales.

GREAT BARBERS.

The hairdresser, or barber, in France, as in Italy, is generally something of a character, au fait of all the gossip of the hour, knowing everybody, and seldom inclined to underrate his knowledge or skill. He takes the tone and color of his epoch to such an extent that, could we resuscitate the professor of these kindred arts in the past, we might reconstruct the history of each period from the airs or the souvenirs of its "capillary artists."

Leonard, the hairdresser of Marie Antoinette, wrote the memoirs of his unfortunate Queen; Plaisir, the barber of Charles X., was the favorite gossip and anecdote-monger of the court. Mariton, who had the honor of combing and shaving the "Citizen King," was staid, practical and commercially minded, like his royal patron. Oddly enough the Empress's hairdresser is named Le Roy, (the King), while the Emperor's rejoices in the name of Majesté (Majesty). The Master of France has no barber, he keeps to his old habit and shaves himself.

The two great reigning hairdressers of the day are Felix and Petrus. The former has been the Empress's hairdresser since her elevation to the throne until a few months ago, when he lost his post through having weakly yielded to the seduction of an enormous bribe, allowing a lady of the court to have a duplicate of the headdress made for the Empress, which duplicate the lady in question vowed, by all the saints in the calendar, not to let any human eye behold in Paris, promising to take it off with her to the south of France that very day, instead of which she wickedly postponed her journey, and made her appearance at the Tuileries, wearing the fac simile of the Empress's headgear.

Though Felix, by thus violating his engagement never to let any one have a copy of anything he should invent for her majesty until the latter had worn it, lost his place and the handsome emoluments attached to it, he is still the first artist of Paris in his own line. But he is an absolute despot, and suffers no customer to have any voice as to what he shall do with her hair. Being in attendance on the Duchess of ——, he entered her dressing-room as usual, with the air of an autocrat.

"What dress do you wear to-night, madame?" inquired Felix, leisurely drawing off his white kid gloves, as he approached the dressing-table, on which was laid out a magnificent set of coral ornaments.

"A white moire antique," replied the duchess.

"White moire," said the artist, with a dissatisfied shrug; "the moire is very commonplace. All the butchers' wives wear white moire."

"My dress is really very beautiful," returned the duchess, humbly, "and certainly you won't see many butchers' wives with such lace as that," she continued, with a wave of her hand towards the opening door, through which her maid was entering with the dress extended, its lustrous tissue almost hidden under the splendid overskirt of point de Venise.

"With the lace it may pass muster," deigned to say the artist, with a second shrug; "but as for the coral, it will not be becoming to your style of face."

"But, Monsieur Felix, I am so fond of it! I thought of asking you to dress my hair with double braids and these beautiful coral beads twisted in the braid."

"But, madame, your fancies are nothing to me. I can only dress your hair according to my own inspirations, not according to yours. It is I, and not you, who am your hairdresser. Coral is heavy, Anglican—fit only for Creoles. A wreath of promegranate blossoms would become you admirably."

"Nevertheless, Monsieur Felix," murmured the lady ——

"If you have not confidence in me, madame, call in another artist! I am responsible for the good looks of of my clients," returned the artist, haughtily, drawing on his gloves, and moving towards the door.

The moment was critical. In another minute the capillary autocrat would have re-entered his elegant coupé and have been on his way to the dressing-room of some more pliant "client."

"Justine!" said the duchess, addressing her maid. "take away these ornaments and bring the box of pomegranate flowers."

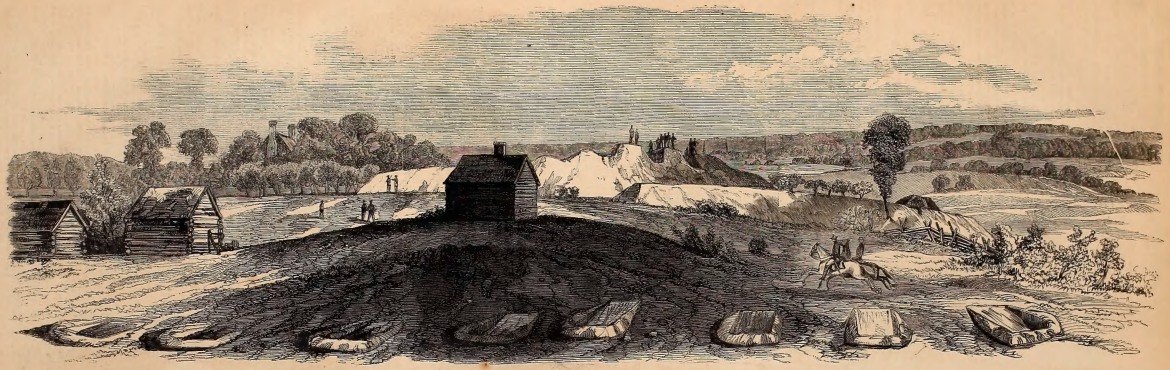
"And a few diamonds," added the autocrat, replacing his gloves in his pocket, and taking up a comb.

The only hairdresser who pretends to dispute the supremacy of Felix is Petrus, the hairdresser of the Grand Duchess of Baden, who passes his existence in a state of vibration between Paris and Baden. Petrus is, in reality, as autocratic as Felix, but he is the most adroit and delicate of flatterers, never assumes an air of command, but contents himself with leading instead of driving.

If Petrus is about to ornament the head of a brunette, he takes occasion to remark that all the great historic women were dark, and expatiates on Miriam, Judith, Semiramis, Lucretia, Rachel, Malibran, and so on, dwelling on their majestic brows crowned with a diadem of jet. If Petrus happens to be operating on a blonde, he admiringly remarks, "When God created a companion for Adam, he gave her your hair and lustrous tresses; and if any proof were needed of the superiority of your shade of hair, it would be found in the fact that among our old German ancestors the brunettes powdered gold dust among their dark locks."

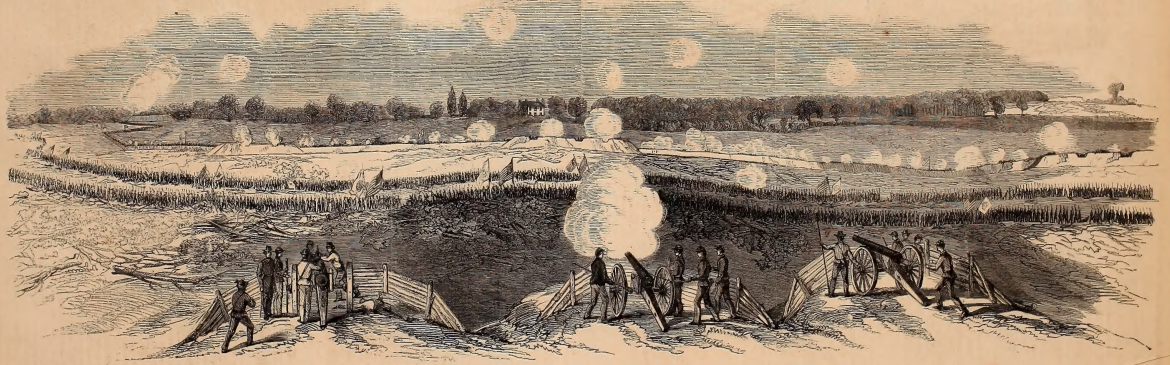
If he be called to give the aid of his art to ladies among whose black or golden hair the silver lines are beginning to show themselves, he reminds them that white hair was the rage in the time of Louis XV., and prophecies a speedy revival of the same preference. "In a short time all the ladies will wear powder, and you will see how charmingly becoming this fashion will be for your smooth and graceful forehead." The inexhaustible flattery of the Grand Ducal hairdresser has an agreeable and acceptable comment for all his customers.

A Lady in Boston during the past year realized $1,600 from the sale of wax flowers. This fascinating art is becoming nearly as popular here as in England, where ladies of all classes practise it in common with painting, drawing, embroidery, &c. A new and delightful little guidebook in the manufacture of flowers and fruits, sheets of wax, &c., which will enable any person of taste to excel in either branch of the art, has just been published by Messrs. J. E. Tilton & Co. It is called "Wax Flowers, and How to Make Them," with new rules for sheeting wax, moulding fruit, &c. The same firm have just published an elegant little manual on making skeleton bouquets, and on the art of preserving natural flowers in all their fresh beauty.



Massacre of Fort Pillow.—We have received from the Hon. J. A. Garfield a volume containing the Reports of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, relating to the Fort Pillow Massacre and the Condition of Returned Union Prisoners. Both of these Reports are important, as furnishing positive evidence of the malignity and barbarity of the enemy. In the case of the capture of Fort Pillow, the evidence sustains the charge of murder, as in that on Returned Prisoners it sustains the charge of cruel treatment, extending to the verge of starvation. The photographic pictures at the end, of the condition of some of the exchanged prisoners, are palpable proofs of rebel brutality. The general circulation of the volume would tend to awaken a little of that righteous wrath against the inhuman and infamous cruelties of the enemy which has strangely slept in the minds of the great majority of the Northern people.

Value of Early Rising.—The difference between rising every morning at six and at eight, in the course of forty years, supposing a man to go to bed at the time he otherwise would, amounts to 29,000 hours, or three years 121 days and 16 hours, which will afford eight hours a day for exactly ten years; so that is the same as if ten years of life were added, in which we could command eight hours every day for the cultivation of our minds or the dispatch of business.



"No one would take you for what you are, said an old-fashioned gentleman, a day or two ago, to a dandy, who had more hair than brains.

"Why?" was immediately asked.

"Because they cannot see your ears."

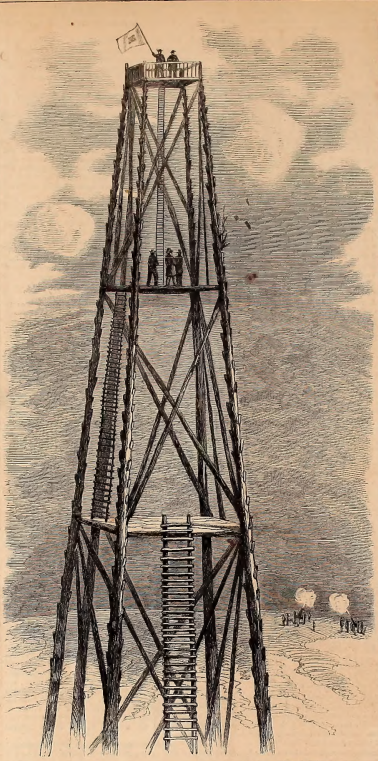
THE BALLAD OF THE SOUTH AND NORTH.

BY AMANDA T. JONES.



Oh, once the Southron's talk was bold;
He vaunted well his fair estate,
His faithful slaves, his mansion old,
His heart that burned for love or hate.
"But spare our rights?" the North replied,
"With equal worth ye have to deal!"
"Up! fire the Southern heart!" he cried,
"We'll teach these Yankees how to kneel.
The Southern heart begins to beat.
We'll drop the whip, we'll grasp the steel,
We'll take no rest till 'neath our feet
These coward Yankees kneel!"

Then brought he forth his stolen guns,
With boastful speech and daring oath;
He laughed to scorn our brawny sons—
"So gone to toil—to fight so loth!"
Our Northmen laid their tools aside,
And listened, listened all alert:
"Come on, oh, if ye dare!" he cried,
"But know our blades are sure to hurt.
The Southern heart begins to burn;
Our hardly nature well assert;
Come, Yankees, one and all, but learn
Our blades are sure to hurt!"

O braggart Southron, wail the day
When Treason thus in arms did start!
For flames that roared o'er Charleston bay
Swept on, and fired—the Northern heart!
Then flashed the sun on serried steel,
Then Northern words were proud to hear;
"Who dares to bid our Freemen kneel Shall meet a foe who cannot fear!"
The Northern heart began to beat,
The Northern voice rang far and clear:
"Who bids our Freemen kneel shall meet
A foe who cannot fear!"

Uprose our glorious Yankee lads;
Our craft the rolling billow cleft;
Loud roared the grand Columbiads;
The rifles rattled right and left.
The slave went free; the fair estate
In gore was drenched, with fire was girt;
The vanquished Southron learned too late,
That Yankee blades were sure to hurt.
The Northern heart with courage burned—
Our freeborn rights we dared assert;
Too late the vanquished Southron learned
Our blades were sure to hurt.

CECILE;

OR,

THE YOUNG PORTRAIT PAINTER.

CHAPTER VIII.

HAPPY in the belief that the duel had not taken place, and still more happy in being able to take to her father a much larger sum of money than usual, which would better satisfy the wants of the old man, Cécile had gone to Vincennes with a lighter heart than she had known for a long time. The way had never seemed so pleasant to her; and, dressed with more than ordinary taste, as if to reflect the ray of sunshine within, she had never looked so lovely. It was the first time since her happy childhood that the poor young girl had possessed so much gold, and the thought it had been earned by her own labor made it of much more value in her eyes. Ye who toil for that which hardly satisfies the daily wants of life will surely sympathise with our young heroine, and will excuse the tears that fell over the gold coins as she counted them over and over, thinking how each will gratify some desire of her now childish but still beloved father.

Smiling and happy she arrived at the house, and scarcely observed the look of restraint and embarrassment on the face of the attendant who admitted her.

The old man's fall had not, after the effects of the first shock had subsided, been considered fatal, but it was followed by alarming symptoms, among which, as usual in such cases, the return of reason was the most significant.

"My daughter! my dear daughter!" he murmured, continually—"do not tell her—let her not know of this," he said, to his attendant. "To-morrow she will come, and I shall be well." Then looking towards the window he asked: "Is it known who fought the duel to-day near the forest, and what is the result?"

"Nothing very serious, sir count," the man replied. "Some of our people who heard the gentlemen talking say it was une affaire de cœur; these things are of everyday occurrence."

Those careless words touched a chord in the old man's heart, and reminded him of the cause of all his sufferings. He made no reply; but tears, big drops of agony, were seen slowly and silently chasing one another down his pallid cheeks for the rest of the day. As night drew near his fever returned, and he talked incoherently and without ceasing. His whole life passed in panoramic review before him—his experiences, his love and jealousy, the duel which caused the loss of his friend; then the death of his young, beautiful, gay but sinless wife; the ruin of his fortune, and the noble heroism of his idolised child—all were pictured in glowing colors to his fervid imagination, till exhausted by mental suffering, the old man's eyes gradually closed, and he seemed to sleep.

"He is very ill," the doctor whispered low. "His daughter should be sent for."

"Yes! I shall be very glad to see my daughter," he said, starting up suddenly; "but you need not send; for she is even now coming—she is here!"

He had not ceased speaking when a knock was heard at the outer door, and Cécile entered the house.

We will not attempt to describe the grief of the young girl on hearing of the fatal accident to her father. But the habit of self-control, learned in the school of adversity, soon enabled her to calm her emotion; and in a few moments she was alone with her father, sitting by his pillow, with a sweet, hopeful smile upon her lovely face, while his eyes looked into hers with inexpressible love and tenderness.

"God will surely bless my child and make her happy!" he said, laying his hand upon her head; "for has she not been to me an angel of light and love? Would that I could have left her in the keeping of some noble heart that would have cherished her as she deserves."

Her father's words took Cécile in imagination back to Paris; and she thought first of the marquis, then of Robert de Saintonge. Singular coincidence! the dread of a duel had, during the whole of that day, agonised her heart, while the sight of one had nearly caused her father's death. Could this be a presentiment of further trouble? What if the marquis had deceived her, and failed in his promise not to meet Robert? This thought seemed like an illumination. They have fought! Robert has been wounded, perhaps killed—poor Robert, who left her in anger—whom she loves as a brother—to whom she owes the few comforts and pleasures she has been able to give her father—whose love she could not return, as it deserved to be—Robert has been killed, and by the marquis! Did the marquis then really love her, that he could thus forfeit his word to rid himself of a rival? If so, can she ever acknowledge her love for him, and be ungrateful to the memory of her friend, her generous benefactor?

The greater part of the day was passed in these sad meditations.

"Speak to me, Cécile," said her father, when they were again alone. "Is there no one to whom your heart turns for sympathy in this season of trouble and sorrow?"

Cécile trembled violently, and knelt beside her father.

"My dear father," she sobbed, "of you alone I am now occupied; from you I desire sympathy; to you look for comfort. I have but you in this wide world."

"But, my child, I cannot leave you alone. God is calling me away from earth, and I shall very soon join her whose name you have so jealously guarded during my mental aberrations—my insanity. That has passed away, as the light of another world dawns upon my mind; and memory now brings back the form of one who, in the midst of all your sufferings, and during your hours of devoted labor, stood by you with unfailing devotion, ever ready to inspire hope and confidence in the future—ever near to cheer and comfort. To-morrow I will send for the Chevalier de Saintonge—for Robert, as he would have you call him—and, having placed my child under his protection, I will die in peace."

Just then a letter was placed in her hand, and Cécile, recognising the handwriting of the chevalier, exclaimed with joy, "Safe! he is safe! I was not deceived!"

"Who is safe?" asked the old man, surprised at her emotion.

But the young girl, who had continued reading the letter, became pale as a statue—she shuddered—the paper dropped from her hands, and she fell fainting on the floor.

CHAPTER IX.

The marquis, occupied by many other objects of deeper interest, had nearly forgotten the events of the preceding night. Sleep is certainly "tired nature's sweet restorer," and renews our wasted strength after both mental and bodily fatigue; but it cannot remove the heart's secret sorrow. Robert, though calm outwardly, suffered, perhaps, still more than at the moment he heard of Cécile's departure. He passed the whole night in writing to her. He determined to see her no more. He would visit Paris, France, Europe, and fly to the end of the world; but first he would let her know that henceforth she was to the marquis and himself an object of pity, of contempt! These were terrible words to write, and he hesitated to put them on paper, but having once summoned courage and resolution to do so, he repeated them again and again.

At the first appearance of daylight he sought the marquis and rushed into his room, pushing aside the valet, who refused to admit him.

"I have come to beg a last favor of you," he said, throwing himself into a chair and holding out the letter in his hand. "I shall not go this evening to Vincennes; I will not accept the sacrifice you have offered me; I give up Cécile, and with her all hopes of future happiness; I am going away—where I know not, but go I must, and have written to Cécile to that effect."

"Well, throw your letter into the post, my dear fellow," the marquis replied, getting up in ill-humor.

"I have just come from the Rue Platrière," Robert continued. "Cécile has not yet returned; it seems she finds much to amuse her at Vincennes. Your friend Rieux knows the house she visits there; perhaps he will do me the favor to write the address on this letter, which, no doubt, will give her much pleasure and add greatly to the enjoyment of which she went in pursuit."

"That requires a little reflection," the marquis said, turning over the package placed in his hand.

"You need not fear, I have written nothing which will interfere with the amusement which you and Rieux anticipate this evening. I leave you to the enjoyment of it, for I am going. Adieu!"

"Stop! What the deuce are you about?" exclaimed the marquis, jumping out of bed and placing himself guard before the door. "You are truly a strange being!"

"You are right," Robert said, in a tone of deep sadness; "and yet I am far more wretched than strange."

The marquis looked earnestly at his friend, and was now surprised and pained to see the change which one night of intense suffering had wrought upon him. The two men, once rivals, now sincere friends, talked long and earnestly together, and the result was that Robert returned home to prepare for his departure.

The cruel letter was, however, sent, and we have seen its effect upon the unhappy girl, who, though wounded in every feeling most sacred to her, yet yielded but a few moments to the emotions of her tender, loving heart. She soon recovered, and her force of character sustained her.

"Will Robert come?" asked her father, who, in his anxiety for his child, about to be left alone and friendless, cherished the hope of placing her under the protection of one who would shield her from rude contact with the world.

"Yes, my father," she replied; "and he will not come alone. He will bring the Marquis de Maucomble, his friend and mine."

"Maucomble!" the old man repeated, as if the name was familiar to him. "I once had a friend of that name, but it was a long time ago—long ago," he continued to murmur, looking at his child as she leant lovingly over him. Then smiling upon her, he drew her to him, kissed earnestly her brow, her lips, then looking up to heaven, his hand gradually released hers, his eyes closed, a sweet smile settled upon his whole face, and the old man slept the calm long sleep of death.

The young girl stood and watched her father for some time, but, overwhelmed by the sad reality of her position, and unaccustomed to such scenes, she observed not the change that had come over him. Scarcely conscious what she did, she sat down and wrote three notes. The first, to the marquis, ran thus:

"Monsieur—The Count de Mamers begs the Marquis de Maucomble to call this evening, that he may thank him for the interest he has shown in his daughter, Cécile de Mamers.

"The Marquis de Maucomble will excuse the request made by the Count de Mamers, who is prevented by his great age from calling upon the marquis."

In a postcript was added:

"Do not refuse my poor father this proof of your friendship. He is extremely ill at Vincennes, at the house of M. Duchaume, near the forest.

"Cecile de Mamers."

The other notes were more easily written, and occupied less time:

"Chevalier—My father, who is dying, would himself reply to your letter with his last breath. Come this evening, without fail. To-morrow, perhaps, will be too late. Cecile."

"My good Doctor—Come to my assistance. Your poor friend, my dear father, had a terrible fall yesterday. M. Duchaume and the house physician declare him in great danger. My hope is in you alone. You, perhaps, can save him. Come to our relief. You, who have been so kind to us both, will not refuse my request. Cecile.

"Dr. Gousset, Rue de Babylonne, Avenue des Invalides."

Having dispatched her notes, she again took her place by her father's side. How peacefully he sleeps! She cannot hear him breathe. She leans over him and gazes earnestly into his face; she takes his hand within her own, it chills her by its touch; calls upon him by the most endearing names, as in days of old, when a happy child, she had climbed upon his knee, and by her sweet smiles and innocent prattling had chased away the clouds gathering over his path, herself all unconscious of the storm so soon to break over her young life. But the old man can no longer hear the voice of his sorrowing child, he has already awakened, with restored and quickened intellect, in the full light of the higher life.

CHAPTER X.

The marquis, impatient of the many incidents connected with an affair in which he no longer took any other interest than that induced by a sincere sympathy for De Saintonge, at seeing Cécile's signature, read the note over carelessly, saying:

"I am really glad it was to see her father and not a lover that Mademoiselle Cécile took her evening walks. She now stands acquitted, and will again be reinstated in the most sacred niche of the preux Chevalier de Saintonge's heart, as the pure and saintly lady of his worship. But as to Monsieur de Mamers, he will have to wait for me this evening, for I shall be forced to deny myself the pleasure of visiting him till some future time."

The name, however, sounded familiar to him, and by degrees awakened old remembrances.

"Strange," he said, "if this Count de Mamers should be of the same family as my late uncle's old friend and companion of whom he has so often spoken to me. He was noblehearted, genial and truly magnanimous, and it was through him that my good uncle obtained the hand of my dear aunt, who was as a mother to me. Truly, if Cécile's father is a relative of his, or if it should prove to be himself, I should be grieved and mortified, for the nephew has made a strange return for the kindness and friendship shown to his uncle. This is worth following up."

We will now return to Robert, who had passed the whole day in making preparations for his departure, and at night found himself as little prepared as in the morning. Unwilling to go, every little obstacle was made a great cause for delay.

Never had he loved Cécile so truly, so devotedly, as now; and never had his love caused him so much suffering. It was no longer Cécile with whom he was annoyed; he was angry with himself; of his own conduct he was ashamed, and he would gladly have recalled that letter, every word of which he now felt was a cruel insult to her he professed to love, had not mauvaise honte, and a little lurking feeling of jealousy restrained him.

Just then Cécile's note, so explicit and yet so laconic, was brought to him. His letter had been received, and oh! at a time when she was in sorrow, keeping watch by her dying father. It was for that father she had labored, and desired wealth; it was with him she had passed the night, trying to soothe and comfort his last moments; to him were made those mysterious visits; and he, Robert de Saintonge, who should have understood and appreciated her character, had been the first to doubt and accuse her.

"How like a mean, cowardly wretch I have acted!" he exclaimed, as all these thoughts rushed with lightning speed into his troubled mind; "Cécile, dear, injured girl, can you forget my blind, unpardonable jealousy? But I must and will obtain your forgiveness!"

Doctor Gousset, notwithstanding his great distance from Vincennes, was the first to obey Cécile's call; but not in time to find the Count de Mamers alive.

The poor girl could not be persuaded at first to leave the chamber of death, wishing to remain alone with him who had been her only tie on earth. But she yielded at length to the good doctor's solicitations, and with great effort resumed, in appearance at least, her usual calmness.

"Doctor," said the young girl, looking up into the face of her friend with that affectionate trust so beautiful from the young to those of riper years; "will you let me now look to you as unto a second father, for the advice I so much need in this trying moment? I am resigned, but my heart is very sad."

The doctor, moved by this touching appeal from one so young and friendless, took the orphan girl under his protection; and having drawn from her the whole story of her life (her devotion to her father he already knew, having witnessed it), she proceeded with all the eloquence of grief to speak of her gratitude to the Chevalier de Saintonge, and the less absorbing interest, as she expressed it, she felt for the graceful and gallant marquis. Her old friend believing himself at once initiated into the mysteries of the young girl's heart, exclaimed:

"Well! my child, I understand it all; you love the Chevalier de Saintonge more than you think; more than you are willing to acknowledge to yourself."

"Not so, my friend," Cécile replied, while the color mounted her cheeks; "you are indeed mistaken."

"But I am sure of it," he replied. "Believe me, I am a very keen observer, and feel confident it is as I say."

Cécile made no reply, but with averted eyes and grateful heart, listened to the good man's expressions of sincere sympathy.

"And now, my true friend," she said, when he had done speaking; "my father's death has overflowed my cup of affliction. It has dispelled the last illusion of my life. I once believed myself esteemed, respected at least, by Monsieur de Saintonge; but read," she said, giving him the chevalier's cruel letter, and no longer able to restrain her tears.

The doctor read the letter twice, slowly, and as if taking in the implied meaning of every word; then suddenly and without speaking, tore it into a thousand pieces, which he threw to the winds; Cécile meanwhile staring at him in mute astonishment.

"Nothing is now left of that document," he said, when his work of destruction was finished.

"Oh yes, my friend, for every word is written here," she replied, placing her trembling hand upon her heart, "and nothing can efface the impression. Monsieur de Maucomble will perhaps be here soon; and it may be Robert, too, will come. Receive them for me, in my father's room; may they both regret their unworthy suspicions, but tell them, my friend, that to them both I am as one dead. They have dared dispute my love; they have even appropriated me as a piece of property to be bought and sold; and Robert, to whom I confided every sorrow but that which concerned my father, he has wounded my sense of delicacy, my refinement, my love of all which I have been taught intuitively to revere and cherish most. Perhaps in the future, I may rise before him as a memory of the past; something that has been, and is no more; or a strain of music heard in departed years. But Monsieur de Maucomble will forget me," she continued, in a lower tone, "no remembrance of me will linger in his heart; and as the light autumn leaf is wafted by the breeze, leaving no trace behind, so shall the memory of Cécile pass away, while she, having bid farewell to the outer world, seeks peace within the consecrated walls of the cloister."

"My dear child," interrupted the good doctor, I can well understand your feelings; but cannot listen to such a sad determination. You have asked my protection, and I therefore claim the right to advise—to change your purpose."

"Oh! my dear old friend, my mother's image is indelibly impressed upon my heart. She loved—even as I have—and, how cruelly she suffered? No! no," she continued, as if communing with her own heart; "I was loved as a young, nameless, unknown and unprotected girl, but as Cécile de Mamers I shall perhaps be shunned. No, no, God will soon reunite me to the loved ones who have gone before."

CHAPTER XI.

Few are my years and yet I feel
The world was ne'er designed for me.—Byron.

Eighteen months have passed since the day when the good doctor, over the remains of his departed friend, related to the marquis and the chevalier the noble conduct of his devoted daughter. It required no great oratorical effort to interest his two auditors. It was enough to speak the plain unvarnished tale. Cécile, when scarcely fifteen, had seen her mother die of grief, and her father suddenly become a confirmed lunatic. In his capacity of physician, he had watched the young girl in all her efforts to provide for her father; and he had, himself, advised the mystery with which she had surrounded herself, so as to elude the demands of the law against duelling. He ended by explaining why Cécile had been obliged to visit her father only at night, because that was the only time when he enjoyed lucid intervals. This recital made a great impression on his two listeners; one a passionate lover; the other, noble-hearted and generous, notwithstanding the gay life he led. The marquis, from accounts given by the doctor, of the Count de Mamers' early life, had no longer any doubt that he beheld the remains of his uncle's beloved friend.

"Since Mademoiselle de Mamers will not see me," he said to the doctor, "do me the favor to say to her that I claim, in my uncle's name and my own, the honor of carrying out all that your friendship would suggest for her."

"Mademoiselle de Mamers has decided to forsake the world and retire to a convent," the doctor replied with sadness.

"No!" the chevalier exclaimed, rousing himself from the stupor into which he had relapsed. "It cannot be! this must not take place, by all that is sacred!"

"But she is inexorable, my friends; she has declared it here over the remains of her father."

Cécile, protected, though against her wish, by the family of the marquis, had easily gained admission to the royal Abbey de Notre Dame du Val de Grâce. She refused to see both the chevalier and the marquis.

All the good doctor's discernment could not penetrate the secrets of that young heart. He still believed her wholly occupied by the chevalier, whose letter, cruel and unkind as it was, had, for a time, placed a barrier between them. Sanguine himself, he still encouraged Robert to hope, and the marquis, who now sincerely desired the success of his former rival, and had not the least suspicion that he held any place in Cécile's heart, or influenced her determination, did all in his power to inspire the chevalier with confidence in the ultimate accomplishment of his wishes.

"You will not surely remain inexorable," wrote the impassioned lover. Oh! Cécile, think of my long devotion—forget wherein I have erred—and above all, remember the double blessing that awaits the merciful. Believe me, the day on which I lose the hope that now sustains me will be the last of my life."

"God has decided for me," the young girl said to her old friend, after reading Robert's last letter. "I must fulfil my vow. In eight days the sacrifice will be accomplished. Let the chevalier remain ignorant of the fact as long as possible. I shall pray for his happiness—as for me, I accept suffering as my lot. Tell him," she added, with a look, the full meaning of which the doctor could never understand—"tell him to learn from the Marquis de Maucomble how to forget."

Dr. Gousset, still strongly convinced that Cécile loved the chevalier, advised him to wait patiently, and even succeeded in persuading him to leave Paris for a short time, and find relief in change of scene. The doctor then had an interview with Cécile's confessor, and obtained from him the promise that the ceremony of taking the veil should be postponed as long as possible, and that meanwhile he would try to discover whether she really felt called to the vocation she was about to enter, or whether it was a mere passing fancy of a youthful imagination. The good father confessor fulfilled his promise, and reported to the doctor that the young girl when asked again if any feeling lingered in her heart, which might cause her at some future time to regret the irrevocable step she was about to take, had appeared troubled, and asked if she could not at the last moment, without giving cause for scandal, renounce if she chose, the accomplishment of an act which she then felt fully disposed to ratify.

"Oh! woman, woman," soliloquised the doctor while waiting in the parlor of the convent, on the eve of the day appointed for the grand ceremony. "Who can fathom the mysteries of a woman's heart?" and the good old man walked the room in a state of excitement, muttering: "We shall see that Mademoiselle de Mamers will wait till she is covered to-morrow with the symbolic pall, before she returns to the world and accepts the love of the Chevalier de Saintonge."

He found Cécile restless and unhappy, and was almost tempted to make a last appeal in favor of Robert, but controlled himself, fearing to excite the spirit of opposition, which, according to one of his pet theories, formed the basis of the female character. He was about to leave, at a loss to imagine why Cécile had desired to see him, when she called him back, and said in a voice scarcely audible:

"I am told Monsieur de Maucomble is to be married soon."

"I have not heard of it; and certainly if it were true all Paris would know it."

The young girl bowed her head low, trying to conceal the joy that lit up her pale face, as we see the highest snow-capped mountains in Alpine regions suddenly illuminated by the first rays of the sun.

"Will he be present at the ceremony?" she asked, timidly.

"No! he feared his presence might cause unpleasant remarks—might not be expected—I mean," continued the old gentleman, embarrassed and scarcely knowing how to shape his reply. "I confess I requested him not to come. But his mother, his sisters and the whole family will be there."

"It is my wish he should be present," Cécile replied, with more excitement in her tone than she intended to express; then eagerly asked: "Are you sure Monsieur de Saintonge has quitted Paris?"

"Very sure!" replied the doctor, who now regretted it was so—"I accompanied him three days since on the way to Lyons."

"I thank you!" murmured Cécile, and holding out her hand to her old friend, "adieu!" she said, "to-morrow—to-morrow!"

Returning to her cell, the young girl sank on her knees in prayer:

"O God! let me read one regret, one look of pity, of tenderness in his eyes, and I would implore thee to restore me to happiness and life!"

And now the eventful day has come at last. The bells of the royal abbey gaily announce the mystic marriage of Christ's new bride. The large outer court of the convent of Val de Grâce is filled with splendid equipages; the candidate for the veil is young and beautiful; the officiating priest who will address her and offer the consolations of the church is noted for his thrilling eloquence, and the Maucomble family has left nothing undone to render the ceremony grand and imposing. It is mid-winter, and the snow is falling thick and fast. A traveller, wrapped in a large mantle, was walking with difficulty up the Rue St. Jacques. He stopped near the abbey, and listened to the solemn knell which mingled with the festal chiming of the bells.

"I have kept my promise," he said, speaking to himself, "and have now but one regret—which is, that I have deceived the good doctor in making him think I had faith in his friendly professions. One more effort and I will have forgotten all fatigue, and all my troubles will be ended."

The church of Val de Grâce—which now looks empty and deserted—was on that day filled with a gay and brilliant crowd. The narrow enclosure of the outer choir was occupied by the Marquis de Maucomble and the members of his family, who, with Dr. Gousset, represented that of Mademoiselle de Mamers. Sweet, solemn music was heard at intervals from behind the silken curtain hung over the gilded railing, which, even in our time, separates the outer from the inner choir. T traveller halted at the door of the church and shook the snow from his ample cloak. Meanwhile a carriage was rapidly advancing towards the broad steps at the entrance of the sacred building; when it stopped, a young man in a complete suit of black jumped out, and was met by our traveller, who stopped him at the door, and whispered:

"Many thanks, Monsieur Damécourt; you see I am punctual."

"No nonsense, remember, Monsieur le Chevalier," the young man replied. "I would not for the world have it known that I was fool enough to pity you, or encourage this romantic adventure. Maucomble would never forgive me."

"You need not fear," the chevalier replied quietly. "I would but see and hear for myself how far a woman's obstinacy will lead her."

"Very well. Now you are a reasonable man. I knew I should convince you. Besides, my dear chevalier, I know it from good authority that this affair will end in a scene. Mademoiselle de Mamers aims at producing an effect. When she is ex-

THREE SONNETS.

BY MRS. KEDDIE.

I.

SHE has gone down! They shout it from afar,
Kings, Nobles, Priests—all men of every race,
Whose lingering clogs Time's swift relentless pace,
Do shackle down!
She has gone down! Our evil-bodeing star!
Rebellion, smitten with Rebellion's sword,
Anarchy, done to death by Slavery—
Of Ancient Right, arrayed in mercy, Canard,
Beneath a helpless cloud of civil war
Strife such as heathen slaughterers had abhorr'd,
She has gone down!
The lawless band, who would call no man lord,
Spurning all wholesome restraint, all dreaming free
Her rabble rule's licentious tyranny,
In the fierce splendor of her insolent noon,
She has gone down—the world's eternal scorn!

II.

She has gone down! Woe for the world! and all
Its weary workers looking from afar
To the clear rising of that hopeful star,
Which was to herald in the golden day
Of Pow'r decrepit, and of Rule outworn;
Beautiful dawning of that blessed morn,
Which was to bring the right, and the poor to live,
To work and eat, to labor and to thrive,
And righteous cover all the throbbing earth!
She has gone down! Woe for the panting world
Back on its path of progress sternly hurl'd.
Blasted the promise of the Future's birth,
Home of all highest hopes—Time's richest birth!
Woe for the promised land of the whole Earth!

III.

Triumph not fools, and weep not, ye faint-hearted!
Have ye forgotten that the Christ was crucified?
Of Heaven had giv'n this people o'er to perish!
Have ye believed that God would cease to cherish
His elect?
This great New World of Christian liberty!
And that our light for ever had departed!
Nay—by the precious blood shed to redeem
The nation from its selfishness and sin,
By each true heart that burns to see it free,
Leaving its kindred hearts to break through life
By all the tears that will not cease to stream
For ever, every desolate home within,
We will return to our appointed place,
First in the vanguard of the human race.

Love's Martyr.

On the banks of the Loire stood a little cottage, half hidden in leafy vines and brilliant blossoms, a very paradise of bloom and fragrance. Milkwhite doves nestled in the eaves, and robins and rainbow birds flashed their bright plumage in and out among the tangled vines. From its square patch of garden could be seen the sparkling, rippling on through emerald-green meadows and stretches of shadowy woodland; but in all the fair scenery there was not a human habitation save this, so dainty a cottage as this one. It was spring; and all the pleasant fields of France were carpeted with flowers. Yet the hearts of the people were sad. It was the beginning of Napoleon's war with Russia; and already a presentiment of that unfortunate expedition had stolen into the public mind.

One bright day in early April the conscription commenced, and no sadder heart could beat than that of Clarice Fontenoy, in her cottage by the Loire. All that world interested her not by the open window, idle, for she could not work, gazing, with wistful eyes, down the road, by which those who should be conscripted must return. What if her betrothed should be among them?

She was not alone, opposite her, with a brow almost as sorrowful as Clarice's, sat Annette, the lighthearted village beauty, not gay to-day, since her lover's fate was also to be decided, for conscripts were regarded as lots, condemned for certain death, and very few were those who returned from Napoleon's campaigns. In silence they waited, quietly, sorrowful Clarice and weeping Annette.

At last the shrill tones of the fife and the monotonous roll of the drum announced that the villagers were returning, none of them too happy, since, if they themselves were free, their comrades were not. Then the cottage in which her mother died, and where she had just closed her uncle's eyes in death, would be hers; but of what use but she sold all, except a pretty green silk gown, in which Jacques loved to see her dressed, and a little of the money which her mother had round her neck when she died.

Then she collects all her gold together, and talks to the cow, saying;

"Holy father, here is all I have; now write and beg the release of my betrothed. Do not let him be one of the conscripts. Do not let me be left alone; will tell him. As for me, I shall work now with a light heart, and earn more money, so do not fear for me—I shall be happy, since to me my first and only love."

Then she was much touched—he blessed Clarice for her goodness, and wrote to Paris, to get Jacques restored to liberty, sending the money to the proper person to pay for his release.

Clarice tripped back to the little room she had hired, and having prayed, dreamt that she was standing at the altar with her Jacques.

Another six months passed. Clarice had worked and saved enough to furnish a little cottage—bonbon, her goodness had been noised abroad—though not by her—and she was more beloved than ever before.

Still her heart at times grew very sad; and one day when she was in her little bedroom it grew so heavy that she wept, and kneeling down, prayed, "Holy saints, grant me to see my Jacques once more before I die, for I now long for death, but cannot die until I have seen him."

As she rose from her knees she saw the priest hastening to her cottage, his face radiant with joy. As he came near he said:

"My daughter, the day of your reward approaches—prepare your heart to receive it; Jacques is free, and is now on his way to the village; to-morrow he will be here. When he hears that you have rescued him from his slavery, he will know what it is to be loved by a saint like you."

Clarice knelt down at the good priest's knees and thanked God with all her soul, the tears running from her beaming eyes, and bathing her face in the sunlight as though it were a glory from heaven.

Then came—the villagers, rejoicing with bell, and drum, and fife. They all assembled at the little triangular green which intersects the road that Jacques must come by.

They sang and danced and respectfully for Clarice, who approaches attended by the curé, to welcome her lover home. She is dressed in the green gown he loved so well—how fair it is; and although silent, she is very happy—her lips move, for she is praying. The villagers close around her—soon in advance of the rest—a shock—but nothing is visible except the shadows of the trees upon the road. Suddenly a black speck appears in the distance—it comes nearer—it is a horseman there are two—it is Jacques! But who is she? for it is a woman! Further ride up to where the priest and Clarice stand surrounded by the villagers. Jacques is strangely confused and avoids meeting the eyes of those around them.

Then the priest asks in a stern voice:

"Who is that woman?"

And the soldier replied in a low tone:

"It is my wife, holy father. I am married to her."

"Wretched man," said the priest, "better thou hadst not been born; for never again will you be happy; thou art cursed of God and man—for it was Clarice who prayed for thee—it was Clarice who sold all that she had—and it was Clarice who bought thy release."

Astonished at the word he interrupted by a wild, shrieking laugh; it was from Clarice. Her reason had fled forever.

That jocund laugh was the epitaph of her mind.

Silently the priest took her hand and led her away to his own home, while the villagers followed, shouting and looking scarcefully on the soldier and his bride. Then they left standing alone on the bare heath, monuments of shame and remorse.

SIGNAL STATION ON BUTLER'S ADVANCED LINE.

OUR ARTIST sends a sketch of a signal station in the Army of the James. Butler's reputation, by Foltz's battery, but so exposed that Gen. Butler, regarding it as too dangerous, ordered the here attracted attention, and shell came flying thick and fast, striking at last the slight but towering structure, and bringing down some of its most necessary supports.

THE SIEGE OF PETERSBURG.

THE suddenness and celerity of Grant's movements have taken us all by surprise, a great General or a madman? Fertile in resources, unfettered out to obstinacy, his movements are seldom anticipated or met. In the present struggle at Petersburg he found no loophole. His splendid transfer of his army to the south of the James seemed to lay Petersburg at his feet, but he found himself met by all the scientific resources of modern engineering. The first line of rebel works on the right (see our last number, page 200 were carried by Burnside's corps.

The artillery duel which ensued in putting its steady shower of shot and shell on the enemy's line from the batteries opposite, and the rebel reply through the brush and fallen trees in double line-of-battle. The right line of battle holding a piece of ground, aligned by a belt of timber towards the city. Says a soldier:

"I was lying about five o'clock p. m. We opened our battery at once and commenced shelling the rebel fort. In five minutes we had their range. We kept on firing for about half an hour, when our infantry, Gruffin's brigade, made a charge and captured the rifle-pits and fifty prisoners. We had, we afterwards learned the rebels intended to charge us.

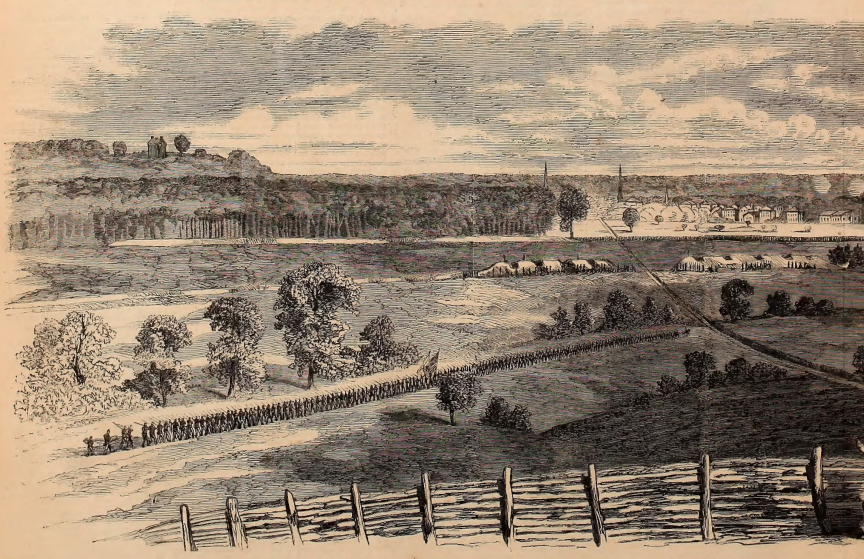
The rebel works on the left are shown in another sketch. These, too, were carried by Burnside's 9th Corps. Dunnan bears the glory of the achievement. This battery takes the right of Foltz's battery, and its space.

The sketch on our double-page shows the position of the rebel line of works. It winds up into the side of Cemetery Hill, and winds its tortuous way to the city from the captured fort now manned by our troops, and which we hold against destruction. Further on you may discern the line of rebel works extending around the city. The ground that held the fie reeling back. On the right an adventurous battery pushes on to its work.

BUZZARD'S ROOST—ROCKY FACE RIDGE—HOVEY'S GAP.

THERE never was probably since the world began a more terrible campaign than that now carried on by Sherman in the Atlanta region. We all know the difficulties of the field of Chattanooga, with its mountain barriers, and the heroic valor with Sherman, as he advanced, found still greater difficulties.

Buzzard's Roost, which no earthly power could take from the rebels, was the first point where our troops had a match score of men, became useless to Johnston, and he was forced to abandon it. Rocky Face, the next position, was also one of great natural elements as he drew back. Buzzard's Roost is a certain point, and a rising ground in front of Rocky Face ridge, a mile in advance from Rocky Face rises by a tremendous ascent to the height of 1,000 feet above the valley of the Connesauga. Here Johnston lay, his front protected by a dam and artificial lake, and his heavy overhanging cliffs. Sherman's troops tried to crush him, his men penetrated along the mountain side till they could talk to the enemy, but could neither see nor be seen. In the rear of our picture rises the bold form of Rocky Face ridge, a mile inaccessible height, almost as high as Lookout mountain and more precipitous, flanked in many parts by a perpendicular cliff 20 to 60 feet high.



Such was the spot which Geary's gallant men, toiling up the rocky side, carried five successive times, but were destined not to hold. Our sketch finishes the a month-east view of the north pass of Hovey gap.

"Vengeance is mine, I will repay saith the Lord." Romans xii. 19.

Thro' the wide world, the sun's bright eye
Sees many a deed of sin and shame;
But there are crimes, so black in dye,
One shudders at their name.
Crimes, that the stricken soul appal,
That freeze the blood and blanch the cheek,
On which the searching sunrays fall,
And condemnation speak.

I wonder how God's sun could shine,
Nor tremble at the work his light
Was set to do, as each dread line
Of treason met his sight.
Oh, was the starving many a score
Of unoffending, helpless men,
The act of human beings? or Devised by Satan's brain?

Starvation to the point of death!
The horror conjured by the thought,
Stifled the current of my breath,
As home to me 'twas brought.
I saw the wasted forms laid bare,
The fiend of war misery;
No false exaggeration there,
Sun pictures cannot lie!

Oh, what a sight for Christian eyes,
Those poor, pale skeletons! And oh,
The fearful load of guilt that lies
On men who made them so!
Grief, pity, horror, all will swell
Within our hearts at this great wrong;
And who that can dare forefell?
We ask Thee, Lord, how long?

Into Thy hands, great Judge of all,
Our righteous vengeance we commend;
Upon Thy mighty power we call,
This shameful sin to end.
Scarcely can we endure the sting
Of knowing more we do not share;
Then what must be their suffering,
Who the full sharpness bear?

How can we check these cruelties,
At which humanity grows pale?
When Christ's law fails to christianize,
Can Governments prevail?
We cannot of our rulers ask
That they retaliate in kind;
To work out such a devil's task,
No nation e'er they'd find.

What can we do? must we submit
To let the rebel leaders still
Destroy our men as they see fit,
At their own wicked will?
Weak, powerless to fold our hands,
And wait in shocked and dumb despair,
Till God enforce His own commands,
In answer to our prayer.

Nay, is this all that we can do,
God helps them who themselves will aid;
And in His favor we will go through
Our part, nor be afraid.
Push on our armies, and sustain
Our glorious leaders, Meade and Grant;
And give them of supplies and men,
All, all they ask or want.

While we, safe in our guarded homes,
Pray without ceasing for success
To crown our arms—for Peace, that comes
Thro' victory only can bless.
Let us strain every nerve to win
Their strongholds from our cruel foes;
Leave it to God to punish sin,
Who sin's full blackness knows.

He will, by our brave soldiers' hands,
Unlock the prison doors. His care
Will call to life and hope the bands
Of the sad captives there.
But for the Past, the agony,
The bitter anguish that has been
The measure meted—shall not we
Mete back to them again?

Oh, no! oh, no! "Vengeance is mine,
I will repay," declares the Lord.
Wisdom it needs, and power Divine,
To carry Judgment's sword.
Let us trust Him; even pray
That true repentance they may learn;
And from the snare of Satan, may
To righteous paths return.

Within our hearts let us not dare
Harbor revenge and angry hate,
But lay our wrongs and sorrows where Justice and Power wait.
Give we our energies to those Whose sufferings we may allay,
Leaving all vengeance on our foes,
To Him who will repay.

The Serpent-Woman.

CHAPTER XVII.

Oh, that we were on the wild, wild wave together,
With but one plank between us and destruction,
That I might seize him in these desperate arms,
And plunge with him beneath the whelming billows,
And see him gasp for life!—Bertram.

THE influence Marina suddenly gained over Muta was complete. The latter appeared to be passive enough in the hands of her rescuer to be moulded by her into whatever form she chose to make her assume. Marina preferred to infuse some of her own undaunted strength into her mind, and to render her as free-thoughted and independent as it was possible for her to become. She did much towards making the girl a woman and to fit her to fulfil the duties of a wife.

"Are you not afraid that Grimgrip will run away with you again?" she asked Muta one day.

"Not at all," answered Muta, laughing. "You have taught me to be brave and to use my hands and feet and lungs. I am strong and resolute enough to run away with so old a man, in spite of himself, instead of allowing him to capture me."

"You are a spit-girl, Muta. Look you out of you. It is just as easy to frighten danger as it is to allow danger to frighten us. Run from it in wild fear, and it swells to the size of a mountain to dash bodily at it, and the chances are nine to one that it dwindles to a bubble and bursts. It is cowardice, not weakness, that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred provokes injustice and oppression."

Some weeks elapsed ere Bertram Hapswell returned to Ellingford Hall. He appeared suddenly in the library, dressed in black. Marina and Muta were sitting in the corner of the apartment, the latter listening to the other's eloquent reading. She absorbed was Muta by her friend's attention, that she did not hear Bertram's approach till he almost touched her, when she turned and saw him. Forgetting, losing all difference and reserve, with a scream of delight she leaped into his arms and received and returned his caresses with all the innocence and eagerness of childhood.

So oblivionly in paradise were the lovers in one another's arms, that they did not at the time notice either the presence or the absence of Marina. A while afterwards, however, Bertram recollected her to whom both were indebted for their fidelity to each other. In vain. She had left the mansion, never to return.

A month passed away and Julien St. Croix paid Ellingford a visit, in his character of family friend to see Marina. During his stay Muta received a letter from her, containing, to her friends, the startling announcement that she was going away with Gregory Grimgrip (of whom she spoke with affection), and that death alone should part them. The knowledge of this step, and of the unexpected hideousness of his person and character, were qualities that even St. Croix could not associate with Marina in any relation without horror, had the pure-hearted young Frenchman returned to his native land, disgusted with life, penitent and sceptical, embraced the Catholic priesthood; and bade carnal love and joy farewell for ever.

During the cholera season that followed the ordination of St. Croix he was the most fearless and indefatigable of all in visiting the sick and administering to their bodily and spiritual wants, and among others to whom he rendered such acceptable aid was Madame Nitouche herself. A panic had seized those about her and they had fled from her side, leaving her to the mercy of the disease that has at one time and another made so many millions its prey. She despaired of herself, and was glad to make her peace with heaven. To St. Croix she confessed the secrets of her dreadful life, in order that confession might be to be learned from her what great injustice he had been doing Marina in his heart; for her mother said, it seemed, upon receipt of a letter from her concerning Grimgrip, solemnly assured her that he was after all her actual father. St. Croix, who was a skilful physician as well as a healer of the soul, not only saved the life of Madame Nitouche, but convinced her of the error and wickedness she committed in her attempt to murder Marina, to be her daughter, and of the atonement she owed her husband for attempting to take his life by poison, for this crime was the principal business of her confession. His eloquent exhortations wrought powerfully upon her, and after subdued and penitent condition, and he was enabled to exert sufficient influence over her to induce her to visit England and seek reconciliation with Grimgrip, still her legal husband. Their meeting was a strange one, constrained, conflicting and dubious, and would, but for the forgiving compassion and admirable address of Marina, have terminated in renewed hostility and bitterer hate than ever. But she pleaded with one and counselled the patience of the other alternately—imploring with tears, caressing and controlling both with the unwearied love of an angel and the firmness of a lover's tempter, so that, great as her victory was over their evil passions, it was no wonder she gained it.

At this painful meeting the mystery that had so long perplexed Marina was dissipated, and the remaining obscurity about her parentage was determined by her mother, and all doubt on the subject for ever set at rest.

She learned that her putative father, Gregory Grimgrip, had, many years before, carried on a trade between England and France, paying half a dozen or more visits to the latter country annually, and had met her mother, Mathilde Nitouche, in Normandy, with whose parents he was a friend. She was very beautiful and very poor, an orphan, and earned her scanty subsistence with her needle. Gregory paid his addresses to her, and by means of his rich presents and the dazzling illusions of wealth overcame her repugnance to his ugliness, and married her. Disparity of age, of looks, of tastes and feeling, rendered the match a very unequal, and, eventually, a very unhappy one. Mathilde endeavored to console herself for coupled deficiencies by dressing splendidly and surrounding herself with handsome young gallants, to whom she was suspected of granting favors incompatible with her marriage vows. Among her favorites were Monsieur Mirabeau and Victor Kingsland, senior, the former apparently enjoying her tenderest regard. To remove his wife from their society, Gregory took up his residence in France, but his frequent and necessary absence from home at once exposed his fair partner to temptation and aggravated his own jealousy. His temper grew intolerably sour, and his moroseness and sharp upbraidings rendered his presence to his wife a constant source of unhappiness, and made her at last wish for nothing so much as for an eternal separation from him.

Her antipathy to him deepened into the deadliest hate, and his suspicions of her tortured him worse than a purgatorial machine. She discovered at length that she was haunted by his spies during his absence, and grew desperate. More than once in his rage he threatened her life on account of her suspected infidelity, and she finally determined to forestall him in the work of death.

She procured a drug which would forever lower the potion which was to dispatch her husband on the journey which admits of no returning, and mixed it with the wine of his supper. Little did she dream that she had been watched and discovered by a spy in the pay of Grimgrip, who, hidden in the garden in which her conversation with her partner in guilt took place, overheard enough of it to put his employer on his guard. At the breakfast-table a servant brought word to Mathilde that a person was waiting in the hall anxious to speak to her. Mathilde stepped out of the room to listen to a pretended message from her lover, her husband emptied his cup of coffee into the coffee-pot, fell to the ground in convulsions, a few minutes afterwards, of seeing her pour out and drink a cup of the beverage she had been tampering with, died. Soon after, overpowered with drowsiness, and retired to her chamber. Grimgrip soon followed her, and found her lying apparently asleep on her bed, and her maid, in a fearful state of agitation, endeavoring to rouse her.

"Monsieur, what is the matter with madame?" asked the girl. "She said, 'My husband poisoned me,' and then sank into this state. I can't wake her, all I can do."

"Let her alone; she has been drinking too much, and will sleep it off," said Grimgrip, with affected indifference.

But he saw danger in remaining, more than he dared acknowledge, and left the house, taking Marina, his only child with him. At Dieppe he left her with Madame Pourpre, the widow of an old naval officer, whom he had been in his employ. To avoid suspicion and inquiry, he at once told the widow that the child was his natural daughter by a lady who was dead, and offered her the old lady a handsome sum to induce her to take charge of the little one. Madame Pourpre was too poor to refuse her request, and she soon disposed to do so, which she was not, and accepted the trust and the money.

Grimgrip left from Dieppe to England, hastily settled his affairs, and sailed for New York, in which city he lived for many years, and acquired great wealth and influence.

Mathilde, whose lover had given her a powerful narcotic instead of poison, soon recovered from the effects of the dose, and after much cogitation was enabled to give a near guess at the manner in which the deed which had been turned upon her. Her conjectures were confirmed by a letter she received from her lover, upbraiding her with her intended murder, and bidding her farewell for ever. As soon as she contrived to convert into money the means her husband had left, she removed from Rouen into Brittany, and bought a small property in Launion, Côtes du Nord, upon which she resided until prevailed upon by Julien St. Croix and Marina to live with Bertram.

Little Marina remained in Dieppe till she was accidentally discovered by Mordaunt Elstone in Madame Pourpre's shop, in which he was purchasing ivory trinkets, for which the town is celebrated. He was struck with an instantaneous fondness for the once loved Mathilde, and, upon inquiring into its history, was satisfied that it was her daughter. He felt a natural kind regard for Marina, and had her sent to a fashionable seminary and educated at his own expense. Her mother, at Elstone's instigation, left Madame Pourpre a short time before the latter's decease, heard her story, and persisted in believing that Grimgrip had lost her the truth, and taken her own child with him to his place of exile. Poor Marina was, therefore, left motherless by her mother, who refused to acknowledge her, and left her in a state of painful doubt as to her parentage.

But each misgiving no longer existed in the mind of the mother, who now treated her devoted daughter with affection and tenderness. Even Marina's husband her conduct was respectful, and she appeared determined to compel his inclinations to submit to her sense of her duties. Grimgrip, indeed, without reason, doubtful of Marina's blood relationship to him, was charmed by her attachment and gentle obedience, and received favorable reports from every personage Marina, who was anxious for her own and her mother's sake, to avoid embarrassing associations, had to board, had revealed upon her parents to visit America, with the view of making their home in it. In disposing of their property and in converting it into money for the purpose of removal, Marina was grieved to observe the keen suspicion with which her husband and the wife regarded each other, and could not but feel that hatred was still lurking in the depths of their hearts, and that each had been her pupil-like in childhood, and she spotted in its tiniest like a dolphin. To have expanded and expanding soul on the ocean, bounded but by the blending sky that only stooped to kiss its imaginary brim, was a sight that should have banished their enmities, and made her heart swell with the loftiest poetic emotion. The grandeur of desolation was dear to her lonely soul, and the wide waste of waters, restless as her own heart, or as deadly calm, sympathetically relieved her intense spirit, and lulled it into grateful repose.

Bold and staunch as was her heart, it was fluttered like a bird's one night when she was awakened by a fearful cry that sounded like the scream of despair and death. They know little of the "horror heaped on horror's head" who have not, in such a time and place, heard such a sound. She leaped out of her berth, dressed herself scantily and in haste, and hurried upon deck. She saw smoke and flames issuing from the steerage hatchway, and comprehended in a moment the awfulness of her situation. But her courage rose with the occasion, and she felt superior to its horrors. Grimgrip came on deck, and, hardy as he was, could not but be astonished at the tremendous emergency. His wife was overwhelmed by it. Her conscience was aflame, and, death in its terrible form it now appeared her, appeared to her like divine judgment and retribution. Marina believed that her last hour had arrived, but even in that time of wildness and terror her thoughts wandered far away to another than herself.

"Bertram!" she murmured. "Bertram, where are you now? Sleeping calmly and happily by Muta, while death stalks near us in his fiery agonies. Sleep on and wake only to joy. I, who am consumed with a more burning passion, fear not these devouring flames. Among these hundreds I alone am ready and right willing to die. Why should so many cowering wretches be sent shrieking into eternity? Would I might suffer and die for all!"

The flames mocked all attempts to subdue them, and spread with the rapidity of a winged demon. Death never looked more ravenous or reached more terribly for his prey than did they. Two boats were swamped in launching. As Marina was about to descend into the one in which her mother was already seated, Grimgrip hung about her neck some papers enclosed in an oilskin bag, telling her to hold the contents next to her own life the most precious of all things. The boat, however, did not live long in the sea, being quickly filled and sank. Marina, who boasted that she could dance and swim for ever, sustained her mother till she grasped a floating spar, which she exchanged for other parent. The shattered planks were insufficient to support both, and the husband and wife, in their deadly struggle between time and eternity, suddenly glared upon each other with the unquenchable hate of many years, for a while suppressed, but now breaking forth into fatal fury. The planks drifted with them away from Marina, who, appalled, with horrible distinctness, the fearful pair struggling for the possession of the little raft, each trying to throw off the other, and both succeeding. For in the desperation of their endeavors they allowed their support to slip away from them and both went down, never to rise again in life, clinging in one another's arms, not in the embrace of love but in the grapple of infernal hate.

Marina struck out for them, but she could not reach them before they disappeared. She never saw them afterwards. This was to her, although she had that night witnessed scenes that was frightful, the crowning horror. She felt almost reckless of life, but still swam with the ease of long habit. As the flaming vessel went down the sun rose, as if he had hurried up to witness this final catastrophe. Marina, who had availed herself of the support afforded by a large oar which had drifted towards her, beheld the awful catastrophe with emotions no words can describe, with something of the feeling which perhaps the astonished soul first contemplates the phantasmagoria of the eternal world. She sustained herself for about an hour in the water, till she was picked up by a boat from a brig, which had borne down upon the wreck of the disaster, and was instrumental in saving two boatloads of human beings and some few swimmers, who had managed, like Marina, to keep afloat as long.

The survivors from the wreck were taken to Boston, Mass., to which port the brig was bound; but as Mr. Gregory's agent lived in New York Marina hastened thither, and obtained the best legal advice in relation to her affairs. The documents entrusted to her by the deceased included, among other valuable deeds, a will which made her his exclusive heir. Her father's agent supplied her with all the money she required, and after visiting some of the principal cities and lions of the country, and settling her business satisfactorily, she received a letter from Mordaunt Elstone, which induced her to return to Europe. Prior to her departure from New York, while walking down Broadway, she was abruptly accosted by an ugly old man, who cried:

"Oh, Cielo! Marina!"

She gazed at the shabby little fellow in mute surprise.

"Don't you know me? I am Scoda."

Marina's kind heart was instantly overflowing with sympathy for her little old friend, although she could not help being, in spite of herself, much amused at the oddity of his appearance and with his employment, which consisted in roasting and vending chestnuts.

"Oh, what a fall is here, my Bohemian!" she exclaimed. "I thought you had a soul above commerce."

"So I have, Marina; but I find I need not put much soul into the business and the capital, which is very fortunate, as I left both on the other side of the ocean. But you must not laugh at me. What think you that your idol, Garibaldi, is doing for a living?"

"On my life, nothing unworthy of himself."

"He is making candles or Rushen lights."

"'Tis fitting; for he is a bright and shining light himself. And what can make you look?"

"Another of our old friends is here, worse off than either of us."

"Who?"

"Victor Kingsland."

"I have long been hunting for him, for I heard that he had returned from California. Where is he?"

Signor Scoda pointed to a rough stone building, with a green in front of it.

"That is an hospital. Is he very ill?"

"He is dying."

"Of what?"

"The delirium tremens."

"Take me to him instantly. Oh, never mind your chestnut furnace. I buy you out on the spot at your own price—business, goodwill, fixtures, and all, with the confident expectation of soon realising a fortune and winning fame as the most furious chestnut seller. Come!"

Marina would never have recognised in the bloated and raving idiot that Scods pointed out to her the once handsome and dashing Victor Kingland. She found him in a dreadful fit, and he screamed at the sight of her, calling her a red serpent with blazing eyes, and mistook Scods for the devil himself.

Marina left nothing undone that medical skill and unremitting devotion towards saving Victor Kingland's life, but without avail. She was with him in his last moments. Before he died, during a lucid interval, he recognised her, and charged her with messages to his mother and brother. Marina had him buried in Greenwood cemetery at her own expense, she as a manner befitting the position he had and ought still to have held in society.

She returned soon afterwards to England with little Stella, who like her heroic countryman, Garibaldi, has since risen from the depths of adversity and taken part in the glorious self-assertion of his beloved and beautiful Italy.

CHAPTER XVIII.

As thee to wanton boys are to the gods,
They kill us their sport.—King Lear, ACT V., Sc. I.

Yet not always on the guilty head
Descends the fatal flash.—Thompson's Summer.

THERE is always a bright spot in a man's life, enduring it a brief space, but while it lasts almost realising his ideal of happiness, and serving afterwards to comfort him in the possibility. Petrarch enjoyed his fleeting paradise, this oasis in the desert of terrestrial existence with Muta, and both were so happy that they did not, could not think they could be happier.

Muta had learned to talk well, but she did not say much, and that little was as simple as it was sweet and moving. Her eyes had, however, become illumined with lovely expression, and her angelic smile was often the most charming reply that could have been made to her lover's burning eloquence. Bertram was her tutor, and found much of her mind a blank page which received its impressions readily and retained them indelibly. Her progress was almost miraculous, and the young master was prouder of his pupil's rapid advancement than he would have been of her erudition had she been, when he first knew her, a profound scholar. His task was a labor of love, and one in which he took great delight.

But upon knowledge for its own sake she did not seem to set a high value. As far as her acquisition of it enabled her to gratify Bertram, it was of inestimable worth to her. Her task, then, was a labor of love, for love was her incitement, her light, her guide, her haven and reward. So absorbed was her whole soul by Bertram, that she felt as though the loss of him or of his affection would render her mind as blank, dark and ignorant as ever.

When Muta's education was deemed sufficiently complete to justify her introduction into society her marriage with Bertram was regarded with little form and propriety, and she assumed the duties and honors appertaining to the mistress of Wildenham, the hereditary mansion of the Hapsells. Lady Adele Hapsell, a very noble woman, received Muta kindly, and no sooner became convinced of the cordial innocence and truthfulness of her disposition than she took her to her heart and loved her as if she had been her own daughter.

Sir Bertram Hapsell, Bart.—for such was now our hero's title—received a magnificent dowry with Muta, all that Elfstone could bestow, for the old sculptor, driving that his days were few, and that her chance to Ellingford would be contested, provided her in advance with ample means to maintain them. After Bertram and Muta had left Ellingford, Elfstone found his condition very feeble, and he wrote to Marina, entreating her, if she was at all dissatisfied with her position in America, to return to England and live with him. He sent back to his studio, in which he spent the greater part of his day, and worked incessantly on a statue representing the fair one he was so anxiously expecting to hear from and again welcome to his heart. He "groped" his way through his last work, seemed likely to prove his greatest masterpiece, for it was not only very beautiful, but replete with wonderful energy, suggestive power and intense expression. It advanced rapidly, for he gave all his time and strength to it, and when away from it seemed quite absent and lost. Night ate and drank very little, overtaxed his powers, and evidently needed some one capable of exercising a wholesome control over him.

A venerable old gentleman who called to see him one day was told that he was engaged in his studio and could not be visible till five o'clock in the afternoon, his dinner hour, and that it would be actually dangerous to disturb him before. The visitor said he had come some hundred miles to see him, and would wait his appearance.

Mordaunt Elfstone had worked unusually hard that morning, and during the afternoon grew tired and sat down on a bench at some distance from the statue to rest himself and contemplate his work at the same time. The sky had become overclouded, and the room looked very gloomy. After the sculptor had gazed for some time at his noble creation, he saw, or thought he saw, a pale figure appear beside it, wreath its arms around the statue's neck and kiss its cold lips. When the face of the apparition turned towards him, misty and white as it was, he recognised it to be Muta's, and its pensive smile and look of heavenly affection for him sent a thrill of strange awe through his heart. As it disappeared it beckoned to him with graceful waving of the hands, impelling to the gazer that unearthly sensation which can only be awakened by supernatural presence. When it had vanished he gazed in every direction, surprised to find all wearing its wonted aspect, and exclaimed fearfully:

"I am going mad again!"

He made a great effort to compose himself, and to divert his mind from the apparition he had beheld; tried to read a book, but found he had brought with him from the breakfast-table, but neglected till now. For some time, however, the letters seem before him, and he grew tired and lonely solemnity of his spiritual visitant filled his sight; but as his vision grew clearer it was presented to him something more fearful far, large, mourning, horrible type, announcing the loss at sea of the steamer on which Marina had taken passage for America, and the perishing of every creature on board, with the exception of seven of the crew. Elfstone sprung to his feet like one wounded while sitting, and struggling to overmaster his fate, tottered towards his statue and fell lifeless at its feet.

At about four o'clock the patient visitor awaiting the advent into the library of Mr. Elfstone was startled by Julien St. Cloud.

"Where is he? have you not seen him yet?" demanded the latter.

"He is in his studio, I believe, but his servants tell me it is dangerous to disturb him before his usual hour of coming forth, and I have therefore been constrained to wait patiently as I could."

"They had little idea who you are, and doubtless took you for some clerical bore, whose visit to the studio would have been the matter never beyond endurance, or they would have treated you with more courtesy. I stand upon no ceremony now, however, and will take you up at once."

As Julien and his venerable friend were ascending to the sculptor's sanctum, the former observed:

"I think it is well you were not admitted before I arrived, for there is no telling what effect a sudden disclosure of this kind may have upon him."

Little did they divine with what impossibility Elfstone could receive the most astounding disclosure they could make to him, and little were they prepared for the silent and awful spectacle that met them. For a few seconds after they had entered the studio, they thought that the old artist had left the room, and Julien, catching a ray of the statue, exclaimed:

"Heavens! Marina in herself, and as like as life!"

"Your daughter?"

"I loved her as such. This is the beauty that was worthy of Elfstone's chisel. Oh, my God! my new life, like the visits of spring. She is no angel, but the Queen of Women."

He hurried to Nature's masterpiece, as this is Art's. Great God! here is Elfstone, lying on the floor. He has fa—no, he is no more."

"My brother dead!" cried the man falling on his knees before the sculptor, now as pale, cold and insensible as his own works.

"Yes, he is dead! He has gone as this we must all be parted, but, oh, how different! I thought I had murdered him in his crime, and I have felt like a fiend ever since. Perhaps he has prayed with me before me, though younger, but why precede me to the grave? His must have died while I was waiting for God's mercy! I thought that I should have been so near him, and have rendered him no aid in his last moments."

"He suffered little very suddenly," said Julien, who had taken the newspaper that the dead man grasped out of his hand. "Here is the false indictment of Marina Scods, which must have been a shock of grief for her loss killed him. She was always his chief solace, and latterly his only stronghold in life."

On the day on which these events transpired Bertram and Muta were sitting in their beautiful, charming scenery dressed in the full luxuriance of August, to the half ruined chapel of St. Wimeux. They were before him, and Bertram, who had hardly reached the chapel, which was undergoing a partial renovation, before they were overtaken by a violent storm. Muta, who had been much terrified from Grimgrip's housekeeper a habit of tacit piety, mingled with superstition, no sooner heard the first peal of thunder than she knelt down before the rude altar, which was of beautiful marble, and in strange contrast with the rest of the building, and knelt in silent prayer. Bertram had some trouble with the horses, and had just secured them against the impending violence of the storm when he was well-nigh stunned by a thunderclap that seemed to shake the earth and almost brought down the roof on his head. He ascribed the concussion that he was paralysed and paralysed for some seconds, and full a minute elapsed before he recovered his self-possession. He entered the chapel, congratulating himself that he had tied up the horses in time so firmly, for they had just reached most fearfully loud and near.

As he walked up the aisle his nostrils were saluted with a sulphurous smell, and he rushed forward to behold at the foot of the shattered and smoking altar the prostrate form of Muta. He raised her—she hung listless in his arms. Her ridinghat had fallen off; her hair had become dishevelled and fell over her face, her habit, down to her ankles, its steps in golden luxuriance. One side of the lightning that had struck her. He pushed her hair aside, gazed into her face of pure, deadly whiteness, its eyes and their wide blue stare, and frantically kissed the parted lips that showed the shining pearls behind them. He chafed her hands, called her by every name of endearment, and when he had tried every expedient he could think of to revive her and found that she was dead, he flung himself on the altar and besought heaven to strike him, too, with its lightning, lifeless by the side of the beautiful corpse of his young and innocent wife.

THE ARTIST'S LOVE.

BY WM. WIRT SIKES.

THUS spake to me a dreamer, some years gone,
Who bore the name of being loveless, sad,
And wedded only to his Art—a man
Who dwelt amid the beauty he begot
Before his easel. Warm of heart, and true,
But helpless, somehow, ever-more had still Persistently. Thus once he spake to me,
In answer to a question I had put—

"In all my life, I never knew what 'twas
To sigh for love in vain—for from my heart
Grow dead within me, and the springs of life
Fainting in dearth of love-dews; and I keep Death's watch over all that is blooming here.

"There's silver hair upon my head, for grief
And care have touched me, as they touch us all;
But if I'm sad, I've but to close my eyes
Upon a weary world, and turn within
Into my other world, my world of dreams.

"There I find love that changes not, nor pales
Its fires for ever—love that burns as pure
As incense on the altar of a saint—
That feeds me kisses from sweet virgin lips
Where none have been before, to brush away the blooms
That calls me tender names no other ear has heard,
And sings me into sleep with songs more beautiful than any earthly siren ever sang her love.

"Loveless? Here's love to make a jealous world envious, and I'm not alone in my loveless love—
And other lovers know how much of pain
Their love doth bring them. Oh, a wondrous love
Is mine, with passion, tenderness, and yields
Kisses that never cloy, joys that do grow
For ever richer, deeper, stronger. Who so blest
As this with love?"

None but the dreamer, sooth!

HINTS TO SOLDIERS FOR EMERGENCIES IN MARCH AND CAMP.

THE facility with which the American, above all others, adapts himself to any position and finds resources in any emergency is commendable, and the general familiarity with forest life gives him an experience not usual in Europe. Still a few hints of modes of encampment may not be amiss, and may give them with illustrations that may benefit not only the soldier in the field, but travellers and all in case of accident.

Water supply is one of the great difficulties which soldiers and travellers have to contend with. The use of the skin or pannch of an animal properly cleaned and dried has indeed been found of great service. Fig. 1 shows the mode of carrying it. This kind of bag is commonly used in Hungary and Asia for wine and water, is that referred to in the Bible, where the allusion is made to new wine in old bottles.

Fig. 2 shows a method of carrying water by means of a piece of looking-glass, which may be seen on mine.

Fig. 3 is a method of boiling water in camp.

In Fig. 4 an effective mode of securing a prisoner is shown. It consists in tying his thumbs as well as his feet. The method of making rush-bottomed chairs and seats is also represented. In Fig. 5, which may also be lashed firmly, and yet so as to remain flexible by a slight movement, is shown a method of securing.

Fig. 6 shows a mode of bridging over a gap, which is also represented in the illustration.

Fig. 7 shows a method of drying damp clothes, which is also represented in the illustration.

Fig. 8 represents an underground tent or hut, with a double entrance. The deeply-dug hole dug beneath the flooring of the tent, and serving, by the help of a rough bridge, as a bed, is also worthy of notice, as it secures a dry resting-place.

Fig. 9 represents often a difficult problem safely to descend in a steep hill or rocky place. This is best effected by felling a tolerably large tree and tying its roots to the limbs left standing on the branches to sweep the ground. Another plan is to unharness the leaders and hook the wheel horses behind the rear axle of the wagon.

Fig. 10 shows modes of securing straps, etc.; mending a broken tongue of a buckle; tying a pole to hold a kettle, and a method of making a spring.

Fig. 12 is a section of a tent pitched for a long stay, showing a stone wall, a bank, a bench, a fireplace, the seat and table being dug out.

Fig. 13 is a method of using baggage. It is made by cutting off a branching bough and laying slats across.

In sleeping in the open air the head is not so much a matter of difficulty as the feet. A piece of a wide turf thrown up or boughs make a good protection, as seen in Fig. 14. In Fig. 16 is shown a safe method of securing the musket in such cases.

Fig. 17 represents a mode of advance, it is necessary sometimes to resort to distillation. Fig. 15 shows how water can be obtained. Take any iron pot, fill it to it a thick wooden cover, inserting into the side the spout of a tea-pot, and fill the pot full of water. Let the lid be stem may escape into the barrel. A jug is next made into a cover for the barrel in lieu of the lid, and which, filled with water, acts as a condenser, the distilled water escaping at the nipple of the barrel into a vessel set there.

HOW THE RED RIVER FLEET WAS SAVED.

ADMIRAL DAVID D. PORTER'S official report to the NAVY Department, dated at the mouth of the Red river, May 10, gives a vivid account of the ingenious device by which the naval fleet was saved.

The following is the material part of the report:

"I am sorry to say that we have had no hope or expectation of getting the vessels out this season; and now the army has been withdrawn from the interior of the country, I saw nothing before me but the destruction of the fleet to prevent its capture. There seemed however to have been an especial Providence looking out for us in the person of Colonel Bailey, acting engineer. This Col. Bailey, acting engineer of the 19th army corps, proposed to build a dam, with a series of dams across the rocks at the falls, and raising the water high enough to let the gunboats step a golden luminance. Everybody looked like madness, and the best engineers ridiculed it; but Col. Bailey was so sanguine of success that I requested Gen. Banks to have it done, and he entered heartily in the work. Provisions were short and forage was almost out, and the dam was promised to be finished in ten days, or the army would have to leave us. I was doubtful about the time, but had no doubt about the ultimate success if time would only permit. Gen. Banks placed at the disposal of Col. Bailey all the force he required, detailing at once 5,000 men and 500 or 600 wagons. All the neighboring steam mills were torn down for material, two or three regiments of Maine men were set to work felling trees, and on the second day after my arrival in Alexandria from Grand Ecore the work had fairly begun. Trees were falling with great rapidity; frames were moving in all directions, bringing in brick and stone; quarries were opened; flatboats were built to bring down stone from above; and every man seemed to be working with a vigor I have seldom seen equalled, while perhaps not one in fifty believed in the success of the undertaking. These falls are about a mile in length, filled with rugged rocks, over which, at the present stage of water, it seemed impossible to make a channel.

The work was commenced by running out from the left bank of the river a wee dam made of the bodies of very large trees, branches and stones, crammed with other heavy timber, and strengthened in every way which human ingenuity could devise. This was run out about 500 feet into the river; four large coal barges were then filled with stone and sunk at the end of it. From the right bank of the river cribs filled with stone were run out, and sunk in the water. All of which was successfully accomplished, notwithstanding there was a current running of seven miles an hour. Trees were cut to sweep completely over the dam, and securely reached completion at eight days' working time, and water had risen sufficiently on the upper falls to allow the Fort Hindman, Osage and Neosho to get down and be ready to pass the locks. Meanwhile it would have been high enough to enable all the other vessels to pass the upper falls. Unfortunately, on the afternoon of the 9th inst., the pressure of water became so great that it swept away two of the stone barges, which was enough to blow the dam on one side.

The Lexington succeeded in getting over the upper falls just in time—the water rapidly falling as she was passing over. She was steered admirably by the steering in the dam, through which the water was rushing so furiously that it struck on a timber, but she protected, shaved her. Thousands of beating hearts looked on as she passed the rocks. The silence was as great as the Lexington approached the dam that a pin might almost be heard to fall. She entered the gap with a loud peal of steam on, pitched down the roaring torrent, made two or three apparent efforts to broach to, struck on the rocks below, was then swept into deep water by the current, and rounded to. Cheer after cheer of 10,000 voices rose in one deafening cheer, and universal joy seemed to fill the air. The Osage was next seen coming. The Neosho followed next, all her hatches battened down, and, with the exception of the steering apparatus, she did not fire as well as the Lexington, her pilot having become frightened at the water. She, however, safely stopped her engine, when I particularly ordered a full head of steam, and she started in the second time for a second trial, and disappeared from sight under the water. Every one thought she was lost, but she came up, however, swept over the dam with her engine stopped, and fortunately escaped with one hole in her bottom, which was stopped by the time she got to the Fort Hindman and Osage both came through beautifully, without touching a bar. The Fort Hindman was the last, and only fortunate enough to get up large vessels as well as small ones. She was not once seen until she struck on the Mississippi. The accident to the dam, instead of disheartening Colonel Bailey, only stimulated him and his exertions after he had seen the success of getting the vessels through.

The noble-hearted soldiers, seeing their labor of the last few days swept away in a moment, unwearyingly set to work to repair damages, being confident now that all the vessels would be finally rescued over. Three men had been working for eight days and nights up to their waists in water. They brought their provisions and wheeling bricks, and nothing but good humor prevailed among the men. On the whole it was very fortunate the dam was carried away, as the two barges that were sunk served as a breast-work to protect the vessels from the rocks on the left, and made a fine cushion for the vessels to rub against. Admiral Porter was prevented from running on certain destruction.

The Admiral concludes his report in the admiration I feel for the abilities of Lieut.-Col Bailey. This is without doubt the greatest engineering feat ever performed. Under the best circumstances, a private company would have required six months to perform the work, at a cost of $2,000,000. More, he has deprived the enemy of a vessel of war, and has saved the vessels of the navy. I understand that over two hundred vessels of the various of the army was a dead fact, and there was no doubt in the mind of any one that the enemy would not to destroy every part of the vessels, so that the rebels could not possibly get any use of them. The thanks of the Government can bestow on Col. Bailey can never repay the debt of gratitude the country owes him. Admiral To Gen. Banks, personally, I am much indebted for the happy manner in which he has forwarded my every request, giving it his whole attention night and day, and personally superintending the work. I consider it my personally to see that all the requirements of Col. Bailey were complied with to the letter.

The width of the river at the dam was 750 feet, and the depth of water from four to six feet. The current was from five miles an hour to seven miles an hour. Col. Bailey raised the depth at the main dam 5 feet 4½ inches, and the dam at Dwight 3 feet 6 inches, and the fall 6 feet 6½ inches.

Gen. Banks, in his report, says: "To Major-Gen. Franklin, who, previous to the commencement of the work, gave his hearty support and co-operation, and to whose energy and perseverance the most unceasing efforts cause the adoption, I desire to refer favorably. To Gen. A. J. Smith and his command the success of the Gulf and the Mississippi squadron in awarding to them the highest praise for their untiring energy in behalf.

Major-Gen. Banks promptly issued all necessary orders, and assisted me by his constant presence and encouragement. Lieut.-Col. Dwight Bailey, 19th Army Officer of Gen. Franklin's staff; to Lieut.-Col. W. B. Hinsey, 161st N. Y. Vols.; Lieut.-Col. D. Pomeroy, 130th U. S. (colored) Infantry, who was my assistant; to Capt. George H. Nettleton, 19th Army Corps; to Capt. Morton, Morrison and Harper, of 95th U. S. (colored) Infantry, and to various soldiers much knowledge and untiring zeal.

The following is a list of the troops who constructed the dam: Pioneer Corps, 19th Army Corps, under Capt. Morton; 95th U. S. (colored) Infantry, under Col. Lincoln Vols., Lieut. Kimball, Quartermaster, Lieut. Col. Pomeroy, and Lieut. Hinsey; 130th U. S. (colored) Infantry, Col. G. D. Robinson; and detachments from the 29th Iowa, 23d Wisconsin, 14th Indiana, 19th Kentucky, 16th and 33d Ohio, 8th Iowa, 97th and 130th Illinois, and other regiments.

Colonel Bailey worked patiently and enthusiastically by day and night, standing waist deep in the water under the heavy fire, and received the reward of success of having performed their duty as true soldiers, and they have the thanks of their entire countrymen.

Our Artist has depicted the scene with great care, that every remarkable feature of engineering skill may not be passed over amid the incidents daily arising. He has given us his sketchbook in the photographic form by Messrs. McPherson and Oliver.

The dam on the extreme right of the sketch was made of trees, with the branches up the stream, laid rows above row, the alternate rows at right angles. Next came the stone, sunk by means of bricks, railroad iron, engraved machinery, etc. The left of the dam, connecting with the Alexandria shore in the foreground, was made of square cribs filled with iron, etc., and sunk.

WILLIAM HUTCHINGS, OF THE REVOLUTIONARY ARMY, NOW OF PENOBSCOT, MAINE.

JONAS GATES, OF THE REVOLUTIONARY ARMY, DIED JANUARY 1864.

TWO CENTENARIAN HEROES OF THE REVOLUTION.

1764—1770—1864.

1764. THE LAST OF THE HEROES OF THE REVOLUTION. 1864.

As an apposite illustration for a paper issued so near the anniversary of the birthday of American freedom, we give portraits of two of the last survivors of the Revolution, of the men whom Washington led, and by whose blood and toil the Declaration of Independence, now on the lips of grateful millions, became a reality and the cornerstone of a great republic.

William Hutchings, one of these, was born in York, in the county of the same name, in what or was then called the District of Maine, subject to the rule of Massachusetts. He saw the light in 1764, just at the close of the last struggle between the English and the French colonies, in which the last were subdued.

He was but 12 years of age at the commencement of the war, and did not of course enter the service till towards the close, but he made up by his zeal and courage for the short time allowed him to display it. After the close of the war he settled in his native district, and has seen it become a thriving State. He has voted for every President, from Washington to Lincoln, has seen the country pass unscathed through successive wars, and now, having outlived a century, would die happy if he could see it once more united.

Jonas Gates, whose portrait we also present, was born at Nantucket, Mass., and early joined his father, Capt. Gates, in the army, when only 14. His father, disabled by a severe wound, was compelled to leave the service, but his gallant son, desirous of taking his place, enlisted and fought stoutly on till the independence of his country was acknowledged.

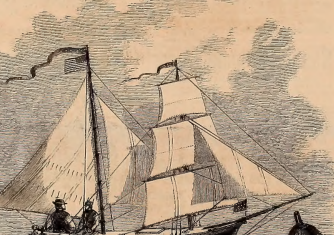
When war was again declared against England Mr. Gates came promptly forward and was made 2d Lieutenant in the 31st Infantry, April 30, 1813.

After the war he returned to Chelsea, Vermont, and resided there till after he entered his 100th year, when he died amidst his family, Jan. 14, 1864.

THE BRIC VISION.

Visions is not a bad name for one of the most visionary attempts ever made. A brig of one ton register we more of a vision than a reality, but most visionary of all subluinary things is a voyage across the Atlantic in such a cockleshell. Yet Capt. Donovan—Donovan sounds Irish—may be a lineal descendantor those mad Irish sea rovers who in the early ages laughed at Neptune and Æolus, and made long voyages from their island in corracles or willow boats, covered with hides. They thus reached Iceland under good St. Brendan, plundered the coasts of Scotland, England and France, and carried on a pleasant trade with tuffir Milesian cousins in Spain.

Eve voyage, Viking Donovan, who, taking all favorable omens, made sail on Sunday afternoon, June 26, amid the greetings of thousands of spectators who broke the Sabbath stillness by their expressions of satisfaction.



The Vision is but 15 feet in length, 4 feet 6 inches beam, and 2 feet 10 inches depth of hold. She is rigged as a hermaphrodite brig, and carries a large quantity of canvas. Her tonnage is about a ton and three quarters. She was launched at the foot of Grand street E. R., on the 17th June, and sailed with Capt. J. C Donovan, and Mr. Wm. Spencer of Providence, R. I., as Captain and crew. A lively dog Toby represents the passengers. The only provision for cooking is a lamp, the voyagers trusting mainly to corned meats for their fare and carrying 32 gallons of water to drink pure and in coffee.

When all was ready Capt. Donovan set his foresail and foresheet and mainsail, and, giving her the jib, she was headed for Governor's Island e'en the wind," and standing close in, he then "tacked ship" and reached over to Whitehall, when he again tacked, heading for Bedloe's Island, and making one more tack, he stood down the bay with a nice breeze, making at least eight knots.

Capt. Donovan intends to make the coast of England about Land's End, and proceed direct to London. There is no reason to doubt that the Vision will safely reach her destination. Capt. Donovan will be reported from time to time by passing vessels: so that we shall be enabled to hear of his progress over the Atlantic.

The pilot boat Wm. Bell was the first to give tidings of her, having passed her on the 28th, 47 miles east of Five Island.

It requires some nerve for such an undertaking, and we hope he will reach London in safety, and show to the Englishmen that, although they have sent the largest vessel to us, we can let them see that the smallest vessel can carry the Stars and Stripes across to them. If this is successfully accomplished, then let her make a note of it; for it would not be unlikely, in the event of a foreign war, that a fleet of our North river sloops might cross over and trouble her commerce, and perhaps destroy her coasting trade.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A YANKEE doctor has contrived to extract from sausages a powerful tonic, which he says combines the whole strength of the "bark," He calls it "sul-pastor's essence."

HATTIE HENPECKED.—Fancy a man nibbling an apple on the sunny side of a barn, for fear his wife should see him eat it in the house.

THE following dialogue is said to have taken place recently between a married couple on their travels: "My dear, are you comfortable in that corner?"

"Quite, thank you, my dear."

"Then there's plenty of room for your feet?"

"Quite enough."

"And he cold air from the windows by your ear?"

"Quite certain, darling."

"Then, my dear, I'll change places with you."

THE following lately appeared in the Gospel Standard: "The ministry: A few lovers of gospel truth are in want of a minister. One who understands gardening, hothouses and greenhouses, and who would be willing to employ himself in the summer, would have £40 per year, in addition to what might be raised by the friends. Apply," &c.

FOOS GARIBALDI must have had a hard time of late, for it is said that he had 367,000 applications for locks of hair from ladies. The calculation is that, after the complete exhaustion of the hero's own hair, including whiskers and beard, his wigs would not have met the demand.

SELLING AT HALF PRICE.—A shopkeeper, in a small town, one day, marked the handkerchiefs in his window with the tempting words, "selling at half price." Shortly after, a lady who had traded with him before entered the shop in a hurry, and having looked at the handkerchiefs inquired the price.

"Only seven pence," replied the shopman.

"Very well," said the lady, "you may do me up a dozen."

The handkerchiefs were cut off and delivered to the lady, who gave the shopkeeper a £3 bill.

"Bey your pardon, madam, but I—he—told you the handkerchiefs were 50 cents apiece; that is 6*d* per dozen."

"To be sure; I understand as much arithmetic as that; 6*d* is the price: half six is three—that is half price. I think they are cheap enough. Good morning, sir."

The lady shut the door. The shopkeeper opened his eyes. For five minutes he stood still as a statue, gazing vacantly at the window; biting his lips and looking very red, he quickly removed the card pinned to the handkerchiefs, and resolved to announce no more goods as selling at half price.

A NAVAL officer being at sea in a dreadful storm, his wife was sitting in the cabin with him, and filled with alarm for the safety of the vessel, was so surprised at his serenity and composure that she cried out:

"My dear, are you not afraid? How is it possible you can be so calm in such a dreadful storm?"

He rose from his chair, dashed it to the deck, drew his sword, and pointing it at the breast of his wife, exclaimed:

"Are you afraid?"

She immediately answered:

"No."

"Why?" said the officer.

"Because," rejoined the wife, "I know this sword is in the hands of my husband, and he loves me too well to hurt me."

"Then," said he, "I know in whom I believe, and that He who holds the winds in his fists and the waters in the hollow of his hands is my fellow."

A GOOD-LOOKING fellow was arraigned recently before our police-court, charged with having stolen a watch. It was his first crime, and he was ready to plead guilty. The judge addressed him in very gentle tones, and asked what induced him to commit the theft. The young man replied, having been unwell for some time, the doctor advised him to take horseback exercise, he had accordingly done. The judge was rather pleased with the manner of the thing, and asked the doctor for him to select a watch.

"Why," said the prisoner, "I thought if I only had the time, that nature would work a cure!"

GRACE GREENWOOD said, in a little lecture in Philadelphia that she believed in Henry Ward Beecher and Charles Sumner. We wonder whether Beecher and Sumner are believers in Grace.

JEFF. DAVIS has appointed a day of humiliation and prayer. The rebels have probably very few days of prayer, but a great many of humiliation.

AN Irishman was employed to trim some fruit trees. He went in the morning, and, on returning at noon, was asked if he had completed his work.

"No," was the reply, "but I have cut them all down, and am going to trim them in the afternoon."

THE South should remember that, in Solomon's time, she was the false mother who wished the child divided.

A MILITARY leader shouldn't be all head or all heart. He should be at least half pluck.

THE last joke at the expense of the French Society for the Protection of Animals is to the following effect: A countryman armed with a monstrous club presents himself before the President of the Society, and claims the first prize. He is asked to state the fact of humanity on which he founds his claim.

"I saved the life of a wolf," replies the countryman. "I might have easily killed him with this bludgeon; and he owing the revenge as the air to the delicious comfort of the Protector.

"But where was the wolf?" inquired the latter; "what had he done to you?"

"He had just devoured my wife," was the reply.

The President reflected an instant, and then said:

"My friend, I am of opinion that you have been ruthlessly rewarded."

IN THE WRONG PEW.—At a railway sharebrokers' meeting, held in London the other day, a gentleman attended, and would insist upon making a very long speech, which he did. The chairman, when he had concluded, quietly asked the orator if he had finished.

"Yes, sir, quite," was the indignant reply of the ousted man.

"You will consequently permit me to answer you, sir?"

"Oh, certainly, if you can; but I defy you to do that!"

"Well, then," said the chairman, calmly and with exceedingly measured voice, looking round the room, "I think I can do so: I think I can do it to the satisfaction of yourself—I think I can do it to the satisfaction of all present—by informing you that you are in the wrong room, and addressing the wrong company. The brilliant speech you made should have been delivered at No. 6, first floor."

THE Newburyport Herald proposes to change Byron's cynical lines:

"Seek roses in December, grain in chaff,
Believe a woman or an epilogue—"

thus to suit the times:

Seek roses in December, grain in chaff,
Believe a woman or file—telegraph.

LITERARY ECOTISM.

M. JULES JANIN told me recently an interesting anecdote of Dorat, which you must let me repeat to you, as I am talking of selfishness:

"There was in the last century a poet named Barthe. They still play one of his comedies: 'Les Femmes Confidences.' He was a friend of the poet Dorat. The latter, while yet young, died exhausted by every passion of debauchery and wit. There was nothing around his deathbed but forked tongs, old bibliotaphs, collectors of gems, misery, discretion, destitution. A decayed actress kept watch by his pillow endued with thorns; even the fine silken filament of a spider's web, that floats in the air, was not there. How rare are friends of the habitual! 'Woe unto those who are rich!' Nevertheless, a man—it was Barthe—made his appearance in this miserable solitude; he had a huge roll of paper under his arm. The dying man said to him, 'Is it your tragedy?' 'No,' said the friend; I had an the only one who has come to bid me farewell—and my good examples do not go for from Café Procope!'

"Barthe unrolled his manuscript and said: 'Let me read you, friend Dorat, my new comedy in verse; it is entitled 'The Egoist, or the Selfish Fellow.' I am persuaded that you will be pleased with it.' The invalid moaned from his bed: 'Pish, my dear friend, don't you see I am dying? For Heaven's sake, have compassion on me!' The other man replied: 'Get out! you are no half dead! Besides, my comedy is not long; in three hours I can finish the whole of it.' He smoothed his manuscript, and without pity read right on till he reached the end. After he had ceased to read, he waited, full sure that his work would be successful, for the invalid's compliments. Dorat said to him with his dying voice: 'Ah!, I pray you, a scene to pay! Egoist! depict him coming to read a comedy to his dying friend, and going away after having drank the last glass of the dying man's infusion.' So saying, he turned his face to the wall, and gave up his ghost, 'Gracieux soul, and his wretchless mind.' 'Oh! the egoist and envious wretch!' exclaimed Barthe, as he quitted the death-chamber, and went to carry his comedy to the playwhore."

THE FIRST STRIKING CLOCK.—In the time of Alfred the Great there was imported in England a machine which presented the first rudiments of a striking clock. It was brought as a present to Charlemagne from Abdellah, King of Persia, by two monks of Jerusalem, in the year 800. Among other presents, says Eginhart, was a horologe of brass wonderfully constructed by some mechanical artifice, in which the course of the 12 hours of clepsydræ corbiculum with so many little brass balls, which at the close of each hour dropped down on a sort of bells beneath, and struck out the end of the hour. There were also 12 figures of horsemen, who, when the 12 hours were completed, issued out of the 12 windows, which, till then, stood open, and returning again, shut the windows behind them. It is to be remembered that Eginhart was an eye-witness of what is here described, and that he was an abbot, a skilful architect, and learned in the sciences.

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

RESTORATIVE NATURE—After having blundered in the dark for half the world at last begins to understand that the human system cannot resist or throw off the attacks of disease through the spread of debilitating influences. Strength of constitution, strength of nerve, strength in the whole physical organization—these are the only safeguards against the morbid elements which continually surround us. The astonishing tonic and assumer drain away the vital vigor which is the only source from which those who are not aware of the necessity for recruiting their bodily powers at this season do but carelessly, deplorably, the powers of their own being. The great tonic upon which experience has taught the public to rely, as a means of invigorating, regulating and protecting all the important organs of the body, is HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS, and there is no season of the year when this inestimable invigorant is more useful than now. In the crowded city, in unhealthy regions where Intermittent and Bilious Fevers prevail, in fact, where ever men are congregated, whether in large or small numbers, the recurring cases will prove how beneficial, how essential Hostetter's Bitters may be solely pronounced the purest and the best in the country world.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

The Government Loan

$200,000,000.

This Loan is authorized by Act of Congress of March 3d, 1864, which provides for its REDEMPTION IN COIN, at any period not less than ten or more than forty years from its date, at the pleasure of the Government.

Until its Redemption, five per cent. interest is to be paid semi-annually IN COIN.

Subscriptions to the Loan are received by the National Banks in United States notes or in such currency or other funds as are taken by them on deposit as par.

Its Exemption from State or Local Taxation adds from one to three per cent. per annum to its value.

The Rate of Interest on this loan, although but five per cent. in coin is as much greater in currency as the difference between the market value of currency and gold.

As a Rule, the five per cent. specific securities of all solvent governments are always par or above, and currency now funded in the National Loan, will be worth its face in gold, besides paying a regular and liberal percentage to the holder.

The authorized Amount of this loan is Two Hundred Million Dollars. The amount of subscriptions reported to the Treasury at Washington, is over $70,000,000.

Subscriptions will be received by the TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES at Washington, and the ASSISTANT TREASURERS at New York, Boston and Philadelphia, and by the First National Bank of New York, No. 4 Wall Street.

Literary Agency, Established in 1862. The subscriber has for more than 10 years past, been in the habit of reading and preparing manuscripts for the Press. At first the labor was one of kindness, and performed gratuitously. But it became so burdensome, and absorbed so much time, that a small charge in the nature of a preliminary fee became necessary. This fee, not exceeding $5, and generally less, compensated both for a careful and critical perusal of a work in manuscript, and the offering of it, if approved, to publishers.

The subscriber continues to receive and read manuscripts in the same manner, giving his candid opinion concerning them, and arranging for their printing and publication, when desired to do so. He makes his charges as moderate as possible, since his chief object is to aid literature and authors.

In all cases in which advice should be forwarded by mail, while manuscripts can be sent, prepaid, either through the Post Office or by express, legibly addressed to

The Late Rebel Raid into Maryland.

The authorities and people of the Maryland and Pennsylvania border, Baltimore and Washington, have just been favored with a surprise party, which will not soon be forgotten. Had the daring rebel invading column, which so unexpectedly streamed over the Potomac the other day, and over all the roads leading to Frederick city, come up out of the ground, or dropped down from the clouds, it could hardly have created more astonishment, confusion and alarm. There had been abundant and timely warning given of its approach, its strength and its purposes; but the facts were so intermixed with conflicting rumors and wild inventions, that until the sanguinary battle with and defeat of Gen. Wallace on the Monocacy river, it was impossible to tell whether the invading forces of the enemy fell short of 1,500 men, or exceed twice 15,000.

How is this mystery to be explained? How is it that neither the War Office at Washington, nor our several corps of observation scattered along the upper Potomac, knew anything definite of this daring and dangerous foray of the enemy until they startled Gen. Sigel from his fancied security at Martinsburg, and drove him down the river to Harper's Ferry, and thence across to the Maryland Heights for safety? Let us briefly answer these questions.

It was as but a few days ago that we were rejoicing over the capture of Staunton, 140 or 150 miles up the great valley of Virginia, from Martinsburg. Hunter had cleared the valley of the enemy to the very sources of the Shenandoah river, and was still pursuing them, scattering them from Staunton right and left, he pushed on, without a provision train and without depot or base of supplies, to Lynchburg. There he was repulsed; and from the heavy converging detachments of the enemy sent forward from Richmond to destroy him, he next discovered that his line of return, down the Shenandoah valley, was cut off, and that a retreat westward, to the Great Kenowha river and thence to the Ohio, was his only chance of escape. Accordingly he passed over the western mountain boundary of the great valley, and so to the rebel forces sent against him that valley was left completely open from Staunton down to the Potomac. The opportunity thus offered for a dashing surprise to the Marylanders and Father Abraham was too tempting to be resisted. Between Staunton and Martinsburg not a man, as it appears, had been left of our forces to watch and report the enemy's movements. And yet, from various sources, including Gen. Grant, timely warnings were given to our Federal authorities at Washington and our loyal border States directly concerned, to enable them to make the needful preparations for a decisive settlement with Early and company, with their landing on the Maryland side of the Potomac. Why this was not done it is needless now to explain. Nor would it mend the matter to discuss, in this connection, the responsibility of Gen. Hunter, the War Office, or Gen. Grant, or anybody else.

We turn, therefore, to the inquiries. Does not the Northern diversion of a large force from Lee's army afford a splendid opportunity to Gen. Grant to move upon Petersburg, or around the city upon Richmond, and why does he not act accordingly? Will our military authorities at Washington, and of Maryland and Pennsylvania, meantime, permit even a remnant of these invading rebel foragers to get back to Richmond, without at least despoiling them of their herds of cattle and horses, and their trains of plunder? We answer, first, that we expect soon to hear that Gen. Grant has struck a blow determining the issue of this campaign and of the war; and secondly, we entertain the hope that this invading rebel column, from its bold and desperate advance into the very heart of Maryland, will not only be despoiled of its plunder, but broken up and dispersed in its retreat for Richmond. In brief, we are inclined, with one of our daily cotemporaries of this city, to the opinion that, in this Maryland strategic diversion and foraging adventure, Gen. Lee has committed a grand mistake, which Gen. Grant will turn to the most decisive advantages to the Union cause.

Summary of the Week.

VIRGINIA.

Nothing new comes from Grant's army. His lines are steadily advancing, and a brisk cannonade goes on at times.

On the 7th and 8th the enemy made demonstrations against the position of the 9th corps. On the 8th, in the afternoon, an attack was made on Turner's division, and on the 9th another was made on Stannard's and Martindale's divisions of the 18th corps, but they were driven back with heavy loss in both cases.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Two expeditions, under Col. Claassen and Col. Jourdan, which left Newberne on the 20th of June and penetrated into the interior of the State, with a view to keep the enemy so busy as to prevent them from sending reinforcements to Petersburg. About six miles from Kinston Col. Claassen surprised a rebel force, and took Brig.-Gen. Foulk and some other officers prisoners.

An expedition under Gen. Vodges also left Portsmouth on the 3d inst., destroyed the ferry at South Quay, together with 50,000 pounds of bacon and other stores.

MARYLAND.

The usual summer raid has come off. Grant's operations having become a siege, Lee was enabled to detach a force to scour the Shenandoah valley, just as the crops were being harvested. As usual, we were unprepared. Half a dozen Generals, with as many distinct commands, were scattered about, and the rebels, passing all, strike through Maryland to Greencastle, Penn. Meanwhile Gens. Hunter, Wallace, Mulligan, Sigel and Stahl bestir themselves.

Gen. Mulligan on July 3 engaged the rebels at Leetown, and held them in check till Sigel had ithdrawn from Martinsburg. He then joined at Shepherdstown, and both fell back to Maryland heights.

Detachments of the enemy pushed on, plundering as th y went, and rapidly driving off cattle, horses, ded wagons, etc.

Hagerstown was evacuated on the 6th, our troops falling back to Greencastle.

The rebels have destroyed all the railroad property at Harper's ferry, and greatly injured the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

On the 6th they were driven out of Middletown by the 7th Illinois and Cole's Maryland cavalry.

Ewell's corps, two brigades of Hill's corps, and all Breckenridge's command are said to have left Lee and are operating in the valley.

About 5,000 rebels were on the 8th in Middletown valley, with two guns, in the gap of the Catoctin mountains, and at the same time the rebel Gen. McCausland's brigade was at Williamsport, but they evacuated Harper's ferry the same day.

Gen. Sigel has been superseded by Gen. Alvin P. Howe.

The rebels in this invasion are supposed to number about 25,000 men, under Gens. Early and Breckenridge. Breckenridge crossed above Harper's ferry and operated west of South mountain. Early, after expecting to take our forces in the rear, crossed at Edward's ferry and joined Breckenridge near Frederick.
